How We Improved Our Memory In One Evening

The Amazing Experience of Victor Jones and His Wife

"Of course I place you! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle.

"If I remember correctly—and I do remember correctly—Mr. Burroughs, the lumberman, introduced me to you at the luncheon of the Seattle Rotary Club three years ago in May. This is a pleasure indeed! I haven't laid eyes on you since that day. How is the grain business? And how did that amalgamation work out?"

The assurance of this speaker—in the crowded corridor of the Hotel McAlpin—compelled me to turn and look at him, though I must say it is not my usual habit to "listen in" even in a hotel lobby.

"He is David M. Roth, the most famous memory expert in the United States," said my friend Kennedy, answering my question before I could get it out. "He will show you a lot more wonderful things than that before the evening is over." And he did.

As we went into the banquet room the toastmaster was introducing a long line of the guests to Mr. Roth. I got in line and when it came my turn Mr. Roth asked, "What are your initials, Mr. Jones, and your business connection and telephone number?" Why he asked this, I learned later, when he picked out from the crowd the 60 men he had met two hours before and called each by name without a mistake. What is more, he named each man's business and telephone number, for good measure.

I won't tell you all the other amazing things this man did except to tell how he called back, without a minute's hesitation, long lists of numbers, bank clearings, prices, lot numbers, parcel post rates and anything else the guests gave him in rapid order.

* * * * *

When I met Mr. Roth again—which you may be sure I did the first chance I got—he rather bowled me over by saying, in his quiet, modest way:

"There is nothing miraculous about my remembering anything I want to remember, whether it be names, faces, figures, facts or something I have read in a magazine.

"You can do this just as easily as I do. Anyone with an average mind can learn quickly to do exactly the same things which seem so miraculous when I do them.

"My own memory," continued Mr. Roth, "was originally very faulty. Yes, it was—a really poor memory. On meeting a man I would lose his name in thirty seconds, while now there are probably 10,000 men and women in the United States, many of whom I have met but once, whose names I can call instantly on meeting them."

"That is all right for you, Mr. Roth," I interrupted, "you have given years to it. But how about me?"

"Mr. Jones," he replied, "I can teach you the secret of a good memory in one evening. This is not a guess, because I have done it with thousands of pupils. In the first of seven simple lessons which I have prepared for home study I show you the basic principle of my whole system and you will find it—not hard work as you might fear—but just like playing a fascinating game. I will prove it to you."

He didn't have to prove it. His Course did; I got it the very next day from his publishers, the Independent Corporation.

When I tackled the first lesson I was surprised to find that I had learned—in about one hour—how to remember a list of one hundred words so that I could call them off forward and back without a single mistake.

That first lesson stuck. And so did the other six.

Read this letter from C. Louis Allen, who at 32 years became president of a million dollar corporation, the Pyrene Manufacturing Company of New York, makers of the famous fire extinguisher:

"Now that the Roth Memory Course is finished, I want to tell you how much I have enjoyed the study of this most fascinating subject. Usually these courses involve a great deal of drudgery, but this has been pure pleasure all the way through. I have derived much benefit from taking the course of instruction and feel that I shall continue to strengthen my memory. That is the best part of it. I shall be glad of an opportunity to recommend your work to my friends."

Mr. Allen didn't put it a bit too strong.

The Roth Course is priceless. I can absolutely count on my memory now. I can call the name of most any man I have met before—and I am getting better all the time. I can remember figures I wish to remember. Telephone numbers come to my mind instantly, once I have filed them by Mr. Roth's easy method. Street addresses are just as easy.

The old fear of forgetting (you know what that is) has vanished. I used to be "scared stiff" on my feet—because I wasn't sure. I couldn't remember what I wanted to say.

Now I am sure of myself, and confident, and "easy as an old shoe" when I get on my feet at the club, or at a banquet, or in a business meeting, or in any social gathering.

Perhaps the most enjoyable part of it all is that I have become a good conversationalist—and I used to be as silent as a sphinx when I got into a crowd of people who knew things.

Now I can call up like a flash of lightning most any fact I want right at the instant I need it most. I used to think a "hair trigger" memory belonged only to the prodigy and genius. Now I see that every man of us has that kind of a memory if he only knows how to make it work right.

I tell you it is a wonderful thing, after groping around in the dark for so many years, to be able to switch the big searchlight on your mind and see instantly everything you want to remember.

This Roth Course will do wonders in your office.

Since we took it up you never hear anyone in our office say "I guess" or "I think it was about so much" or "I forget that right now" or "I can't remember" or "I must look up his name." Now they are right there with the answer like a shot.

Have you ever heard of "Multigraph" Smith? Real name H. Q. Smith, Division Manager of the Multigraph Sales Company, Ltd., in Montreal. Here is just a bit from a letter of his that I saw last week:

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell. Mr. Roth has a most remarkable Memory Course. It is simple, and easy as falling off a log. Yet with one hour a day of practice, anyone—I don't care who he is—can improve his memory 100% in a week and 1000% in six months."

My advice to you is don't wait another minute. Send to Independent Corporation for Mr. Roth's amazing course and see what a wonderful memory you have got. Your dividends in increased earning power will be enormous.

VICTOR JONES

What the Course Did for Mrs. Jones

From what Mr. Jones tells us, the Roth Memory Course did just as wonderful things for Mrs. Jones. She became fascinated with the lessons the first evening she could get them away from her husband, and he is forced to admit that not only did she learn the magic key words more quickly and easily than he did—but so did Genevieve, their twelve-year old daughter.

But the fun of learning was only the beginning. In a few days Mrs. Jones was amazed to see how her newly acquired power to remember the countless things she had to remember simplified her life. The infinite details of housekeeping smoothed themselves out wonderfully. She was surprised how much more time she had for recreation—because she remembered easily and automatically her many duties at the time they should be remembered. And when evening came she missed much of the old "tired feeling" and was fresher than she had been in years.

At her club she became a leader because her fellow members could count on her to conduct club matters with a clear head and in orderly procedure.

In her social life Mrs. Jones began to win a popularity that she had never dreamed of attaining. The reason was easy to understand—because she never forgot a name or face on whom she was introduced—and this also made her a successful hostess—much to the wonder of her friends. In short, Mrs. Jones, in developing her own perfectly good memory, discovered a secret of success, not only in housekeeping, but in her social life.

Now we understand the Roth Memory Idea is going like wildfire among Mrs. Jones' friends—for she has let them in on her secret.

Read the following letter from Mrs. Eleanor A. Phillips, State Chairman of the Tennessee Woman's Liberty Loan Committee:

"Enclosed please find check for $5.00 for Memory Course forwarded me. This course, to my mind, is the most wonderful thing of its kind I have ever heard of, and comes to hand at a time when I need it greatly.

"As Chairman for the State of Tennessee for Woman's Liberty Loan Committee, it is very necessary for me to remember the names of thousands of women, and with the very little acquaintance I have had with your wonderful course I find my memory greatly strengthened. I feel sure that after having completed the course I will be able to know my women and the counties they are from the minute I see them."

Send No Money

So confident is the Independent Corporation, the publishers of the Roth Memory Course, that once you have an opportunity to see your own home how easy it is to improve your memory power in few short hours, that they are willing to send the course on free examination.

Don't send any money. Merely mail the coupon or write a letter and the complete course will be sent, all charges prepaid at once. You are not entirely satisfied send it back any time within five days after you receive it and you will owe nothing.

On the other hand, if you are as pleased as are the thousands of other men and women who have used the course, send only $5 in full payment. You take no risk and you have everything to gain, so mail the coupon now before this remarkable offer is withdrawn.

WHENEVER you do not know the best way to brighten up something that seldom has to be cleaned, a good rule is to use Ivory Soap.

For thirty-seven years housekeepers have depended upon Ivory Soap to take the place of expert knowledge in the solution of a hundred and one cleaning problems. It never has disappointed them. Its copious lather enables it to dissolve any dirt that soap can move. Its purity and mildness make it entirely harmless.

A Missionary Writes of the Almost Hopeless Struggle to Educate the Children of Labrador

ONE of the most difficult problems of mission-work in Labrador is the school. The first and chief difficulty in this regard is the scattered living of our people. In most cases they live far apart. Here and there are two houses close together; but generally there is a distance of from one to eight miles between the houses.

The nature of the coast demands this. The inhabitants depend in winter upon their hunting, and unless they live scattered, they hinder each other in the pursuit of a livelihood. Here, at our station, only a few families live; yet these are almost so crowded that they encroach upon each other's hunting-grounds. Settlers and Eskimos belonging to our Makkovik aggregation live from eight to seventy miles distant from here. There is, of course, no possibility for any of those to attend a day-school. The only solution of the problem is a boarding-house, to keep the children together for a time. This was done for several years in the mission-house; but finding this rather unsatisfactory—the house having no special arrangements or accommodations for the purpose—an effort was made to build a schoolhouse.

When the suggestion was made to our congregation, it was taken up with enthusiasm. With few exceptions, they contributed toward such building liberally, according to their ability, and promised to put up the house. Some lumber (mission property) was found on the place—about half the quantity required for the house—and this the Mission Board lent us for the purpose. The other half was purchased by the contributions of our members. But the building itself was not so easily accomplished. As many of them live so far away, it was no easy thing to come and help on the work. During the short summer, fishing is the one thing that has to be attended to by all, otherwise they would have to thank themselves for an empty cupboard in winter. The autumn is too rough for any to come from a distance in their small boats. Spring was the only time left for this work, and even then the men could not stay away too long from their families, who live so isolated, and it takes in some cases a two or three days' journey alone to come here.

SLOWLY but steadily the building progressed for two years, when some help came through Christian Herald friends, so that I could employ a few men for a short time to facilitate the building. Three years after commencement we were able to put the schoolhouse in use. There is a large schoolroom, a good-sized kitchen, a bedroom for the girls, and a small pantry below. Under the high roof there are two bedrooms for the boys. Besides there is a large porch, where firewood can be piled up, where the children's "cossaks" can have a place, and also where fresh meat or fish can be kept frozen. The house itself is well built and warm; one stove keeps it heated. It accommodates twenty-five children, and there are not many more to be found of the school age, from seven to fourteen, within our district, for we have a hundred

The next difficulty in connection with our school is that some of the parents are not sufficiently interested in the education of their children to send them to us. Of course, there is no compulsion. We are without oversight or encouragement from outside of our own church. All depends upon the good-will of the parents whether the children are sent to school or not. Some of the parents have never learned to read, although they get along well in earthly matters; consequently learning, they think, cannot be so important. Others have learned to read and write without a school, so these reckon that the children can be taught as well at home. Others again need a boy of ten to twelve years of age at home for cutting wood and fetching water, or a girl for nursing the baby, and therefore they feel that they cannot well spare them. But I am glad to add that these are the exceptions. The majority value the school and gladly send their children to us.

ANOTHER feature of our school is the very short time it can be kept open, and the long vacation the scholars have. School opens about the middle or end of February and closes again at Easter time. Probably nowhere else in the world is school conducted under such peculiar conditions. There are two or three reasons for this. First, none of the parents could spare the children in summer time. During the fishing season they are all, according to age and ability, more or less employed with their parents. Second, with the children there frequently stays one of the mothers or some other elderly woman, who does the cooking, washing, mending and looking after them in general. She does this without payment, voluntarily and gladly, but finding it no easy task. It would be impossible to get her on these terms for a long period; and funds are not available for this purpose. Last, but not least, most of the teaching has to be done by the missionary in charge of the station, whose ordinary church work has to be carried on as usual at the same time.

We have no special teacher. In the earlier miles of coast line. But there are always a few that back out. Last winter we had the greatest number so far: twenty children, half of them boys.

part of winter it is my duty to visit all the members of our congregation living north and south of the station. This round of visits is begun soon after the New Year, as soon as traveling conditions are suitable, and never completed before the middle of February. After this the school begins. I give the school work twenty-six hours per week, and as the time is so short we do whatever is possible to implant some knowledge in the young minds and hearts. But this could not be carried on for a long period without a breakdown in the health of the missionary.

My wife helps in school, although her other duties in the house, kitchen and nursery are manifold. Last winter we had an excellent helper in the teaching, an American lady who spent the winter here with us, and who boarded in the mission-house and studied Labrador, its life and its people. She had much love for the children and great skill in teaching them, and she not only helped during school time, but kept a day-school also from New Year onward, while the missionary was traveling.

WHAT are the results under such deficient conditions? you will ask. Can any good come from it? Yes, there are comparatively good results, in the "three R's" at least, with most of those children that are sent to school regularly year by year—especially if they begin to attend while yet young. Eskimo children, who know hardly any English at all, and have to struggle with the language at first, within five winters have learned to read, write and reckon, which may be considered sufficient for Labrador. But it is mostly a hopeless case with children that come to us too late. One girl came for the first time when twelve years old. She knew absolutely nothing and was somewhat dull besides. She did not learn even to keep the letters apart within six weeks, and in writing she only managed to make correctly the i and e. The very last day she would still write the figure 4 all upside down, so that it looked like a chair. But when they come early, they invariably acquire something worth while. Before coming again they will try for months to learn at home in order to show up favorably at school and perhaps win promotion to another class. This one thing is certain: the children love the school. They are happy when here and sorry when it is over.

The conviction is often overwhelming that the important part of our work is still sadly deficient, and but a makeshift. But it is absolutely necessary to do at least this much. We do wish more could be done and we hope and pray that a time may come soon when the children of Labrador can have better schooling, a longer period at school, and permanent teachers even out here. Civilization is advancing and the Gospel is making good progress, but more knowledge must be given to these people in the future if they are to fight the battle of life successfully.

For a number of years we have held every winter a few weeks' school at the Mission stations

ON the fundamental facts of boy nature are based the methods of the Boy Scouts of America. By this study and utilization of psychology are the surest appeals made and the most direct and lasting impressions given. Thus the scoutmaster, with genuine sympathy and intuition, is able to arouse his boys' latent idealism and direct it effectively, without using an unhealthily emotional appeal.

One of these fundamental appeals is made by the camp-fire. No camp is a real camp unless it centers around the evening camp-fire. Fire has been a symbol of the highest ideals of mankind since primitive times. The idea of communion with the Great Spirit was connected with fire by all primitive peoples, as is evidenced by their use of incense and burnt-offerings and other ceremonial observances. These first early associations with fire as a symbol have been idealized and, to a certain extent, refined with the progress of civilization; but they never have been lost from the spiritual treasure-house of mankind. Fire is regarded variously as the symbol of light, purity, learning, and the immortality of the soul. Any appeal, therefore, to the spiritual nature by means of the camp-fire is based on one of the great fundamentals, and is sure to have a more than fleeting effect.

The camp-fire comes, moreover, at the time of day when the boy's love for physical activity has been gratified by the allurements of woods and meadows, and the manifold activities of the Scout camp program. Through these his appetite has been whetted to a sharp edge. Plain, wholesome food has been devoured in quantities limited only by the size of the bean-pot and the elasticity of the boy's skin. Now is the chance for his imagination to work and his thoughts to be led on to serious things. Conditions are such as to contribute to his physical and mental well-being, and to stimulate the most healthful kind of spiritual response.

The Inspiration of the Camp-Fire

By L. L. MACDONALD

Here the adult leader diverts these boy-dreams, leading each boy on to picture himself as actually doing the things we otherwise would have to exhort him to do. The approach is made through any one of several avenues. Hero-worship, so natural to the youthful mind, offers good opportunity, for under the inspiration of the camp-fire the great men of history, religious or secular, do not seem mere fictitious creatures of books. In the light of the camp-fire they are warmed into real existence, and the heart-throbs of the boy David before Saul unafraid, or Lincoln in his rude wilderness home, resound in unison with their own heart-beats and see just as real.

The rich variations of the symbolic meaning of fire hold many possibilities. This is particularly pointed in the contrast between fire as a consuming and destroying force and fire as an illuminating, refining and dynamic power. Many analogies may be drawn from the contrast, with application to the simple questions of conduct. Fire may be likened to temper. Each, when well-controlled and actually in control, essential to the well-being of every one; when uncontrolled, both are mediums of wanton destruction and utter devastation.

Memories of these camp-fire experiences are burned deep into the soul of every scout. The feeling of good-fellowship in the group, whose undivided attention is drawn to one center by the constant activity and ever-changing form of the flame; the appeal to the senses through music and the physical beauty of the scene; the association between the glow of the fire and all the ideals it symbolizes and all the dreams encouraged by the spirit of the gathering: these are ineradicably impressed upon him.

The far-reaching practical effects upon his thought and action cannot be adequately estimated. He stands around the camp-fire, under understanding guidance, all manner of inspiration may come to him bearing fruit later in ardent purpose and his achievement.

Telling stories about the fire at a training-camp where boys listen and learn and achieve ideals

The Block That Was Transformed

By B. W. BABCOCK

Notices to the People of This Here Block

Dear Friend and neighbor:

We thank all of you in which you show your kindness and feeling toward the celebration of the service flag as it could not be any better.

By looking over the names on the chart here if any person which has some one in the service of this block and was forgotten to be put on can give the name to one of the committee.

Every month there will be new stars put on the flag. Thankfully,
The Committee.

THIS bulletin, stenciled on white paper in black characters on the red brick wall of a factory, perhaps by some worker, meets the eye of the stroller through the block of West Thirty-eighth Street, New York, whose boundaries are Ninth and Tenth Avenues.

Then the eye travels above the notice and sees stenciled upon a larger white sheet a long list of names, each with a star after it. If the stroller has entered the block casually on his way beyond, his mind is now cleared of anything save that particular block. He looks aloft and sees a huge service flag suspended above the roadway from the factory wall across to the opposite tenement. There are eighty-one stars on it now, and residents of the block say that very soon there will be 135 stars, for since the flag was put up fifty-four more men of the block have gone into the service of the United States.

Then, perhaps, the stroller scans the home windows of the block. There are individual service flags everywhere. One house has two two-star flags fluttering from two windows of its second floor.

The stroller feels that he should inquire into this patriotism and looks about for some one to whom he may address a question. He notes that there are only women on the block, and small children, and here and there an elderly man.

The block, he soon sees, has developed a community spirit. By accident and the laws of supply and demand before the war it had the physical aspects of a village, just as nearly every other block of tenements in New York has. There are the small groceries, the block meat-market, the laundry, the baker.

And by no means all of the block is given over to residence purposes. There is a soap factory, and several other fairly large plants. So in density of population West Thirty-eighth Street between Ninth and Tenth Avenues cannot compare with other New York blocks.

Yet it has come to have a spirit that is found only in some village where the inhabitants have faced and met a common peril.

THE stroller asks the first person he meets for some explanation of this community pride. This person is a woman with a shawl over her head.

"I never liked this block until they put up that service flag," she says. "I've lived on this block in the same rooms sixteen years. My husband died there and some of my children were born there. But now the block is just like some new sort of town—where all the people are kind to one another and nobody tries to put on airs with anybody else.

"When they raised that flag it was a grand time.

The honor roll of the block

There was a band and the alderman walked all around the block, taking off his hat. Some of the young men on the block who will go to war next thought of it and took up a collection for the flag and celebration. It was a little hard on us to raise that money. All of us are buying Liberty Bonds on partial payments, but we thought that we could honor our boys and then work the harder to buy more bonds."

Thinking to draw out some unusual reason for this wholesale migration of the block's young and fittest to fighting scenes, the visitor may ask some mother for the precise reasons which induced her son to volunteer. The mother looks at the inquirer with a puzzled expression.

"Why, for his country," she says simply.

A typical home is that of John L. Ward, who is twenty-four years old and has been in France with an engineers' regiment for almost a year. When the observer called, the boy's mother, Mrs. Martha E. Ward, was busy with sewing.

"You must excuse me if I go right on working," she said. "I must keep the clothes of the children in order. We are buying Liberty Bonds and we are not going to buy any more new clothes if we can help it. The boys over there need everything we can give them, much more than we need new things here."

John L. Ward for five years was employed as a scenic painter and repairer. He went with an engineering regiment. In France, however, he is using his acquired skill for his country. He is still painting and repairing scenery, but it is scenery which masks batteries from air observation. It is camouflage.

"All of the people on the block who have given their sons to their country are buying Liberty Bonds," said John's mother. "It is a duty for every one to buy the bonds. Our boys and everybody's boys must be made as safe as possible, and they must have supplies and the ammunition that is to get the Kaiser."

TRAGEDY has touched the block also. Sergeant William Carroll, of 460 West Thirty-eighth Street, who joined an engineering regiment, died in the service of his country. He had been engaged, but he and his betrothed had deferred the marriage from time to time because his business called him away frequently for long periods from New York. But when his decision to enlist was made, they were married at once. Their honeymoon was only three days, as he had had military training, and he was needed in France.

Patriotism ran high on West Thirty-eighth Street west of Ninth Avenue in the days when the block's young men enlisted and went to France. Patriotism is running just as high today. Those left behind feel that they must sustain their boys through the purchase of Liberty Bonds, and by persuading every one with whom they come in contact to do the same. There is genuine block rivalry on the West Side in the matter of service flags and also for a record in the sale of Liberty Bonds. Already several other blocks in the vicinity of the Thirty-eighth Street block are making arrangements both for block service flags and for concerted block effort in selling Liberty Bonds.

"This block is more patriotic to the inch than any other in New York, and it is going to prove it," is the spirit now animating the blocks.

President Proclaims October 12 as Liberty Day

ON September 20 the President issued the proclamation herewith requesting that the anniversary of America's discovery be made a day of celebration in aid of the Fourth Liberty Loan.

As an army, trained and ready, rushes eagerly into battle and can scarcely be restrained until the time for attack is at hand, so the people of America approached the time for the launching of the Fourth Liberty Loan campaign. If there ever had been any failure to understand America's entrance upon the war, any inability to appreciate the causes which forced her to take the sword, these had been wiped away by the events of the war months and the educational activities of the first three campaigns. No one any longer needed to be told that battles are won with bullets bought with bonds. The lesson had been learned that the public knew that the greater the financial support of the people the more complete could be the armaments at the shorter the conflict.

When this issue of the Christian Herald went to press the size of the offering of the Fourth Liberty Loan had not been announced, but it was generally expected in Washington that it would be $6,000,000,000. The bonds will be dated October 24, 1918, and will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000 and $10,000.

The Government will accept payment as follows: 10 per cent. with the subscription, 20 per cent. on November 21, 1918, 20 per cent. on December 19, 1918, 20 per cent. on January 16, 1919 and 30 per cent. with interest on January 30, 1919. The banks will be provided with installment cards providing for payment of $50 bonds in 25 weeks at $2 per week. Some banks and business houses will continue the previous policy of accepting payments at $1 per week on each $50 bond. Holders of paid in full bonds of either of the three preceding series will probably be able to borrow the full face value for the purchase of the Fourth Liberty Bonds.

A PROCLAMATION

By the President of the United States of America

EVERY day the great principles for which we are fighting take fresh hold upon our thought and purpose and make it clearer what the end must be and what we must do to achieve it. We now know more certainly than we ever knew before why free men brought the great Nation and Government we love into existence, because it grows clearer and clearer what supreme service it is to be America's privilege to render to the world. The anniversary of the discovery of America must, therefore, have for us in this fateful year a peculiar and thrilling significance. We should make it a day of ardent rededication to the ideals upon which our Government is founded and by which our present heroic tasks are inspired.

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, do appoint Saturday, the twelfth day of October, 1918, as Liberty Day. On that day I request the citizens of every community of the United States, city, town, and countryside, to celebrate the discovery of our country in order to stimulate a generous response to the Fourth Liberty Loan. Commemorative addresses, pageants, harvest home festivals, other demonstrations, should be arranged for in every neighborhood under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and the immediate direction of the Liberty Loan Committee, in co-operation with the United States Bureau of Education and the public school authorities. Let the people's response to the Fourth Liberty Loan express the measure of their devotion to the ideals which have guided the country from its discovery until now, and of their determined purpose to defend them and guarantee their triumph.

For the purpose of participating in Liberty Day celebrations all employees of the Federal Government throughout the country whose services can be spared may be excused on Saturday, the twelfth day of October, for the entire day.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in the District of Columbia this 19th day of September, in the year of Our Lord, One Thousand Nine Hundred and Eighteen, and of the Independence of the United States of America the One Hundred and Forty-third.

WOODROW WILSON.

LIBERTY Loan films have been prepared and will be shown throughout the country.

Great Allied Victory in Palestine

CHEERING news came by the cable from Palestine on September 22. The Turkish army operating between the Mediterranean and the Jordan River had been virtually wiped out by the British forces under General Allenby. The entire Turkish system of defenses north of Jerusalem was overwhelmed by the sweep of the British troops. The Turks were reported as having sustained heavy losses in killed and wounded, while the British casualties were surprisingly slight. British cavalry units had advanced 60 miles from their original positions and occupied Nazareth, El Afule and Beisan.

It seems from the dispatches that the Sultan's troops were caught in a huge trap west of the Nablous-Jerusalem road, where they were cut off by cavalry on the one side and their escape eastward barred by Arab forces under the King of the Hedjaz on the other. Only two narrow fords across the Jordan were available for escape.

This battle, one of the greatest that has ever taken place on the historic soil of the Holy Land, was fought over places that are familiar to all Bible readers. British infantry, Australian light horse and Indian cavalry, in the advance passed through the coastal sector of the Plain of Sharon to get to the enemy's rear. Welsh and Indian troops had hard fighting with the Turks eastward of the Nablous road. Nazareth and Samaria are now held by the British, and Gen. Allenby's cavalry is operating along the shores of the Sea of Galilee. Much of the battle was fought on a portion of the famous field of Armageddon, which is indicated in prophecy as the coming scene of the last great battle with the forces of evil.

Armored cars and airplanes played an important part in the battle, and the mastery of the air was easily in the hands of the British. A German airplane carrying mails for the Turks landed at Afule after the battle, the pilot still believing the place to be in Turkish hands. The plane, its occupants and contents were captured. British aviators who had prevented the enemy planes from observing the British preparations for the attack harassed the enemy by a series of bombing raids, and planes armed with machine guns did effective work along the roads converging at Nablous, which were jammed with retreating Turkish fugitives and transport wagons, affording easy targets for the airmen.

This new victory, which has dealt a smashing blow to Turkish power in central Palestine, relieves a large section of the Holy Land from the dominion of the Moslems. It is the greatest event that has happened in the Near East since the capitulation of Jerusalem itself.

General Allenby completely destroyed the 7th and 8th Turkish armies in Palestine. The entire transport and ammunition trains of both armies was taken and all their airplanes, four in number, were captured. The number of prisoners counted on September 23, was 25,000 with 260 guns, but the balance of the original 50,000 men in the Turkish Army were trapped and faced the alternative of death or capture. General Allenby's use of cavalry was declared the most brilliant in this war, his cavalry having made the Allied victory a complete disaster for the Turks. The Turks hold on Palestine was thoroughly broken and the whole Turkish railway system in southern Syria was in British hands. It was expected that a new base would be established at the port of Haifa. General Liman von Sanders, the German general in command in Palestine, left Nazareth in haste for the north as soon as he heard that the British cavalry had crossed the Iskanderan and were approaching Esdraelon.

President Condemns Russia

PRESIDENT WILSON, through Secretary Lansing, on September 21, sent a telegram to all the American diplomatic representatives at neutral capitals, calling attention to the reign of terror in Petrograd, Moscow and other Russian cities. The President said: "In view of the earnest desire of the people of the United States to help the Russian people, and lend them all that is possible of assistance in their struggle to reconstruct their nation upon principles of democracy and self-government, this government feels that it cannot be still or refrain from expressing its sorrow at this state of in Russia saying it was their first duty to join the Russian Soviet troops, and to oppose Japan and her Allies, "who threatened to restore the eastern front."

Dispatches from Harbin, on September 7, reported a movement by Polish officers to form a Polish division of 100,000 men to fight in Siberia westward toward their fatherland with the Czecho-Slovak army. In the meantime conditions in that part of Russia over which the Bolsheviki maintain terrorism. Furthermore, it believes that in order to check the further increase of the indiscriminate slaughter of Russian citizens all nations should register their abhorrence of such barbarism." Each diplomat was instructed to inquire whether the government to which he was accredited was disposed to take more immediate action to impress upon "the perpetrators of these crimes the aversion in which civilization regards their present wanton acts." A reported alliance between the Bolsheviki and Germany received further confirmation in an Associated Press dispatch, via Peking, in which it was reported that the German Emperor, on September 10, had issued an order to all Austro-Hungarians and Germans their uncertain tenure appeared to be growing steadily worse. Stockholm reported 812 executions in Petrograd. Reports indicated that the Germans were removing stores and supplies from Esthonia and Livonia, the removing of stores being taken to forecast the withdrawal of the German forces from Russian territory, the policing of which was reported to be keeping 750,000 German troops busy.

On September 20 the Karelian troops in northern Russia defeated the Bolsheviki and routed them. The British, on September 19, evacuated Baku in southern Russia and retired to northern Persia. They found the Armenian troops lacking in steadiness and were themselves outnumbered by the Turks.

The Rail That Carries the Man

WAR today is a monstrous matter of machinery. It is no longer merely infantry, artillery and cavalry. It is airplanes and telephones and railways and automobile transport. As many men fight back of the line as on it. Next week we buyers of Liberty Bonds will see what our money has purchased in engines and roads "Over There."

Mary Allis is just now at the crest of her experiences in France. She gets back all right and we will soon know how, for the story runs but three weeks longer. On October 30th we will greet a new hero in Dr. Chas. M. Sheldon's new serial, "All the World." We will tell you more about it later.

Miss Sangster took council this summer with a little brown bird. Next week she brings us the lesson the little bird told her; it is a lesson of friendship.

A Week in the World's News

AN ARMY OF 4,800,000. In explaining the request of the War Department for additional appropriation of $7,347,000,000, General March, Chief of Staff, told the House Appropriation Committee, on September 18, that, in addition to the 3,200,000 men, then in service, it was planned to train 1,600,000 more fighting men, giving a maximum strength of 4,800,000. In order to secure the additional men he estimated that it would be necessary to call 2,700,000. He expected to get 1,350,000 men from the 19-20 and 32-34 classes of the new registration. General March announced the detailed estimates on which the $7,000,000,000 request was based. Of this amount $1,000,000,000 is needed by the office of the Chief of Staff, the military information section, and the general staff corps; $1,791,700,000 for the pay of the army; $1,278,000,000 for transportation and $1,985,000,000 for armament and artillery.

HOUSE PASSES REVENUE BILL. The House, on September 20, passed the new $8,000,000,000 Revenue Bill by vote of 305 to 0. The bill, as passed, differed only in minor details from the draft reported to the House by the Ways and Means Committee. It was expected that the Senate would make a great many changes in the bill, and that the final completion of the legislation would not be accomplished before election.

ALLIED WORLD APPROVES PRESIDENT'S POSITION ON PEACE. President Wilson's curt, clear and decisive reply to Austria's appeal for a peace discussion was enthusiastically received throughout the allied world. It was reported in London that the European allies might send more extended replies, but that President Wilson's leadership would, without doubt, be closely followed. In certain quarters in England the opinion was expressed that it might have been the part of wisdom to have met the Austrian delegates in order that the Teutonic powers might have given a more thorough understanding of the essential requirements for peace but in most quarters it was considered better statesmanship to avoid completely secret diplomacy with its inevitable complement of intrigue.

The French reply to the Austrian note consisted in the forwarding, with the formal acknowledgment of receipt, of a copy of Premier Clemenceau's speech to the Senate, delivered on September 18. The Premier said "The most terrible account ever opened between one people and another awaits payment." Then, after a pause, with grim intensity, he declared, "It shall be paid." Concluding he cried, "Germany has asked for a decision by the sword. What Germany has asked for Germany shall have. Our dead demand it. Forward, then, soldiers of France, to the victory without stain! All France, a humanity, is with you!" Germany, on September 20, formally accepted the Austrian invitation to a conference, and Austria announced that, in spite of the rejection, her offer remained open. The War Aims Committee of the Interallied Labor Conference, meeting at London on September 20, recommended that the conference call upon the governments of the allied nations to adopt President Wilson's fourteen peace points in a joint declaration of Allied policy.

ALL EAT AT A COMMON TABLE. Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator, just returned from a conference of the Food Administrators of the Allies, issued an announcement on September 21, outlining the food conservation program which the United States must follow in order that our armies and our Allies, and the civilian population abroad might be maintained in proper working condition to fight Germany. Mr. Hoover declared that victory might be achieved in 1919 by proper feeding of the Allied peoples, which case a million American lives

Good Roads the New Avenues of Commerce

It is obvious that maintenance of our highways is absolutely essential if America is to feed both our own soldiers and our allies. It is not enough to grow the necessary crops and harvest them. They must be transported and distributed where they are needed, to be of value. Every road in every part of the land, which connects a producer of any commodity with a shipper or consumer of that product, is playing a major part in the nation's struggle. Appeals are being made to Congress and the President to create a centralized governmental highway department in Washington to formulate a definite permanent highway policy, and with authority to carry out that policy.

The American Association of State Highway Officials has endorsed the resolution to this effect passed by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and added the statement that "We believe the solutions are important and necessary and should be made operative at the earliest possible moment." Resolutions of the same tenor have been adopted by the United States Good Roads Association and by the Highway Traffic Association of the State of New York.

Need for the coordination of highway requirements and the adoption of a national policy becomes evident when it is known that nine different Federal departments and commissions have a direct interest in transportation by highway. These are the Departments of War, Commerce, Agriculture, Post Office, Labor and the Treasury, the Director of Railroads, and the Fuel and Food Administrations.

Under state control of highways there is lack of attention to the main interstate arteries of travel so essential to movement of army trucks; to operation of intercity motor express and freight lines which help to relieve railroad freight congestion, and to the post office and private rural parcel post and express service, which is becoming a factor in helping to solve the food situation.

FROM statements made by Major-General W. M. Black, Chief of Engineers, Major-General Leonard Wood, and Major J. S. Bond, of the United States Army Engineering Department, it is clear that the government realizes that owing to the congestion of the railroads the highways will have to do more and more of the transportation of the country, and that to handle it they must be maintained at their maximum efficiency. Not only must a network of good roads, properly maintained, connect otherwise inaccessible farming communities with railroad centers, but in other places they will constitute a through highway between large centers of manufacture that will make possible the movement of heavy supplies by trucks.

In the opinion of Major-General Leonard Wood, "substantial highway construction of economic value should not be curtailed because we are at war. Through routes, connecting centers of population, aid in the prosecution of the war by providing additional facilities for transportation of men and supplies." To this Major-General W. M. Black adds: "The requirements of a military highway do not differ in any material respect from those of a highway for modern commercial purposes. Most valuable in a military way are roads connecting commercial centers."

The National Council of Defense has announced that "as far as possible important highways already constructed should be maintained, and those should be constructed which are of vital importance because of their bearing on the war. These may be summarized as follows:

"Those which are utilized or will be utilized by the military establishments;

"Those which carry considerable volume of material and supplies essential to war industries;

"Those which have a bearing upon the production and distribution of food supplies, connecting population and shipping centers with surrounding agricultural areas."

RAILROAD conditions, coupled with rush orders, are making the use of motor trucks imperative at all times, especially for immediate delivery. How far the truck may be made effective has not yet been determined. Trucks are already delivering merchandise and moving families distances as great as 300 miles. They may go even farther. Activities of the army necessitate the moving of long trains of trucks.

The 400,000 motor trucks now in service have sounded the death knell of the short-line railroad, and the increasing use of trucks is certain, especially with the building of hard-surfaced roads. Truckmakers increased their production of trucks more than 100 per cent. for the first three months of this year as compared with the same period of 1917.

During the first three months of 1918 there were 38,900 machines driven over the roads to dealers by eight of the larger producers, being 33 per cent. of their production. This number of driveways relieved the roads to the extent of about 10,000 freight cars in the delivery of the trucks alone.

Motor express lines are needed at once in many sections, but particularly east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio River, where freight congestion is most serious and farm labor most difficult to obtain.

Hundreds of suburban, rural and intercity truck lines are in successful operation, but thousands are required. They are not doubtful experiments. Nearly a score are operating on regular routes from New York to other cities up to distances of 200 miles. They run to Yonkers, Mount Vernon, White Plains, New Rochelle, New Haven, Hartford and Boston; to Flushing and other Long Island towns; to Paterson, Passaic, Newark, Elizabeth and New Brunswick, N. J.; and to Philadelphia. Daily service is given on the longer routes and more frequent trips on the shorter ones.

A large part of the farm produce consumed in Portland, Oregon, reaches the city by motor truck lines. Similar development may be found in many cities, especially in the Northern States. Investigations to determine the details of such services are now under way. There are twenty-two rural express lines in Maryland. Fifteen operate out of Baltimore, five out of Washington, D. C., one out of Hagerstown, and one out of Cumberland.

USUED pleasure cars, especially those of strong construction, are excellently adapted for light loads and long rush trips. The labor and expense of converting them into light trucks are small, and their use as such gives temporary relief to the truck manufacturers, already crowded with army orders for trucks and other machine parts.

Every kind of produce raised on farms, all sorts of goods bought by farmers, and varied products of factories are handled by the

FADING AND CHANGING

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Isa. 64:6. "We all do fade as a leaf." I Cor. 15:51. "We shall all be changed."

ISAIAH had been gazing upon the significance of the autumn. He had watched the leaves of the trees as they changed from their summer prime into their autumn weakness. He had noticed the gradual decrease in their power of clinging to their support, and how at last they were compelled to let go their hold, and one after another quietly flutter away, to mix with the dry and unregarded heap upon the ground.

And as Isaiah saw all this, as he marked the fading, fluttering, falling leaf, it shaped itself before his mind and heart into a symbol of human life. The tree represents the human race; the individual is but a leaf upon it; we fade and fall; we drop into our graves; other leaves come in our places, and we are disregarded and forgotten! Our little season soon is over, and "we all do fade as a leaf."

Such is the prophet's figure. We know how many signs and symptoms there are in life which suggest the truthfulness of the figure. You say you cannot take a hill now as once you could. It makes your breathing a burden, and the slightest incline wearies and tires you out. It all means the fading leaf! Your eyes are giving you trouble. The glasses that served you ten years ago are of little use to you now. You say you need a stronger pair, your vision is so dim.

It is the fading leaf!

I notice that you very frequently have to ask your friends to repeat their words. You are inclined to think it is because they mumble and murmur their speech. Nay, nay, it is the fading leaf! There is your memory. I have heard you say that lately it has begun to play tricks with you, a thing it has never done before.

It is the fading leaf!

All these are signs, common signs, that the prime has been reached.

SUCH is the Old Testament conception of life—a fading leaf. Is it a complete conception, or is it only partial and fragmentary? It is the conception of the Old Testament. Is it the conception of the New? So far I have only given you one-half of my text. Now let me give you the other half. I have taken it from Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians: "We shall all be changed." Now put the two conceptions side by side. "We all do fade as a leaf"; "We shall all be changed."

The Old Testament prophet looked upon men and women who were beginning to feel the weaknesses and infirmities of age, and he said, "They are beginning to fade." The New Testament prophet looked upon men and women becoming burdened with similar weaknesses, and he said, "They are beginning to change." "Fading" is the Old Testament word; "changing" is the word of the New; and in the two words you will find the characteristic differences in the two conceptions.

Let us look at them. Here is an old man. Isaiah looks at him and says, "Fading!" Paul looks at him and says, "Changing!" Whence the difference? One looks at the body; the other looks at the soul. Here is a flower-bud, in its early stages encased in its wondrous sheath of green. After a while the sheath begins to open, to turn back, to droop and to die. Isaiah looks at the drooping sheath and says, "Fading!" Paul looks at the unfolding flower, and says, "Changing!" One looks at the body which can fade; the other looks at the soul, the unfolding life, which can change but never fade. One looks at the vesture, the other looks at the man.

Now we know which is the Christian standpoint. Christianity warns us again and again not to confuse the man's body with the man, but always to distinguish between them, and to make the distinction a vital and influential article of our faith. But do we make the distinction as constantly conspicuous as we might? Do we not in common speech regard the man's fading body as the man?

For instance, when one has passed away, the inquiry is often made by one friend of another, "Where are they going to bury him?" Bury him? Never! No, you bury it, it; you bury his body, you bury that which has faded, you cannot bury the man. Well, why not make that distinction as real in speech as it ought to be real in faith? I am told that "Mr. So-and-So is in a decline." What do you mean? Do you mean that the man's body is declining, or the man? Immediately you reply, "The man's body." Then why not keep the distinction to the front, that when little children hear you speak, they may catch one of the cardinal doctrines of your faith.

We must Christianize our everyday speech, we must let the light of immortality shine through our common conversation, and ever distinguish between that which is as a fading leaf, and that which changes but never fades.

THE New Testament always keeps the two distinct. It speaks of the body, the flesh, as a house; it speaks of the spirit, the soul, as its tenant. This fleshly house may crumble, it may totter, it may fall, but the New Testament lays but little emphasis there. It tells me that this crumbling house merely means that the tenant is beginning to change his abode to another house in the heavens. "We have a house of God." "Falling," says Isaiah, as he looked at the house; "Changing," says Paul, as he looks at the tenant.

The same distinction is made by another figure. The New Testament describes my body as a robe. Look at that. Here are outer garments of cotton and wool. Then there is another garment of flesh. And then there is the soul, the man, the woman! That is the Christian conception—the flesh is the garment, it is not the man! Well, don't let us even assume it in our ordinary conversation. Let us speak of the flesh as we would of a coat or dress. Tell your children that growing old and infirm just means that the flesh garment is getting worse for wear, and that the soul is preparing for itself another garment that will never wear out, a spiritual garment—a garment of immortality and light! Tell them that death just means that the spirit has dropped its old clothes, its robe of flesh, and has clothed itself with the garment that is from heaven. Keep the distinction prominent. Let the spiritual side be uppermost.

Isaiah looks at the garment of the flesh, becoming so thin, so worn, and he says, "Fading." Paul looks at the soul reclothing itself in garments beautiful as those of a bride, and he says, "Changing." "We all do fade as a leaf," says the prophet Isaiah. "We shall all be changed," says the apostle Paul.

NOW, this is a beautiful conception, this apostolic conception of change. It takes our eyes away from the temporal and fixes them upon the eternal. It takes the emphasis away from the fading body and fixes it upon the changing spirit. For instance, to recur to an illustration I employed at the outset. You say your eyes are becoming weaker and weaker, that your vision is becoming more and more dim. Paul would turn your attention away from those signs of a fading body, and tell you that they are signs of a changing spirit. Your spirit is loosening its moorings; the weakened sight means that your soul has begun to put off mortality and to put on immortality: you are being changed!

Here is another man, who has always had a soldier's strength and erectness, and a soldier's firm and springy step. And, lately, he has begun to notice a faltering in his step, he has become painfully conscious of a drag, and he has thought of the fading leaf. Paul would tell him that this faltering step is only the sign of a changing spirit. His soul is loosening itself! It is putting off corruption. He is beginning to be changed.

And when I stand by the dying, as a Christian I am not to think only of the fading leaf, I am to think of the changing spirit, and to know that the dying is just releasing itself little by little from this mortal coil, and the weaker the body the freer the escaping soul, until at length there is only the slightest connection left, and death gently breaks the flimsy link, and the soul goes away into spiritual freedom! Isaiah looks at the dying body, and says, "We all do fade as a leaf." Paul looks at the escaping and emancipated soul, and says, "We shall all be changed."

WE may see the gracious influence of this New Testament conception of change upon the whole round of human life. The fading leaf does not indicate an end, it only marks a period of transition. Behind the fading leaf is the changing spirit. The New Testament brings life and immortality to light! The New Testament turns many an apparently blind street into an open thoroughfare leading into the Eternal City.

Where does suffering lead to? If you confine your attention to the fading leaf, then suffering appears to be a dull, blind street which leads nowhere! But take in the conception of the changing spirit, and suffering becomes an open thoroughfare which leads into the purer realm of a sweeter and a nobler life. Tribulation leadeth to patience and patience to hope. We are being changed! Where does sorrow lead to? Look only at the fading leaf, and it is a wasting ministry, only grief that saps the mind.

But take in the conception of the changing spirit and sorrow becomes a thoroughfare lead into treasures of darkness, into a share of the riches of the nature of God. "Our light affliction is working for us a weight of glory."

Where does death lead to? Look only at the fading leaf, and the grave seems to be the end. But look at the changing spirit, and death is an open thoroughfare, leading out of the corruption of mortality into the glories of eternal life.

Talking and Walking

SUNDAY, October 6. Rom. 6:4. "Walk in newness of life." Perhaps I can best express the purpose of this meditation by reminding my readers of the fable of the young bear who was puzzled to know how to walk. "Shall I," said he to the old she-bear, "shall I move my right paw first or my left, or my two front paws together, or he two hind ones, or all four at once, or how?" "Leave off thinking and walk," grunted the old bear.

There are some people who will talk religious difficulties day and night. They want to know how to pray. They wonder how they are to love their neighbor. They are very keen to learn how to trust God, and they are full of eagerness as to how to help their fellow men. And there are other talkers who are concerned about rank and priority in the scale of duties. Are they to do this first or the other? Should contemplation or action be the first interest, or should he two move together? I think talkers of these kinds, and perhaps of many other sorts, were in the apostolic Church, for the apostle Paul puts such tarting emphasis on the necessity of walking. He seems to say to his readers, and to say it again and again, "Stop talking and begin walking! How are you to do things? Just do them! Step out and get them done."

Let me recall some of the ways in which this counsel is given. Here is one. "Walk in love." It is so easy to talk about love. I think it is still easier to sing about it. And it makes us feel quite earnest when we inquire about it and ask what love would do along this road or on that road. And the apostle's answer to much of this talking is that we just begin walking. "Walk in love." Set out and do it, and do not spend in needless questioning the strength which ought to be used in chivalrous service. Just begin to love, and like the anxious young bear you will find that all your difficulties about how to do it are immediately over.

Here is another piece of apostolic counsel: "Walk in truth." Perhaps some of those early disciples were more inclined to be theologians than saints, for theology can be divorced from piety. We can be eagerly interested in a theory and only very indifferently concerned about the life. We are to walk in truth, and in our walk the truth will have its finest witness.

It is by walking that most of our theoretical difficulties are to be solved. Walking settles a heap of questions. "It came to pass that, as he was going, he received his sight." We walk away from a crowd of needless embarrassments which always trouble the folk who are everlastingly waiting to know how to do things and never get them done. It is the life which is the light of men. J. H. J.

A Plea for Genuine Religion

MONDAY, October 7. I Tim. 4:15. "Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all." These are the words of a man of mature years and experience to a young and much-loved friend. He knows that what Longfellow says in "Hyperion" is true—that most young people act more from impulse than from principle. He would substitute a deep abiding principle for the caprices of youth. So he exhorts his young friend to reflection. "To meditate" is literally to get into the middle of a subject. Superficiality is the vice of many minds. Paul would have Timothy dig deep—take time to absorb the substance of truth. Think of the years John Wesley spent at Oxford. What was he doing? Studying, meditating. The Jesuits say, "Give us a man for ten years' service, and we will train him the first nine, and he will do more work and better work the tenth than he could have done during the whole period without training."

These words are a plea for entire devotion. One of the great weaknesses of our generation immediately preceding the present war was a lack of moral earnestness. There never were so many great causes appealing to us for assistance as today, but no cause makes much headway until it numbers among its adherents those who say, "Yea, doubtless, and we count all things else but loss." Professor Agassiz was asked to deliver a course of popular lectures and was offered liberal pay, but replied, "I have no time to make money." For fifty years America had been growing rich. Most of us had no time to do anything else but to make money. Now we have to take time—and money too—to do that which money alone could never accomplish, to redeem the world to goodness, to justice, and to truth.

These words are also a plea for an "all-round religion"; "that thy profiting may appear to all." The wide relationships of faith are here suggested. Religion is not a matter of opinion only. It means a sane mind in a sane body. It means a clean heart and a clean house. It means a pure conscience and a firm will. It means a well-kept shop and a fruitful farm. Religion must dominate all our social relations, all our serious hours and our fitful moments, all our affections and our recreations. "Godliness is profitable unto all things," unto all classes and all ages. It must be, since it is the inflow of God into the life of man. C. C. A.

Prayer in Darkness

TUESDAY, October 8. Ps. 143:4-6. "My heart within me is desolate. I remember the days of old; I meditate on all thy works; I muse on the work of thy hands. I stretch forth my hands unto thee; my soul thirsteth after thee, as a thirsty land." The lives of God's saints are not all sunshine, pleasantness, and joy. There are times when their hearts are dreary as a desert, when they are "dwelling in darkness, as those that have been long dead." In David's case this happened when the consciousness of his wrongdoing was very keen in him. His accusing conscience was smiting his life down to the ground. He felt that the enemy was persecuting his soul. His former happiness was gone. The prayer which he breathes in this condition is a prayer for restoration. His mind dwells wonderingly on his former state. The joy of those days when God's presence had been a blessed fact in his life was not of David's making; it was God's gracious work in him. He cannot by his own resolution rebuild his ruined happiness. He turns to Him who began the good work in him and prays him to restore, continue, and perfect that work. That is true repentance, to acknowledge that we are ourselves the sole cause of our ruin and misery, that we are utterly unable to reconstruct the peace and joy of the heart which we have destroyed, and that the same power which quickened the divine life in us must revive us again. Such repentance is a work of divine grace in us. W. H. T. D.

Uplifting Wings

WEDNESDAY, October 9. Ps. 55:6. "O that I had wings like a dove; then would I fly away and be at rest." In hours of age and feebleness, of struggle and sorrow, of storm and tempest, how often one wishes for wings to rise above the world to everlasting freedom and victory! In our hope and aspirations, the spirit does mount up on wings as eagles, far above all the wild winds of earth, reposing under the shadow of the Most High God. These wings of faith and prayer never fail to lift us above the life of care. Here we are safe, under His wings, from the noisome pestilence and the terrible persecution.

The soldier boy, facing the fiery rain of shot and shell, no doubt feels within him immortal pinions. He knows he shall never see death, for angels will bear his spirit upon their snowy wings to the summer land of peace and plenty, where wars come again no more. Birds sing best in cages, and man, the prisoner of hope, sings songs at the midnight hour, believing that God will give final triumph.

Paul called himself not Nero's prisoner, but "a prisoner of Jesus Christ." His spirit on wings of pen and tongue flew everywhere, while his body was in chains. What visions of the heavenlies come to those who are battling for the right! Their aspirations burst through all barriers, soaring to all spiritual heights, while fighting for the freedom of the soul and of human rights. One day the white-winged angel of peace and liberty will fly through the earth, proclaiming again, "Peace on earth, and good will to men." Then the crystal Christ will reign over all the kingdoms of this world. E. W. C.

The Secret of Boldness

THURSDAY, October 10. Ps. 119:6. "Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect unto all thy commandments." This whole psalm is in praise of God's Law, God's Word. The shame the psalmist speaks of is the shame of guilt, the shame we feel when we confront a law we have broken. Why is it that one who is guilty can seldom look us in the face? There is an inward sense of shame, a consciousness of moral incompleteness. A profane man can not look at the Third Commandment without shame. An unfilial spirit can not look at the Fifth Commandment without shame. An impure soul can not look at the Seventh Commandment without inward confusion. The psalmist declares that only one who "has respect unto" all the commandments is unashamed. What hope then is there for us imperfect and fallible beings? A word from Albert Barnes is vastly comforting: "No man can be a Christian who does not mean to keep all the commandments." God looks at the will. "Whoso willeth to do my will shall know the doctrine." God accepts our sincere endeavor as though it were a complete obedience. Sin is the only thing to be ashamed of—deliberate purpose to transgress. So, failure is not to be ashamed of if one has sincerely tried. "Not failure, but low aim, is crime." It is written in Isaiah, "He that believeth shall not be ashamed." Herein is latent the gracious doctrine of imputed righteousness—righteousness which is ours by virtue of our relationship to Christ. We are "accepted in the Beloved."

These words have a deeper significance than appears upon the surface. They look toward the Judgment Day. When the secrets of all hearts are disclosed we shall not be ashamed whose lives are hid with Christ in God, since he is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. C. C. A.

Jesus' Friends

FRIDAY, October 11. John 15:15. "I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." It is recorded as a great distinction of Abraham that "he was called the Friend of God." When communicating to his disciples the death of Lazarus, Jesus spoke of him as his friend. What made the thought of the treason of Judas so bitter to the Lord was the fact that it was his friend who had betrayed him. This title of friend Jesus in our text accords to all to whom he reveals what the Father has said to him.

The friendship of Jesus is based on the blessed knowledge which he shares with those whom he has taught—the knowledge of salvation through his redemptive work. Those who have imbibed this teaching have become convinced that God and God's Son mean well with them. For this teaching embodies the highest test of friendship, the surrender of one's life for the beloved. This test Jesus mentions in this connection when, two verses before our text, he says: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." The remembrance of what Jesus has done for us should silence every doubt that may arise in our hearts as to whether God is really our Friend and Well-Wisher, or whether he is still our Friend, seeing that we have so often been truant to his love. We may not have been faithful to our vows of friendship to him, but he is constant in his love. The disciples to whom the words in our text were spoken all ran away from the Lord the same night, but they recalled these words afterward, and the thought that he had based his friendship on the intimate relation into which he had entered with them, by communicating to them the knowledge which he had brought with him from heaven, pointed the way to them by which they entered again into his friendship. When we feel guilty of having forfeited the friendship of Jesus by wayward acts, in periods of indifference, there is no other way for becoming reassured that he is still our friend than by reviving in our hearts that knowledge of the love of the Father which has been conveyed to us in the Gospel of his Son. Faith Hope and Love

SATURDAY, October 12. I Cor. 13:13. "And now abideth faith, hope and love, these three; but the greatest of these is love." In this holy trinity of graces, hope is naturally first. Hope is faith begun. Faith is hope fulfilled, while love is the climax of both, the keystone in the arch. Together, they form a circle of endless blessings, each incomplete without the other.

These three graces may be called the pillars in the temple of manhood, beautiful with divine workmanship, or they may be compared to rooms in the soul, like the outer court of the temple—the Holy Place, and the holiest of all, where love abides.

Paul speaks of the full assurance of hope, of faith, and of the understanding. Divine love in the heart is the author of that assurance, expressing the harmony and unity of these graces. Hope is called the anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, that we might have a strong consolation while clinging to the Rock of Ages. Faith is the evidence of things not seen, the assurance of things hoped for, the witness in the soul that Jesus is true. This is the faith that works by love and purifies the heart. The dove of hope brings the green leaf of promise, proclaiming that the waters of the flood will soon be assuaged, while faith acts upon the prophecy, and love sings praises to the eternal Father on the summits of deliverance. Reality in Religion NATURE flies her storm signals visibly, but the presage of change in the spiritual atmosphere is hid deep in the hearts and consciences of men. Many leaders in the Christian Church today are discerning the signs of the times, and are giving warning of impending changes which they believe will result either in a triumph for the Church, or in a great reverse.

The Christian Herald has been observant of these indications, and from time to time has discussed them freely. Now it is becoming evident that many of our ablest and clearest thinkers are impressed with the conviction that what is needed is such a reorganization of the spiritual forces of this nation as will make religion infinitely more real and closer to the hearts and lives of all of us than heretofore. The need of such change is not confined to any branch of the Church; it is universal.

One of the wonderful developments of this situation is the spontaneous movement that is bringing to the front men of the finest talent, and the clearest spiritual vision, in nearly all of the denominations. These are those who are finding out, or who have already found out, that a Church based upon the Sermon on the Mount is the only Church that can hope to survive; that religion of the kind that cannot be lived daily in the years allotted to man is not the kind the world needs.

Across the Atlantic, from the Bishop of Oxford down to the humblest parish pastor, voices "over there" are rising in warning. Here, too, we find similar conditions among the denominations. Many are now pushing aside the old reserve and speaking out, like faithful watchmen upon the walls.

In a sermon preached in Brooklyn recently in the old Lafayette Presbyterian Church Rev. Arthur W. Anthony made a strong appeal for reality in religion. Among other things he said: "The greatest storm of the Christian era is now raging in awful fury around the Church of Jesus Christ. There are many elements in the stormy situation that make up the present call for reality in religion. Only the real religion such as that preached in the Sermon on the Mount will enable the Church to weather the storm, and to stand after the hurricane is past."

"The whole war is in itself a call for reality in religion. The Church has failed to capture the governments and the ruling classes of the world for Jesus Christ. There are governments dominated by principles that make these rulers superior to Jesus of Nazareth. Four years ago, no one would have believed that Germany was ready to base her condition in war on a code of ethics which has never yet been acknowledged by man, nor practiced anywhere, unless it be in the nethermost pit. Prussianism has gained control over Protestantism in the land of Luther. Surely such a war as this is a call for reality in religion."

Passing to another phase of the question, this preacher declared: "Another element in the pressing need for reality in religion is the experience of the men engaged in the war. Away from the comforts of life and the atmosphere of cheer, these men are facing fundamental things. A church with a formal Christianity will not have any grip upon these men, who have seen with the eyes of God; who have seen the vanity of the tempter and the glory of the eternal; who have despised comfort, honor, pain; who have understood the victory of the Cross. When the boys come home the Church must have a real religion that rings true to the Sermon on the Mount to offer them, or they will have nothing to do with her."

Divided Protestantism and united Protestantism are distinctly different propositions; the first is weak, the other strong—not in the sense of finance, but in spiritual power and in all the resources that go to make a great church efficient in the service of God and man.

There should be no aristocracy in religion. Jesus Christ himself set the example of humanity in service, for all time. "A servant is not greater than his Lord." Those whom we deservedly honor because of their beautiful Christian lives are the ones who have served the most. Denying themselves the honors and applause of the world, and seeking only the divine approval and a good conscience, while they lived they craved no distinction. So today, the only reward that a church should legitimately claim is that which comes from devoted and faithful service. Ready to suffer tribulations for righteousness' sake, and faithful always, such a church cannot die. To such is promised not earthly distinctions and honors, but great spiritual reward. "He that overcometh and he that keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give authority over the nations."

When the Christian Church is one, united under the great Leader, divisions and rivalries will disappear; religion will become real to men and no longer a philosophy but a life. To the Church, purified by fire and revitalized, there will come, with a new consecration, the power to win back the multitudes and to bring the nations into accord in acknowledging the Divine Sovereignty.

The Passing of a Good Man

IN the death of Mr. Otto Koenig, the Christian Herald loses one of the most faithful and efficient officers it has ever had. Under his skilful management the paper has grown in influence, circulation and advertising, while its policies and religious program have gone on uninterruptedly.

Mr. Koenig joined the business forces of the Christian Herald ten years ago, during the lifetime of the late Dr. Klopsch. His ability and the value of his experience were quickly recognized, and he became the head of the advertising department. After the death of Dr. Klopsch, Mr. Koenig was chosen as President of the Christian Herald corporation and publisher of the paper, and has held these offices up to the present time. To the varied philanthropies of the paper and its far-reaching gospel efforts he gave the heartiest coöperation. At the opening of the great war he took part in the organization of relief work on a large scale in the suffering lands, and the success of these enterprises was largely due to his counsel and advice.

Born in Cincinnati, fifty-three years ago, he had a wide knowledge not only of his own country, in which he traveled much, but of the world, which he circled on two notable occasions. He came of a ministerial family, and both by birth and training was well equipped for the great responsibilities to which he was called. The son of a minister, raised in a parsonage, he possessed those sterling principles of truth, honesty, industry and benevolence that made him a manly man, pushed him to the forefront in business, awakened the tenderest sympathies which bound his personal friends so closely to him and blessed so wide a circle of other friends through the paper with which he was connected. Warm-hearted, open-handed, generous to a fault, his influence was useful in service for God and his fellow men.

At the outbreak of the Spanish-American War he enlisted in the Astor Battery and saw considerable service in the Philippines, being present, among other engagements, at the battle of Manila.

He was a most just and conscientious man, kindly toward all, and, like his predecessor, he loved to do good in secret. He was singularly unostentatious in his good works. To him the down-and-out was as precious in God's sight as the affluent and influential, and what he did and all that he gave was given with this idea in view. He was one of the trustees of the Bowery Mission, and was a member of the Board of Managers of the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, and to both these enterprises he gave much of his leisure and no little of his substance.

This was the man as we who knew him best will always remember him, and as the recipients of his many benefactions will love to think of him, now that he has passed away.

He had the respect and affection of the entire staff, to whom his death, after a prolonged illness, now comes as a personal bereavement.

The German Grip on Russia

ASERIES of startling disclosures have been made in the publication of communications between the German Imperial Government and the Russian Bolshevik Government and between the Bolsheviks themselves, and also in the report thereon made to the Committee on Public Information by Edgar Sisson, the Committee's special representative in Russia during the winter of 1917-18.

These documents show that the present heads of the Bolshevik Government—Lenine and Trotzky and their associates—are German agents.

They show that the Bolshevik revolution was arranged for by the German Great General Staff and financed by the German Imperial Bank and other German financial institutions.

They show that the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was a betrayal of the Russian people by the German agents, Lenine and Trotzky; that a German-picked commander was chosen to "defend" Petrograd against the Germans; that German officers have been secretly received by the Bolshevik Government as military advisers, as spies upon the embassies of Russia's allies, as officers in the Russian army, and as directors of the Bolshevik military, foreign and domestic policy.

They show, in short, that the present Bolshevik government is not a Russian government at all but a German government, acting solely in the interests of Germany and betraying the Russian people, as it betrays Russia's natural allies, for the benefit of the Imperial German Government alone. And they show also that the Bolshevik leaders, for the same German Imperial ends, have equally betrayed the working classes of Russia.

The documents are some seventy in number. Many are originals, annotated by Bolshevik officials. These astounding disclosures set a new and enormous task for America and the Allies in the rescue of Russia from the double grip of autocracy and treason.

Simplifying Life

UNDER the tonic stress of war, life is tending toward the simplicity from which it has been drifting further and further through the generations since the Civil War. This gradual return to simpler living is one of the compensations of the test through which we as a nation are passing. The beneficial effects of the various restrictions to which the American people are cheerfully submitting are already becoming apparent in the better health, higher spirits and higher moral tone of the individual American.

Physicians agree in the verdict that the average American community is in better health than it was a year ago. This is ascribed partly to the diminution of the quantity of meat consumed in response to the appeals of the Food Administration and to the corresponding increase in the vegetable diet.

The general scaling down of indulgence in luxuries has had a similar effect upon public health.

But it is not merely the physical changes in the life of the individual that have exerted a favorable influence upon the general health of the people. The moral stimulus of this period of self-denial and of responsibility has played its part in the same direction. If curtailment of indulgence has eliminated something of the physical flabbiness from the average person, the moral appeal of the time has added to the firmness of his spiritual fiber.

The Gold Service Star

ALITTLE black-robed woman boarded the trolley car—a little black-robed woman who wore a gold star sewn to a somber band on her coat sleeve. And as she walked down the aisle between the double row of seats, folk who had been talking became silent, and heads were bowed. And, through the silence, one man whispered hoarsely to another—

"What does it stand for—the star?" And the other man whispered back—

"It means that her son has been killed in action 'over there.'"

A gold service star sewed to a black band on a sleeve! We looked at it, all of us with ready understanding and deep sympathy. The woman who wore it walked with her gray head held proudly high with her steady eyes meeting ours. And she sat herself well toward the front of the car and smiled albeit a bit tremulously, as she handed her fare to the conductor.

One doesn't see many gold service stars—yet. But the casualty lists are growing larger than they were. Silently the gold stars will begin to creep into our everyday lives, just as the red-white-and-blue service flags, which were almost unknown a year ago, have become familiar to us.

Yet, if every woman who must wear one wears bravely—as the woman in the trolley car wore the gold star—the morale of the nation can not be hurt. If every woman who has lost a loved one can hold her head high and smile, the spirit of the country will continue to be the spirit courageous. American women are brave-hearted women; they have learned to "carry on," they will hold their heads high. All they will smile!

Once, back across the centuries, a Mother knelt beside a cross on a hill while her only Son was dying in agony. But she did not shrink away from the horror of it. She stayed. And American mothers today—American mothers who are meeting the Calvary—are staying, too.

Armor Old and New

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE photograph on this page shows an American soldier dressed in the very latest of war fashions—the bullet proof vest. It is a very worth-while war fashion, this vest, for it is a sort of light armor, guaranteed to stop any bullet—either from a machine gun, rifle, revolver or from a hand gun—to resist both bayonet and grenade, and, best of all, an official test has shown that it will completely throw off all missiles fired at any range from any pistol.

I looked at the photograph and, as I looked at it, I found myself remembering pictures that I had seen of brave knights in armor—knights in breastplates and coats of mail, knights who wore helmets and shields and who carried clumsy spears. And I compared their armor to the armor of the boy in the photograph.

The bullet-proof vest weighs four and one-half pounds and is made of government non-magnetic metal. The suits of armor that the knights of long ago wore weighed from fifty to a hundred pounds and were made of steel chain, or iron plated with steel. And yet they were no more effective than the modern bullet-proof vest is—in fact, they were not nearly so efficient—and they were very clumsy and heavy to move about in. Oftentimes they hampered a knight so much that he lost in a conflict that might otherwise have been a victory for him.

LOOKING back across the years I find myself remembering a certain Sunday school room with colored maps and brightly illustrated Bible scenes pinned to the wall of it. And in that Sunday school room I can see a score of chubby, earnest youngsters grouped about a pleasant-faced teacher. And I can see, standing in the center of that group, a sturdy little girl with pigtails and a ruffled pinafore, a little girl who with serious eyes and a great effort at concentration is repeating her first long Golden text.

"Put on the whole armor of God," she is saying slowly, carefully, "that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil."

The words meant little to the child in the ruffled pinafore. They were only words—rather pleasant words. But now that she is grown she can realize the significance of them and the beauty of them.

THE knights of long ago wore armor—heavy, ostentatious armor, that tired them and hurt their efficiency as fighters. The modern knight wears a light vest under his coat that answers the same purpose. The knight of long ago wore armor that shouted aloud the fact that it was armor; the knight of to-day wears his armor quietly and effectively. So it is with the Christian who puts on the "real armor of the Lord." He doesn't have to put it on in an aggressive manner so that everyone, at the moment of seeing him, will be struck with the thought of his obvious goodness; he can put it on with simplicity and modesty. And somehow when he is modest and quiet the realness of his religion strikes home.

I HEARD a woman talking, the other day, at a luncheon party. She was the sort of a Christian who wears chain armor of the heaviest sort.

"I," she said loudly, quite for the benefit of the whole party, "I belong to the large gray stone church on the corner. I go to it every Sunday—twice. I belong to a Missionary Society, and to a Bible Study Club. I give a certain sum of money to certain charities every year—" and the woman paused, perhaps for breath.

It was during the lull that followed her speech that the little lady on my right turned toward me.

"That sort of Christianity," said the little lady, "annoys me quite terribly. She," nodding toward the woman who had been speaking, "might just as well wear a placard labeled, 'I'm good—I'm very good!' It's such noisy goodness that it makes me want to go to the other extreme," and the little lady laughed.

I did not answer, but I suppose she read my interest in my face, for, after a moment, she went on.

"That girl across the table from us," she told me, "is the, to me, real kind of a Christian. She doesn't brag about her church, but she goes to it and she takes others with her—she doesn't brag about the money she gives to charity, either—but she gives it. She's always ready to help others, to stand up for her convictions and for her friends, to do a good deed in a worth-while way. She's a real Christian."

I looked across the table at the girl indicated. And suddenly I thought of the armor of the Lord. And I realized that she was wearing the best kind—the kind that isn't clumsy or heavy or showy. I realized that her armor was strong as Sir Galahad was strong—because her heart was pure.

"Put on the whole armor of the Lord." It is the Christian preparation for the battle with wrong for the cause that Christ died for on the cross. The armor of steel is a weight to carry, the Christian armor is added strength for the fight. It is a shield, a helmet, a breastplate and a sword, and with it the single Christian may meet a thousand and put 10,000 to flight. But it doesn't clank and rattle, though both friend and foe recognize its presence. It is not bullet proof but it is doubt proof and temptation proof and fear proof and death proof.

Put on the whole armor of God and live.

Foch Strikes in the Balkans

JUST as we were going to press last week, the first dispatches came announcing the beginning of active operations in Macedonia. For months the Allied army had lain like a sleeping giant across the Macedonian plains, facing the forces of the Teutonic allies, but engaging in no operations other than the raids and bombing exploits incident to a "quiet" front. The question had frequently been asked, "Why don't the Allies strike at the back door of Germany and Austria through the Balkans?" and though there was no answer the armies remained. Some even urged that the men could render better service in France.

Recently there have been various indications that it was not serene within the Central Empires, Bulgaria and Turkey were shown in active disagreement over the division of the spoils, not yet fully won and Turkey had even mobilized an army on the Bulgarian border. Emperor Charles of Austria found it necessary to visit Sofia and Constantinople, and the Kaiser and King Ferdinand were often in conference. In addition to this, encouraged by the queen of Roumania, there has lately been noted a growing movement in the unoccupied regions of Roumania, looking toward the re-entrance of that country in the war and the driving out of the invaders who have remained to enforce the treaty of peace. All of these elements pointed toward the logical time for an Allied offensive northward from Salonica.

This offensive was begun auspiciously on September 16, and has been proceeding each day since with constantly growing success. In the first two days of fighting, an important series of ridges west of Lake Dorian was taken, 3,000 prisoners were sent to the rear and the Allies captured 24 guns and much material. On the following day the prisoners were increased by 1,000, the captures of guns by 26, and the Bulgars were in full flight, being accompanied in their precipitate retreat by several detachments of German troops which had been sent in to stiffen the wavering line.

On September 17 and 18, the British and Greek troops eastward of Lake Dorian joined in the offensive and pushed their lines forward several miles, crossing the Cerna river and keeping pace with the French and Serbian units to the west. By the nineteenth more than forty villages had been recaptured and the advance was gaining in momentum. The Serbians, fighting for their homes, were irresistible. They took heavily fortified heights on which the enemy had spent thirty months of constant work. The Serbs literally swept forward, unleashed at last against the enemy, who could not stand against their righteous fury.

ON the western front, the forces of General Haig and General Pétain, having in last week's fighting worked their way forward to positions close to the German defensive works of the Hindenburg line, began the serious business of ousting Hindenburg's men from his famous line. General Mangin continued to nibble his way further and further eastward along the plateaus south of the Chemin des Dames and the St. Gobain Forest. He made steady progress against the most determined resistance. Every foot was bought and paid for, and the Germans paid a heavier price for losses than Mangin did for gains. Further north, General Debeney's men were nibbling also, but at the southern defenses of St. Quentin. On Wednesday, September 18, the British and French drove forward along the whole line from Meuvres to south of St. Quentin. They moved against the fire of massed German guns, against picked German troops who had been ordered not to give up another foot of ground; against positions which they themselves had made as strong as they could and which the Germans had further strengthened as an outer bulwark of the Hindenburg line. Every village, every house, every little clump of wood on three successive lines of ridges was a fortress from which wicked machine-gun fire raked the advancing Tommies and Poilus on front and flank; but one by one the defenses fell and before evening the Allied troops had crossed the whole trench system, formerly theirs, and were in touch with the outer defenses of the Hindenburg line. In several places these outer defenses were pierced. At Villerets and Lempire, north of St.

Quentin, and at Contescourt four miles southwest of the city, the Allied troops were astride the main defenses of the system.

The Germans on the evening of September 18 counter-attacked fiercely against the British both north and south of Meuvres. They concentrated the fire of forty batteries on a short front, and put down a barrage which might have been expected to smother all resistance, but their attacks resulted only in further losses. Although they drove through to the western outskirts of Meuvres and gained a footing in advanced elements of the British line here and there, these gains were only temporary. The whole British line was restored a few hours later and further advances registered.

In the Wœvre the German troops, driven out of the St. Mihiel salient fell back to the section of the Hindenburg line running from Etain to the Moselle north of Pagny. The week was given by the American army, largely to patrol actions, following the Germans back and keeping in touch with them, while the main body of the army dug in along a line from a mile and a half to two miles away from the German defenses. This wide "no man's land" was pretty well controlled by the American patrols who took prisoners daily. No attack was made during the week, but on the 20th, the fortress of Metz was reported under bombardment by American long range guns.

On September 20 the Serbian and French troops had extended their attack over a front of twenty-five miles, completely penetrating the Bulgarian defense line and advancing twenty-five miles from Veternik to Pasembey on the Cerna River southeast of Prilep. The total captures had reached 10,000, ten more guns had been taken, and the Serbian cavalry was pursuing the Bulgarians and cutting off their retreat. The British and Greek armies attacking on both sides of Lake Dorian met with obstinate resistance and lost some of their first gains under Bulgarian counter-attacks but retained possession of the Bulgarian first line over the entire front with greater penetration in places, the general advance being about 2,000 yards.

That Girl from Orchard Street

By
C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS

MARY ELLIS had lived the first twenty-one years of her life on Orchard Street, which lay in the slums of Westport, a suburban town, where her father, despite his occasional drinking spells, had amassed something of a competency through his blacksmith shop. Mary, as a girl, had acquired the manners and something of the reputation of the locality; then the fire of a new ideal awoke the finer nature within her. But the town, while it saw, did not believe. Then the war came, and she began to work for the Red Cross; and when the United States entered the war she joined the ranks of the ministrants to the boys who were going over to fight for the freedom of the world. So well did she do this that she was selected as one of those who were to go to France, much to the surprise of some of the very respectable society ladies of Westport, who had not considered her suitable company for their sons. The first night after her arrival in the French village of Printemps Vallée, she could not sleep, and at last walked out into the cool night air. There she saw, in a wrecked orchard, a man slip into the shadow of an apple tree. When she challenged him he showed the uniform of a French infantry officer, and, to her surprise, addressed her by name and in perfect English. Two days later the mysterious stranger appeared at the Red Cross headquarters, and she learned that he was Captain Jean Standish Renault, French by birth but American by ancestry. Her short conversation with him filled Mary Ellis with suspicion. That night she walked toward a barn-like building into which Captain Renault had disappeared after his conversation with her. While standing near the door she heard an exclamation in German and the next moment a man whom she recognized as Captain Renault leaped from the doorway. She rushed after him, when he addressed her in French and tried to escape, but she detained him and denounced him to two soldiers as a spy. One of the soldiers turned a flashlight on him, when it was seen that he was not Captain Renault. Leaving the false captain in the custody of the soldiers, Mary Ellis entered the barn, where she found the real Captain Renault with a bruised head and a broken arm.

CHAPTER VI

IT was two days before Jean Renault regained sufficient strength to speak, and then a lingering day passed before the doctor would allow him to attempt to tell of his encounter.

Finally, when the hush of evening had crept in through the windows, after he had slept away the afternoon, and had finished the soup that Mary Ellis fed him, he turned slowly on his side so that he might face her.

"The doctor told me this morning that you saved me—that you found me and have nursed me back to life."

"Yes—I am glad," she said simply.

They were silent, while one last sun ray crept in through the gathering gloom and fell as a bar of gold across the bed.

"You are very brave. Few women would have had the courage to do what you did."

"I don't think it was courage," she said after a minute. "I think it must have been something else. Later that night I trembled with fear."

"Was—was it that you cared?" he smiled, hesitating over the words.

She did not answer him.

"That night when I left you so abruptly—didn't you think it was strange? As we were walking along the road I happened to glance toward those deserted sheds, and, to my amazement, a bright light gleamed for an instant from a break in the foundation. I dared not tell you then, but I had to investigate at once."

"And you found your man—that man you were looking for?" Mary asked excitedly.

Jean laughed.

"Found him, yes; but others had to finish my work. It was a woman and some soldiers who really caught him, you know."

Mary Ellis looked at him quickly. Could it be that he did not know she had been responsible for the capture of the spy?

"I went into the building very carefully," the captain went on. "The door was partly opened—a suspicious fact, for I knew that the place had not been occupied since the last of the crops were harvested. As noiselessly as possible I crept about, but some creaking board must have betrayed me. Suddenly I felt that there was a person near me. We played cat and mouse for many minutes, and then suddenly he sprang at me from a point where I did not expect him. I can remember the noise he made as he jumped—and then I was here."

"The colonel says that he was one of the most dangerous men in all Germany."

"Yes," he smiled. "But even if he had gotten away with the papers I carried he would have caused no great danger."

"Yes—and now you must rest," Mary said quickly, for she noted that he was breathing excitedly.

"No—not yet. I have told you my part of the story; now before I rest tell me this—how was he caught? The doctor promised me that part of the story later. Surely you must know."

Mary did not reply.

"Please, won't you tell me—if I promise to lie here and listen—and not talk? Von Erdmann was brave and very, very shrewd; one would hardly imagine a weak link in his chain."

"I will tell you if first you will lie quiet for ten minutes."

The man sighed. "I promise."

MARY sat there and was thankful for the gathering twilight, for she knew that in ten minutes the room would be quite dark. It would be less embarrassing telling the story if the room was dark—and she could not see the light of his dark, flashing eyes.

"It is time," the captain announced. "I have counted six hundred, very slowly."

"I captured Von Erdmann," she said softly. "The weak link in his chain was what is sometimes called love."

"You! you captured him!" he shouted, raising himself on one elbow. "I might have known it was you."

"Please!" She ran to his side.

"Please be quite quiet! You will run into a fever and I shall be scolded as a poor nurse. Please be quiet!" She dropped on her knees beside the low cot and took his hand in her own.

"That night when you went across the fields so abruptly, it hurt me—it was as if you had told me that you loved me only to quiet me, to win my confidence. When I reached my room all the hatred in my heart made me swear that I would tell all I knew about you. Then suddenly I trusted you again—and I felt that I must be near you. Half mad with the hurt of my heart I went across the field to where I had seen you last. I stood beside the open door, summoning the courage to call to you when I heard a man's voice, speaking in German. Then a man's figure in an officer's cape came hurling past me. I thought it was you. I ran and stopped him, threatening to kill him if he did not stop. He fought me—and then the soldiers came. He called me an Englishwoman, and we knew by his mistake that he was an impostor. Then I went back and found you." She stopped. "And now you must be quiet—you must not talk any more."

For some space of time she knelt there. Then he carried her hand to his lips with the unbandaged arm. "And the weak link was love!" he said dreamily.

Later, when she had moved across the room and lit a candle, thinking him asleep, he turned heavily and spoke to her.

"You said that he spoke in German? Did you understand German?"

"Yes, perfectly, even better than I understand and speak French."

After a time he spoke again.

"Then, perhaps—perhaps you might do the mission."

CHAPTER VII

IT was several days before Mary Ellis learned what the captain had meant by his good-night remark about her being able to undertake a mission. Being young, and having lived much in the open, Jean Renault's splendid body reacted from the physical strain under which he had been placed, and had it not been for his broken arm, and the quickly healing scar on the back of his head, he would, at the end of a week, have been in perfect health. As it was he refused to be nursed any longer, and Mary Ellis went back to her work in the basement of the little church.

She was putting away her sewing materials at the end of a busy afternoon when the captain came down the stone steps which led to her work room and without more than a nod of greeting seated himself on a low stool near the door. Once or twice he started to speak, but stopped; and Mary, busy, and seeing his wish for uninterrupted thought, went quietly on with her duties.

When she had finished she stood before him.

"Shall we go home now?"

"Home? There are times when I wonder if I shall ever know a home again. When I wonder—" He spoke bitterly, and then he stopped.

"Oh, cheer up. You know the spring is coming, and soon there will be peace. Why, some day we shall be looking back on this all as a horrible dream."

He nodded.

"Those of us that are left," he said presently.

"Ho, but you're in too black a mood. Come out into the sunshine. It will be dusk in half an hour. We will walk."

He shook his head.

"When you said the other night that you knew German perfectly, do you mean it? Do you really know perfectly?"

"Yes, perfectly. Half of Orchard Street was of German extraction, the rest of Irish. Round on Liberty street there were Italians and Poles. I never learned their language," she laughed.

He rose, paced the floor, and stopped before her.

"Mary Ellis, how much do you love me? How much do you love France America? Would you—would you chance dying for my honor?"

"Dying for your honor?" she repeated. "I don't understand."

"For more than three years I have served France as few men can serve her. I have been to Berlin four times. I have been across the fighting lines hundreds of times. I can't go across the lines now—this broken arm is too great a handicap—yet some one has to go."

"And you want me to go for you?" The words reached a shrill crescendo as the excitement went surging over the girl.

"No, no; I don't want you to go. Do you suppose I want you to be exposed to danger—to death? For some one must go—tonight. All the time I have been here I have had message for some one in Germany that must be delivered within the next few days—hours if possible—and there is no one, not even in Paris, that I can trust. There are men, and even women who might do the work, but they are not available. The duty was given me. I must carry it through. Every day I wait may make useless all the work that has been done. Then, Von Erdmann may not have been working alone. I shall be attacked again. But—I can't let you go; can't." His jaw snapped shut, his face set with a grimness that was akin to pain.

MARY ELLIS smiled coolly. She was all American, with Irish stock back of her, and in her blood surged the quick spirit of adventure.

"Tell me more about it," she commanded.

"It's food, Mary Ellis, food. Germany has plenty of munitions; she might fight us for years and a decision not be reached on the battle-field, so long as she has food for her army, food for her munition workers. Come, and he went to the door and flung it open. "Come up these steps with me."

She followed him, and when they had reached the road he waved toward the open fields.

"This land you see, these fields so mercifully covered by the snow, is the finest of all France. All of France together does not average more than twelve or thirteen hundredweight of wheat to a hectare,* while here in the north of France our Picardy farms often raise thirty-five hundredweight of grain to the hectare. Back of the cursed German lines are five million acres of the best land of France. Five million acres—and Germany is cultivating the land up to the very edge of her trenches. Think of it! She has over fifty million hundredweight of grain—from our own land—and the

*A hectare of land is equivalent to about two and one-half acres of American soil. The French measurement of grain is by the hundredweight, not by the bushel.

HIS MOTHER

THEY call him their lieutenant, they, his comrades,
Who heaped with flowers the raw clay of his grave;
They glory in his deeds of gallant daring—
They speak of him as bravest of the brave;
I have the letter that his captain wrote me,
I treasure too the gleaming cross of gold;
But I, his mother, can not mourn the soldier—
I mourn the little boy I used to hold.

Oh, think not that I held him back from duty,
Nor would if it were mine again to choose.
I thrill with pride in his undaunted spirit,
Which grieved that he had but one life to lose.
But oh, my eyes are weary with their straining
For one more vision of those curls of gold,
And all night long my empty arms are aching
To clasp the little boy I used to hold.

and is being worked for Germany by French prisoners. By soldiers, by men, women and children she carried from this devastated land when her hordes came down from the north."

His voice died away until it was almost a sob. For fully a minute either of them spoke.

"And—I can help—in some way?"

He nodded.

"You might—some one must go."

"Behind the lines—I would gladly make my chances for my cause—for you."

He smiled wanly.

"I don't want you to go. It is not that I would call a dangerous mission, but there is always the chance that you may never come back. But then here in France we have learned to part with a smile and a kiss—perhaps forever."

"We both believe in the hereafter."

"Yes—and its reward. Mary, some one must reach Professor Bonheur within the next two or three days. Perhaps you never heard of the Professor—but the Germans have. Over in America there is a man named Burbank—Luther Burbank. Well, the Professor was the Luther Burbank of Northern France. When the Germans drove down across our land they took him prisoner. He is working for them."

"He is a tall, slender man, with long features like your Indians have. He is very straight in spite of his leaning over a chemist's table; and often when you are speaking to him he gazes off over your shoulder as if he did not hear. For years past even his neighbors have called him crazy—a man with no intelligence save in his own chosen work. And the Professor has let them think him partially insane—at first so that he might not be interrupted by the curious—since his captivity because it seemed to him that an insane man might have more freedom, more chance to aid France."

"And he has done it?" Mary Ellis cried.

"In a measure, yes. He started to gain favor by giving the German government, apparently absent-mindedly, two or three very valuable points about fruit cultivation; then he showed them a process for quickly refining beet sugar—a very good process—the only drawback being that there are not enough sugar beets to make it of great value. He won their confidence easily, and this winter he is working on a wonderful new fertilizer. It will make the most parched land of value, and they are going to use it on the fields of Northern France." Jean Renault stopped, an amused light in his eyes.

"Naturally. Several months ago I received word by way of one of our men in Germany that the professor wanted to see me. He is living quite unguarded in a château about twenty miles north of the Lorraine sector that your American boys have taken over. The Germans are so sure of his semi-idiotcy that they allow him unwarranted freedom. I had an easy time reaching the professor. I'll tell you how and why later. His plan was to put into the new fertilizer he would discover some ingredient that would harm the land—but not permanently. Something that would spoil only this year's crop. He knew what he wanted in a general way, but had no opportunity to experiment with ingredients that the other scientists about him would know to possess the opposite effect than that of fertilization."

"Then I left him, and got back into France by way of Switzerland. It was all so very easy. I went first to the head of my Bureau in Paris, and then to a great Italian scientist, both extraordinarily capable men and to be absolutely trusted. The Italian worked steadily for nearly five months, and now the process is complete."

"All but the reporting to Professor Bonheur."

"Exactly. All that must be done now is to reach the professor and repeat a simple formula. There is a chance of being caught, of course—more of a chance in getting back from Germany than in getting over. If it were not for my wretched arm I could do it easily."

"I wonder," she said aloud, "if I ever will cross that threshold again."

MARY ELLIS was silent for many minutes.

"And there is really no one else that you could send? No other man?"

"Yes,—there are half a dozen capable of the trip, but they are not here. I have been waiting impatiently for days hoping that one of them would return from his work in other quarters, and I can wait no longer; someone must go now."

"There is another point. How did the man I captured know you had a secret?"

"Because I purposely let it be known in certain sections that I had flown over into Germany. I talked airplanes, and then more about airplanes. I visited the various big plane factories. I was trying to throw them on a false track. He thought I had information of the air. He was not sure—for he had even stopped to read the papers he took from me."

"He had?"

"Yes, and found them of no value—just one or two worthless maps, and a love sonnet, which he thought was a code. I know this, for the colonel found the sealed envelope taken from my tunic torn open."

"Perhaps that's why he mumbled 'Etwas ist los' as he ran from the building."

"Perhaps; at any rate I have the formula here," and he tapped his forehead.

"It all sounds rather simple," she said after a pause. "Though I do not yet understand the details. I am stupid."

"Or overwhelmed," he added.

"Possibly both. What time do I start—and how?"

He laughed.

"You are typically American. I did not say positively that you could go."

SHE turned to him quickly.

"I am going," she said simply, with great force in her words. "Please—there must be some preliminaries. Tell me first about the professor—why was it easy to reach him?"

"Because he is insane!" He smiled brightly at the thought. "One of the first habits the professor formed was walking nightly in the grounds about the château. The place is one of the finest homes in the Vosges hills. The house is built in the center of a great pine wood, and about the edge of the wood runs a brick walk."

"At first they guarded the professor as he walked, but they stopped that over a year ago. He is so harmless, he walks round and round the brick walk at the edge of the park—always whistling a silly little ballad that was popular a few years ago, 'Un peu d'amour—A Little Love, a Little Kiss.' He hummed the tune."

Mary Ellis laughed.

"We even sang that on Orchard Street."

"Yes, and he whistles it as he walks. Sometimes he stops and talks with himself, repeats formulas, asks questions, answers. Professor Bonheur is very clever."

"It should be very easy to reach him."

"It is—if one is experienced in stealth."

"I can learn. Tell me more. When do I leave? Give me some instructions. There must be many things for me to learn."

"There are," he said gravely. "I shall have to think, and then write out your instructions. You will have to learn them carefully and completely. Go to your room now. I shall call there in half an hour." He parted with her abruptly, and set out across the fields toward the barracks. Once, when he was a hundred yards away, he stopped, and looked back over his shoulder. Mary Ellis could see the emotion that filled him, knew by the grim line of his mouth that he was fighting to make up his mind whether or not she should carry the message to Bonheur.

Then she went back to the little schoolroom, gave one swift glance in all directions to see that the place was neat, and went out, closing the door tightly behind her. At the top of the small flight of stone steps she paused and looked back.

"I wonder," she said aloud, "if I ever will cross that threshold again."

A SHEAFFER Pen in the Christmas box to your soldier or sailor would surely please him

For, here is a pen that is built for hard service. Writes the instant the point touches paper—gives a smooth, even flow as long as a drop of ink remains in the tube. Never skips, blots, floods or sweats. May be carried in any position with no danger of leakage. The clip at top of cap enables the pen to fit entirely into the pocket—prevents loss. The lever filler simplifies refilling—fits flush with the barrel. Have your dealer show you these SHEAFFER features.

Questions and Answers

NR. Dayton, O., writes to ask if we are justified in praying for our enemies, and if we should forgive them, even though they show no sign of repentance. The Scripture is clear on this point. As Christians, we are justified in praying for all who stand in need of repentance, and we may even pray for the unrepentant, and implore that they may be led to realize their sin and seek divine forgiveness. There has been at different times much discussion concerning the example of forgiveness set by Jesus himself. On the cross he prayed: "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." This passage some have held to apply only to the soldiers and the populace who were sinning in ignorance and unwittingly; but the best interpretation is that it was the expression of the boundless love and pity of the Saviour for all of his enemies, and not meant even to exclude the arch-plotter in whose hands the soldiers and populace were merely tools. Complete and unconditional forgiveness is a prerogative of Deity, and ought to stir in us a noble admiration and emulation. Nevertheless, there are many passages in the Bible which clearly show that forgiveness is conditional upon repentance. In Scripture the emphasis is laid upon repentance, but the spirit of forgiveness must always be present in our own hearts. Repentance is commended to all, and Christ, who came to call sinners to repentance, taught that it was necessary to the pardon of sin. Matt. 4:17, Mark 1:15.

A. N. P., Pepin, Wis. What is the date of the oldest complete manuscript of the Old Testament and oldest part of the Old Testament in manuscript form, and where are they kept?

The original Scriptures, prepared by inspired men, were written by hand on skins and papyrus. Of these original manuscripts not a single one is in existence, nor has there been for hundreds of years; but before these original manuscripts were lost or destroyed copies had been made of them. Some assert that the Pentateuch was preserved for years after the death of Moses and then was either destroyed or lost when the temple was destroyed. It was restored from copies carried away by the Jewish exiles, and other sacred things were added from time to time during and after the days of Ezra. There were early revisers of the sacred Hebrew literature, with headquarters in Tiberias and Babylon, who decided the correct readings. It was customary, when a manuscript had become worn and faint through much handling, to make new copies and destroy the old, and whenever a manuscript became worn by use in the synagogue it was replaced by a new one and the old one was buried that it might not be profaned by coming into the possession of Gentiles. Hence the oldest Old Testament manuscripts now in existence are several centuries younger than our oldest New Testament manuscripts. The oldest specimen of Old Testament writing of any considerable size is either the St. Petersburg Codex of the prophets, dated 916 A.D., or a British Museum manuscript copy of the Pentateuch, which is claimed by some to be at least half a century older.

W. D., Birch Tree, Mo. The "children of light," who as the apostle says "are not in darkness," need no special sign of the Lord's coming, for they are ever prepared against that event. Hence the day will not overtake them as a thief. The true attitude is one of prayer and preparation. There is a special warning against giving heed to alarmists who assume to foretell the event. It is his secret, and we ought to be willing to wait in patience and hope that it will be brought to pass in his own good time.

M. L. S., Hazelton, Pa. We cannot undertake to advise on such matters.

Mrs. J. M. M., Wagoner, Ariz. It is unavailing for one to say he trusts in Christ when at heart he doubts him. Mingle and worship with those who have the "joy of the Lord" for their strength, and you will find the contact will help you to trust the Saviour. He has blessed them, and the richness of their blessings will overflow on your own soul. Ask God's help that you may turn resolutely away from sin, and avoid all forms of worldliness that might hinder your spiritual life or your usefulness. Pray sincerely for forgiveness and then believe, once and for all, in the promise of full and free pardon to the repentant soul, and that he will keep you from falling back into sin in the future if you ask him. Determine to get right with God and go resolutely forward until you find the place where you can and do trust him fully in all things.

Ida M. C., Washington, Pa. 1. See Matt. 10:2-4 for the names of the apostles. 2. See Gen. 29:31-35 and Gen. 30 for the names of the sons of Jacob. 3. The names of the judges of Israel are Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah, Gideon, Abimelech, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ithzan, Elon, Abdon, Samson, Eli, Samson. 4. Read Exodus, chapters 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12, for a list of the Egyptian plagues.

C. H. E., Globe, Ariz. The whole matter is fully discussed in Dr. Gray's articles in the Christian Herald.

Mrs. E. B. C., Wagner, S. D. In constructing their genealogical tables, the Jews reckoned wholly by males. When the line passed to the grandson, through a daughter, the daughter herself was not named, but her husband was counted as the son of the maternal grandfather. This explains how Joseph, son of Jacob, who married Mary, daughter of Heli, is counted in the genealogy as Heli's son.

Reader, Ravenna, Ohio. Tamar, the mother of Phares, was not of the house of Abraham. She was presumably a descendant of Canaan, the grandson of Noah. Abraham, on the other hand, was a Chaldean descendant of Shem in the ninth generation.

Private J. P. We cannot discuss the pros and cons of the fraternal order to which you refer. We know nothing of its practices. We do know, however, of very many earnest Christians, including some prominent clergymen, who are members, and who would not knowingly be connected with anything of a doubtful character.

E. T. Hassell, Erin, Tenn., R. F. D. 1, a veteran of the Civil War, writes to ask if any reader of this paper can send him the address of Henry W. Milles, formerly of Jacksonville, Fla., a Confederate veteran.

"One in Doubt," St. Louis, Mo. You need a new consecration. See your pastor and open your mind to him frankly on the whole matter. Get him to make you acquainted with some good Christian members of his church. Then you should try, with their aid, to become personally interested in some form of Christian service which will lift you out of your own troubles. Christianity isn't a mere profession; it is a life. Don't theorize and fret any more. Trust in God's judgment for all your doubts and fears. Pray for more faith. The fact that you are troubled in conscience about your condition is in itself evidence that the Holy Spirit is striving with you to call you back to your allegiance. If you ask forgiveness, in all sincerity and in the name of Jesus, you may be sure it will not be withheld.

Mr. George Tesher writes us that the Ebenezer Prayer Watch has its headquarters at Macon, Ga.

W. H. W., Rochester, N. Y., for many years a member of the Christian Herald Family, writes that he has a friend who, whenever he happens to hear the name of God or of the Redeemer taken in vain or blasphemously, immediately repeats some of the well-known titles: "Our Blessed Redeemer, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, the One Altogether Lovely, the Chiefest among Ten Thousand, the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world, the Bright Morning Star, Mighty to Save, Wonderful Saviour, Counselor, Intercessor, Prince of Peace," adding these words, "Forgive them, for they know not what they do." This little service has brought great peace to the one who renders it, and been a source of blessing to him for years. He recommends it to other loyal Christian workers.

Mrs. F. M. H., Iowa. The War Risk Insurance Bureau is sending government receipts to beneficiaries as fast as it is possible to do so. If you do not receive these papers in due time, you should communicate with the Division of Military and Naval Insurance War Risk Insurance Bureau, Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. J. H. P., Ontario, Can. 1. The question involved is controversial. 2. The parable which Christ had been telling (Matt. 20:16) illustrates the principle which will govern the calling of individuals and nations. It should serve as an encouragement to some and a solemn warning to others. The admonition was intended, first, for the apostles, especially for Peter; then for Jewish Christians, to warn them against a wrong attitude toward Gentile converts; and lastly for all Christians who love the Saviour and his work. The Lord, who alone can read the heart, will do the choosing and give the reward. 3. See the articles of Dr. Gray in the Christian Herald for a full explanation of the word "generation," in its application to the signs of the times.

L. M. W., Crewe, Va. Though the Bible is silent as to where and how Christ spent the years of his life between the ages of twelve and thirty, we may read between the lines that he spent them in preparation for the work before him. Jesus, being subject to human conditions and limitations, so far as his divine nature could be subjected, was trained and educated like other Jewish boys. His consciousness of his divine nature and mission developed gradually. Although one cannot trace with any degree of precision the various stages of development of this consciousness, it is evident from the Gospel record that it must have begun early, and gradually increased to complete appreciation as manhood approached. We are told that even in childhood he "grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom," and the "grace of God was upon him" (Luke 2:40). In youth we find him questioning and expounding to the rabbis in the temple and "increasing in stature and in wisdom and favor with God and man." His wonderful knowledge, his amazing questions and his discerning answers to the elders must have become more and more accentuated during the passage of these early years, and we may gather that Mary had already premonitions of the future career of her Divine Son, since she pondered over and "hid all these things in her heart." There are indications that seem to warrant the conclusion that, long before the opening of his public ministry, Jesus was absorbed by the thought of the mission to which he was destined. He knew his Father's business and did it, and he frequented his Father's house. His life and surroundings in Nazareth brought him in contact with a simple, earnest people and with sorrow and suffering. These were years of character building and development. They bore fruit when the time was ripe for his public ministry and prepared him for the baptism at John's hands. This was the last act of his private life and the first that marked the beginning of his public mission, when the heavenly voice proclaimed him as the "Beloved Son" and the Baptist bore record that he was the Son of God.

Ida M. C., De Soto, Wis. The chronologica references found on the margin of many Bible are believed to have been the work of Bishop Ussher, a prelate of the Irish Church, who lived in the sixteenth century and was a famous authority on Bible history. Taking the year A.D. as his point of departure, he reckoned backward in Bible History, and his calculations are given, not as authoritative, but as mere helps to Bible study. The Bible itself fixes no date for creation. Later revelation in the form of monuments, inscriptions, etc., have shown the fallacy of useless computations.

Subscriber. It is not an easy matter to advise, as the game laws vary in different states. We know that Australia is dealing with the rabbit pest problem by vigorous methods. They offer to purchase 21,000,000 rabbit-skin from farmers, ranchers, and others. The flesh will be added to the food supply to help with the war. There may be a suggestion here for those states in which rabbits abound.

Rev. J. W. Shearer, referring to the recent discussion in the Mail-Bag of versified morning and evening prayers, sends us the following:

A Morning Prayer

As I awake from restful sleep,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep.
Obedient, faithful, true and strong
To fight temptation, do no wrong;
So that I may, throughout this day,
In all I do, in aught I say,
Still walk the straight and narrow way,
And if death come while I'm awake
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to take;
All which I ask for Jesus' sake.

An Evening Prayer

As now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep—
To grant just what thou seest is best
Throughout the unconscious hours of rest.
My body, too, with strength renew
Thy will to do, as I anew
The duties of the day pursue.
To keep thy glory first in view;
And if I should die before I wake,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to take,
All this I ask for Jesus' sake.

Mr. Shearer advises that he regards his verse suitable for any age. He has found them helpful at 77.

The Handwriting on the Wall

STUDENTS of Daniel are, of course, familiar with Clermont-Ganneau's rendering of the handwriting on the wall, "a mina, a mina, a shekel, a half-mina," and most of us would agree, no doubt, with Archdeacon Farrar ("Expositors' Bible") that "there still remain some obviously unexplored mysteries about these words." But just a step further—just around the corner, as it were—we come upon a new vista.

Two and a half minas and a shekel, reduced to the lowest terms, at 50 shekels a mina and 20 gerahs a shekel, make 2520 gerahs. Now, 2520 is in itself an interesting number, for it is the least common multiple of the digits; but occurring in Daniel, it is especially noteworthy and suggestive, because it is the number of the prophetic seven times, whose half is the "1260 days" of Daniel and Revelation. It carries a strong suggestion of time, therefore, which, in such a setting as this, is altogether confirmed by its use with gerah; for, except in Ezekiel's tables of weights and measures, gerah is found in the Bible only in those passages of the books of the Law that have to do with fixing the redemption price of the first-born, the bekor. Association of ideas brings to mind the combination gerah-bekor, which, in turn, by that favorite method of the prophets, a play on the words through similarity of sound, suggests the peculiar ghereb-bokker, or "evening-mornings" of Daniel 8:21. (This expression is erroneously transliterated in English "ereb-bokker"; but in this word the initial ayin is hard, as in Gomorrah, and sounds like gh.)

2520 gerahs is, therefore, a measure of time, and its discovery assures us that the hand of God wrote with a larger purpose than the twelfth hour warning of Belshazzar and his drunken lords. The scene becomes prophetic, and to the antitype of Babylon, to the last great world-power represented by the iron-clay feet of the image, whose golden head was the symbol of the Chaldean monarchy, to the final alliance of all the forces of evil, temporal and spiritual, is transferred the menace of the seer's interpretation, "numbered, numbered, weighed, divided."

But what is the length of this measure of time—is it 2520 years? The "process of the suns" has sifted out all lesser meanings, and the event itself confirms the year-day interpretation. Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin was written on the walls of Belshazzar's palace the very night his kingdom came to its end; and now, at the very end of the time it indicates, having been "shut up and sealed until the time of the end," in strictest self-fulfilment, is disclosed the hidden meaning of those mystic words, their time-index of 2520 years. For it was exactly 2520 years ago, in the year 603 B. C., the second year of his reign, that Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream the vision of the image of gold and silver and brass and iron and clay. Is this a mere coincidence?

The full development of the Second Empire of Babylon dates from the destruction of its great rival, Nineveh, in 607 B.C.; and it was just 2520 years later that the great war burst upon us—a conflict, as we now perceive, not only the mightiest but the most momentous in history; a conflict in which the alignment of forces and sympathies is most significant—and who will say that this, too, is a mere coincidence?

Nebuchadnezzar, the scourge of the chosen people, came to the throne in 604 B.C., and that same year he brought to Babylon his first Jewish captives, among them the prophet Daniel. It was 2520 years after that beginning of the desolation of Jerusalem and 1280 years after Omar's Abomination of Desolation, or in the year of our Lord 1917 and of the Hegira 1335 (cf. Dan. 12:12), that a British expedition set out from Egypt, committed to the accomplishment of the hope of the Zionists.

The conclusion of the whole matter is not yet, but already the Holy City has been delivered from the Turk, surrendered on the day of the Feast of Dedication; and we remember the words of the Master, Luke 21:24: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The inference "is certain and the interpretation sure"—mene, mene, tekel, upharsin is written once again and finally upon the walls of organized wrong.

Picking Men by Sample

A FEW months ago six seniors of Cornell College, Mount Vernon, Iowa, sent one of their number to Chicago to find "the shortest road to France." The six were picked athletes, and when their representative presented himself at the recruiting station of the Tank Corps, he was asked only one question: "Are the others like you?" "They are." "We'll take all six." As a result of this trip Don Starry, O. W. Sterner, Northrop Winter, Cleinent A. Sones, Cotton Etter and Karl C. Smith found themselves in the latter part of July at Camp Colt, Gettysburg, the only training camp for the Tank Corps in the United States. Dr. Charles W. Flint, D.D., LL.D., president of Cornell College, appeared one hot July morning at the Gettysburg War Camp Community Service. "I would like," he said, "as the head and accredited representative of a college in Iowa, to find six of our undergraduates so that I can graduate them. They're enlisted men in the Tank Corps out at Camp Colt. I have until four-thirty this afternoon, when I'm going back to Iowa. Please make the arrangements. That's all. Thanks. Good-bye." The Community Organizer got busy, and that afternoon the diplomas were formally awarded in front of Pennsylvania Hall with appropriate ceremonies, songs and informal talks. Dr. Charles W. Flint, who handed the boys their diplomas, was pastor for five years of the New York Avenue Methodist Church of Brooklyn, and for four years pastor of the First Methodist Church of Middletown, Conn. Cornell College has fourteen men in the Tank Service, and 400 men in uniform.

A Difficult Meat Problem

MAJOR-GENERAL GOETHALS, Chief of the Division of Purchase, Storage and Traffic of the General Staff of the Army, has commissioned Arthur A. Hammerschlag, president of the Carnegie Institute, and Lieutenant Colonel J. W. McIntosh, Subsistence Division, Q.M.C., N.A., to cooperate with the Chicago packers in experiments which may save up to 40 per cent. of the tremendous cargo space now required for shipping fresh beef. President Hammerschlag and Colonel McIntosh have already reached the stoe kyards and the experiments have begun. The experiments contemplate not only the conservation of shipping space (fresh beef constitutes a considerable part of some 350,000,000 pounds of beef and pork products now sent monthly to Allied countries), but also the problem of having the packages small enough to be handled by the labor available at unloading ports overseas, and the quick and convenient issue at supply depots in France. They range from the mere cutting of the carcass into more convenient sizes and shapes to the entire boning of the carcass to be packed in boxes. It is estimated that if the plans prove practicable, a saving of from 15 to 40 per cent. of the room now used in transporting the same amount of beef will be made possible.

The chief difficulties encountered so far have been the necessity of obtaining enough labor sufficiently skilled in this particular work and the providing of facilities necessary to handle the quantities required without interfering with production of other meat products being prepared for our armies and those of our allies.

Abram Helping Lot

International Sunday School Lesson for October 13

Gen. 13:5-11 and 14:14-16

Family Loyalty

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

LET us take our new study of Genesis from a new angle. Today, for example, we have brought together two selections that show Abraham's generous sense of family loyalty. First in giving Lot his choice in the division of the pasture-land of Canaan and afterward in hastening to the rescue when Lot fell a prisoner to the marauding Bedouin of the East, we see Abraham the Unselfish. Let us not think today of Lot's choice, with its exhibition of selfishness and folly, but of Abraham the generous, the loyal. Lot was his brother's child and his special ward. Abraham's fine sense of honor made him offer to Lot all the advantages when the time came when the inheritance must be shared, though Abraham was the sheik, and the promises were to him.

It is a new emphasis on an old virtue, family loyalty. The Bible in both Testaments exalts it. The Hebrews are famed to this day for the care they take of their relatives, for their kindness to the aged and the orphaned of their blood: Paul, you remember, wrote to Timothy, "If any provide not for his own, and specially of his own household, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an unbeliever." That is putting it straight from the shoulder: A Christian without family loyalty is worse than an infidel!

Giving Brothers and Sisters the Best

In the Sunday school we sometimes neglect to teach such homely and simple truths as this: We must give our brothers and our sisters the best, even as Christ, our Elder Brother, keeps the best for his younger and weaker brethren. You have probably heard the sweet story of the "little mother" of twelve years who was lugging about a great fat baby in her arms. A sympathetic passer-by stopped and asked her if her burden were not dreadfully heavy. "Heavy!" she responded. "Why, he's my brother." She was surprised even at the suggestion that carrying one's own flesh and blood should be thought heavy work!

I recently heard another true story of family loyalty. A fine young Christian woman capable of great things intellectually was unable through family needs to go to college. After several years of work she had saved enough for a year of study. But then her younger brother was ready to enter the university, and remembering her own disappointment she could not see him denied an education. She cheerfully gave him all her savings. Later she made a happy marriage with an ambitious young man, and within a short time went to work again in order to put her own husband through medical school! She has missed something of formal class-room work and training, but who will deny that she is a true educator, and who shall say that the discipline of unselfish loyalty has not made her greater of soul than countless wearers of collegiate degrees?

In one of our young people's weeklies there was told an incident of a remarkably popular young college girl. On a certain beautiful afternoon the talk ran upon mottoes and watchwords for life. A number were quoted, and several girls told of helpful sayings that they had adopted as slogans for their own careers. Finally this beloved favorite gave hers. It was homely in phrase and of disputed grammatical correctness, but it explained a successful and happy life. It was "Me last!" The very secret of Jesus' teaching and the example of Abraham here are in that simple word.

Many a home is made miserable by petty quarrels among the children, while others are delightful as toys are shared and good things passed around, and no one would think of grasping a pleasure for self alone or of devouring sweets in a corner. The unselfish are apt to grow wise as well. Read again in Exodus of Miriam's care for the baby Moses, when he floated down the Nile in the little ark of bulrushes. Love is thoughtful.

Nothing ruins happiness quicker than discord at home, for there at least we look for peace and love and cooperation. Still there come to one family after another times of testing. One of these comes when the family pocket-book ceases to be a unity, and the growing young people want to handle their own money. Not all the older people are as generous as Abraham, but fortunately not all the youths are as grasping as Lot! Money is our modern equivalent of pasture-lands and flocks. It takes much grace and wisdom to decide just what is fair and right. I do not think Abraham was fairly treated, but I like his spirit: "Let there be no strife." It is better to give in and to accept temporary injustices than to quarrel. Family love and family loyalty alone can keep life sweet in settling problems like these.

"Let There Be No Strife"

I know of a Christian home where four young people are out earning a living, and mother and aunt keeping the house. An old man who works about the garden and in the house said recently, "I never saw such a household of peace!" He went on to say that his own children undoubtedly loved him, but there was nothing but row after row in their house. The secret lay in unselfishness and true Christlikeness of spirit.

"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." In order to achieve this blessing, some one must be ready to make sacrifices, to forego pleasures, to put self last. That one receives the greater blessing! We see it in our lesson, where the Scriptures portray God speaking anew in blessing to his servant Abraham immediately after his generous settlement with Lot. All the land, what he gave as well as what he kept, is truly his in God's sight. Though Lot had clutched at a temporary advantage, Abraham should be known and remembered in the future, and those who were like Abraham should inherit the earth. Blessed are the meek, that is, those who avoid strife and seek to serve and to be a blessing.

Abraham to the Rescue

With all his selfish worldly wisdom Lot soon was in trouble. It is strange after all how frequently the man who "looks out for number one" does get into hot water! Lot's riches were among those coveted by the robber chiefs, and his town was plundered and he and his loved ones carried into captivity. But how quickly his Uncle Abraham came to his aid. Lot's selfishness and readiness to seize upon an advantage were forgotten. Abraham and his trained servants rescued the victims of the raid swiftly. Well, one can easily imagine that such a character as Abram's would rally loyal and intrepid followers. His family and friends would actually make better fighters than those of a grasping miser. And the chapter closes with Abraham declining a share in the despoiled goods of his neighbors which he had salvaged, but in the same breath asking fair play for his associates in the expedition. Here was a real man.

History multiplies examples of ready help in need from kindred and neighbors. But the best of all are only known to God and treasured up in the Lamb's book of life. Your class might like to notice how Paul, who surely practiced his own teaching about earning for our own, was rescued by his nephew, his own sister's son, when the fanatical Jews plotted to assassinate him (Acts 23). Some of us have seen a man take his very last dollar, take the savings of years that were to have bought a home, to redeem a foolish boy or girl from disgrace. Many of us know now of boys who are denying themselves in order to support a widowed mother and little brothers and sisters dependent on their care. What a real sacrifice and denial it is to eager young Americans only those who have been in a like position can know. Perhaps Jesus waited till he was nearly thirty to begin his public work because of some such reason. At all events, as the sacred narrative tells us, he returned obediently to Nazareth and his parents, and "was subject unto them."

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Buchman Evangelistic Conference at Nara, Japan

A NEW light has risen in the East. May it shine and brighten every corner of this land. From the fourteenth to the eighteenth of June a company of thirty-odd Japanese and missionaries met in Nara to hear the message of the Rev. F. N. D. Buchman—a message which is proving revolutionary in the religious world in China.

This message is not a new religion nor a new Gospel—not even a new method of work or a new power. It is just a new emphasis on some old truths and principles. Mr. Buchman's message may be summed up in the one word, "Personalization." He tells us that we need to get away from "things" to "men"; from the crowd to the one; from the great public meeting to the personal interview; from an institutionalized Christianity to a personalized Christianity.

In his work in China Mr. Buchman's aim has been to try to make every minister and every Christian a successful worker for the salvation of the individuals with whom he may come in touch. His first problem is not the non-Christian, but the nominal Christian and the powerless worker. His thesis is that every Christian should be a miracle-worker; that every Christian can do individual work that leads to conversion. Sin in our hearts and lives is the one thing that keeps us from being miracle-workers. Confession of sin on the part of the worker is often the beginning of power to win men to Christ.

How has this principle worked out in China? In fifteen cities in China bands of Christians met together for heart-searching, confession and prayer. Most of these were fruitless Christians and powerless workers. At the close of each of these series of preparatory meetings the members of all the groups in a city were gathered in a general meeting, but admittance to this general meeting was granted only to those who brought each another nominal Christian. Several weeks later in each of these cities Dr. Sherwood Eddy delivered his stirring message. His meetings were not advertised and the public was not invited; and each of these prepared Christians could get admittance only when he came bringing one unbelieving friend. One Y. M. C. A. director and several pastors who failed to bring their men were turned away at the door. Thus each audience was made up of one-half Christian workers and the other half inquirers for whom these Christians were individually responsible. The results in every case surpassed the most sanguine hopes of all.

Some of the fruits of this new "personalized evangelism" are as follows:

New power and joy in the hearts of many workers through confession and cleansing.

An organized band of soul-winners in every church, constituting a permanent evangelistic force.

A vast number of men and women added to the churches, each young Christian with a definite spiritual sponsor.

Pastors tell us frankly that the church in Japan has "iti-tsumatta," it has run into a stone wall. Does not Mr. Buchman bring us back to first principles, and point out the path of future progress and victory?

This Buchman Conference at Nara was brought there by Mr. Horace Coleman, Sunday School Educational Secretary for Japan. It was financed, as have been the other Conferences, out of a fund for evangelistic promotion in the Orient. It is really a part of a laymen's evangelistic movement which is spreading over the Orient, and aims to vitalize the Christian experience of the native laymen and make of each man a personal evangelist.

A few years ago in India a week of evangelism was observed throughout the churches. Christian men and women, other than the paid workers, were enlisted in a house-to-house and village-by-village campaign that brought in thousands of converts.

The movement spread to China. A week of evangelism was observed there. Laymen were brought together for special prayer and trained to go out with a message of salvation.

And then Mr. Buchman came from America with his call for the "personalized evangelism." With the backing of the leading Christian agencies in China a campaign was instituted in the leading cities of China to arouse pastors, laymen and Sunday school workers to the importance of personal experience and personal work. These meetings were transferred to Japan, and the Nara Conference held. And now it is planned to take them to Korea and help that great church to do still greater things in the coming years.

CALORIC

Pipeless Heating

Wireless and Pipeless

When Marconi announced his invention of the Wireless Telegraph, thousands doubted his sanity. "No man can use the air to take the place of a telegraph wire," they said. Soon, however, messages were encircling the world without the use of wires.

When The Monitor Stove Company announced that it had perfected a furnace which would heat the home more uniformly and economically than ever before and without the use of pipes, many people said it could not be done. Today the message of Caloric comfort has been heard and heeded around the world.

Marconi and Caloric have safeguarded the lives of men and their property by making use of relatively simple natural laws. Both have accomplished remarkable results through inventions which are protected by patents.

PIPELESS
CALORIC

has revolutionized the heating of homes, churches and business buildings. Instead of using numerous heat-wasting pipes and registers, it heats by Nature's Method, utilizing the gentle air currents and distributing balmy, healthful warmth to every room. It does this with only one register and no pipes, thereby making possible unequalled fuel economy, comfort and cleanliness. More than 50,000 successful installations have proved that the Caloric system of heating is the most adaptable and efficient for the average type of building. Hundreds of Caloric users in all parts of the country have written convincing testimonials in which they tell us of the great satisfaction this furnace has brought them.

The Caloric is sold under our Monitor Ironclad Guarantee, which insures the purchaser of a uniformly and economically heated home. Our ninety-nine years of experience in the manufacture of heating appliances and our reputation for square dealing stand back of this written guarantee. You take no risk when you buy the Caloric.

For Old or New Houses

The Caloric can be installed in old or new houses without cutting the walls and floors or disturbing the present heating equipment. It is particularly well adapted to houses having only small cellars. Where no cellar has been provided, it is an easy matter to dig a pit large enough to accommodate the Caloric and a coal bin. The Caloric does not heat the cellar because there are no pipes to radiate the warmth before it is circulated upstairs. The heat is regulated from the floor above.

There are dozens of other remarkable Caloric features which will be explained and demonstrated to you by the nearest dealer. He can also refer you to people in your section who have found the Caloric to be the most satisfactory solution of their heating problems.

"You know we have a very cold winter, sometimes getting weather 30° below zero, yet we were comfortable all the time. My house has five rooms, two halls and a bath, but all of them, including the bathroom, were as 'warm as toast.' And it cost so little fuel! All winter long we burned only six tons. Some of our neighbors used twice as much."

O. W. Larson,
4027 Columbus Ave.,
Minneapolis, Minn.

"The winter of 1917-18 was the most severe that was ever experienced in this section, but we heated our farm house (12 rooms) very comfortably, even when the thermometer registered 28° below zero, and we did it by burning only two tons of anthracite coal, the rest of the time using wood from our own farm. It is the ideal way of heating for the farm home."

Mrs. J. W. Pierpont,
R. F. D., Cassadaga, N. Y.

Our Engineering Department, composed of men who have had years of experience in pipeless heating, is rendering free service to thousands of people who are interested in heating their buildings more economically and satisfactorily. You, too, can take advantage of this help without obligation.

Our new Caloric catalog will be sent upon request. It tells the story of this scientific system of heating and explains why the Caloric is the best furnace for thousands of buildings. With this book we will also send the names of Caloric users in your section, so that you may investigate the claims we make.

What and Why is the Internal Bath?

By C. Gilbert Percival, M.D.

Though many articles have been written and much has been said recently about the Internal Bath, the fact remains that a great amount of ignorance and misunderstanding of this new system of Physical Hygiene still exists.

And inasmuch as it seems that Internal Bathing is even more essential to perfect health than External Bathing, I believe that everyone should know its origin, its purpose and its action beyond the possibility of a misunderstanding.

Its great popularity started at about the same time as did what are probably the most encouraging signs of recent times—I refer to the appeal for Optimism, Cheerfulness, Efficiency and those attributes which go with them and which, if steadily practiced, will make our race not only the despair of nations competitive to us in business, but establish us as a shining example to the rest of the world in our mode of living.

These new daily "Gospels," as it were, had as their inspiration the ever present unconquerable American Ambition, for it had been proven to the satisfaction of all real students of business that the most successful man is he who is sure of himself—who is optimistic, cheerful, and impresses the world with the fact that he is supremely confident always—for the world of business has every confidence in the man who has confidence in himself.

If our outlook is optimistic, and our confidence strong, it naturally follows that we inject enthusiasm, "ginger," and clear judgment into our work, and have a tremendous advantage over those who are at times more or less depressed, blue, and nervously fearful that their judgment may be wrong—who lack the confidence that comes with the right condition of mind and which counts so much for success.

Now the practice of Optimism and Confidence has made great strides in improving and advancing the general efficiency of the American, and if the mental attitude necessary to its accomplishment were easy to secure, complete success would be ours.

Unfortunately, however, our physical bodies have an influence on our mental attitude, and in this particular instance, because of a physical condition which is universal, these much-to-be-desired aids to success are impossible to consistently enjoy.

In other words, our trouble, to a great degree, is physical first and mental afterwards—this physical trouble is simple and very easily corrected. Yet it seriously affects our strength and energy, and if it is allowed to exist too long becomes chronic and then dangerous.

Nature is constantly demanding one thing of us, which, under our present mode of living and eating, it is impossible for us to give—that is, a constant care of our diet, and enough consistent physical work or exercise to eliminate all waste from the system.

If our work is confining, as it is in almost every instance, our systems cannot throw off the waste except according to our activity, and a clogging process immediately sets in.

This waste accumulated in the colon (lower intestine), and is more serious in its effect than you would think, because it is intensely poisonous, and the blood circulating through the colon absorbs these poisons, circulating them through the system and lowering our vitality generally.

That's the reason that biliousness and its kindred complaints make us ill "all over." It is also the reason that this waste, if permitted to remain a little too long, gives the destructive germs, which are always present in the blood, a chance to gain the upper hand, and we are not alone inefficient, but really ill—seriously sometimes, if there is a local weakness.

This accumulated waste has long been recognized as a menace, and Physicians, Physical Culturists, Dietitians, Osteopaths and others have been constantly laboring to perfect a method of removing it, and with partial and temporary success.

It remained, however, for a new, rational and perfectly natural process to finally and satisfactorily solve the problem of how to thoroughly eliminate this waste from the colon without strain or unnatural forcing—to keep it sweet and clean and healthy and keep us correspondingly bright and strong—clearing the blood of the poisons which made it and us sluggish and dull spirited, and making our entire organism work and act as Nature intended it should.

That process is Internal Bathing with warm water—and it now, by the way, has the endorsements of the most enlightened Physicians, Physical Culturists, Osteopaths, etc., who have tried it and seen its results.

Heretofore it has been our habit, when we have found, by disagreeable, and sometimes alarming symptoms, that this waste was getting much the better of us, to repair to the drugshop and obtain relief through drugging.

This is partly effectual, but there are several vital reasons why it should not be our practice as compared with Internal Bathing.

Drugs force Nature instead of assisting her—Internal Bathing assists Nature and is just as simple and natural as washing one's hands.

Drugs, being taken through the stomach, sap the vitality of other functions before they reach the colon, which is not called for—Internal Bathing washes out the colon and reaches nothing else.

To keep the colon consistently clean drugs must be persisted in, and to be effective the doses must be increased. Internal Bathing is a consistent treatment, and need never be altered in any way to be continuously effective.

No less an authority than Professor Alonzo Clark, M.D., of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, says: All of our curative agents are poisons, and as a consequence every dose diminishes the patient's vitality.

It is rather remarkable to find, at what would seem so comparatively late a day, so great an improvement on the old methods of Internal Bathing, as this new process, for in a crude way it has, of course, been practiced for years.

It is probably no more surprising, however, than the tendency on the part of the Medical Profession to depart further and further from the custom of using drugs, and accomplish the same and better results by more natural means: causing less strain on the system and leaving no evil after effects.

Doubtless you, as well as all American men and women, are interested in knowing all that may be learned about keeping up to "concert pitch," and always feeling bright and confident.

This improved system of Internal Bathing is naturally a rather difficult subject to cover in detail in the public press, but there is a Physician who has made this his life's study and work, who has written an interesting book on the subject called "The What, The Why, The Way of the Internal Bath." This he will send on request to anyone addressing Charles A. Tyrrell, M.D., at 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mentioning that they read this in the Christian Herald.

It is surprising how little is known by the average person on this subject, which has so great an influence on the general health and spirits.

My personal experience and my observations make me very enthusiastic on Internal Bathing, for I have seen its results in sickness as well as in health, and I firmly believe that everybody owes it to himself, if only for the information available, to read this little book by an authority on the subject.—(Advertisement.)

The Church and the "Great Commission"

At a religious congress held recently in Pittsburg it was lamented by the many prominent representatives present that the Church had seemed unable to cope with the world-war situation. The Christian Herald straightway invited a free interchange of views as to the next step for the Church in America to take, in order that she might render that service to be expected of her in this her rare opportunity. The Church has not entirely failed in this crisis. She has not been able to stop the war (perhaps it was not intended that she should), but the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., and other like organizations and their work would not be possible but for those identified with the Church who make up their membership in large part. These might therefore be said to be the Church operating under other names.

Wherein the Church has failed to do her greatest has been a failure of the past, a failure to carry out her only specific commission, which is still the Great Commission, and the greatest commission (in spite of world-engaging war)—"Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to the whole creation." This is the Church's job, not the war or the stopping of the war. It is no hazard to state that the faithful carrying out of this commission would have witnessed a mighty difference everywhere.

But the past is past. Does the Church now want more of power? Fasting and prayer will get it. "The greatest thing in our church services should be not the sermon, but prayer." And fasting should have its place. Hear the Galilean! "Thou, when thou fastest . . . be not seen of men to fast, but of thy Father who is in secret; and thy Father who seeth in secret shall recompense thee." "The days will come when the Bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall [Revised, 'will'] they fast in those days." Who does it? It would seem that the nearest gotten to it is in the leaving off one thing to eat, and substituting another. There is a program of action in the third chapter of Jonah which would fit in this crisis (Jonah substantiated in Matt. 12:39, 40). In the four and more years since the war began, the nation has been called to prayer once, perhaps twice, by the President, and the Church has called to emergency prayer also once, perhaps twice. The call was complied with by the usual morning service, with no more of prayer than is common to the weekly Sunday assemblage, and with much more of sermon than of prayer (there may have been local and unknown exceptions). The Son of God and of man spent whole nights in prayer at other times "rising a great while before day" for the purpose. He taught how to pray by the illustration of the importunate widow, and by the friend who came to his friend at midnight for three loaves of bread, and got "as man as he needed" under most unpromising circumstances, not because he was friend, but, behold! "because of his importunity." God is "the same yesterday, today and forever." He changes not, therefore we can depend on him. But he will nevertheless meet the need of the individual or the nation that is much in earnest prayer.

If President Wilson can mobilize the forces of this country for war, why cannot the Church for the carrying out of the Great Commission? What a power in the Church as a unit for prayer and fasting and for financing the Great Commission! It could be made the biggest enterprise in the universe. Why should the Church go on for generations after generation in the same slow way? Ah, some may say, but this is no time for "cutting out more work," when the nations are already strained by war matters. How is that? Do you not know that millions are still living in luxury? Millions are not engaged in actual warfare, but are as much masters of their time as ever. Millions are still spending, without much thought or restraint, for whatever appeals to appetite or continues an unnecessary habit, and oh, so many have not ceased "wearing soft raiment and living delicately"! We could, under the leadership of some one with the energy and organizing capacity of a Billy Sunday, finance every one who would volunteer to go, and once begun, enthusiasm would almost certainly kindle the numbers like forest fires—the enthusiasm of the Holy Ghost. This would not interfere with our success in the war. It would mightily help to a desired end. The 400,000,000 Chinese, the 300,000,000 of India, the innumerable of Russia, Japan, Africa—did not he say something about "a nation born in a day"? Why not in this generation? Why leave this glory to another? "Why shall we here until we die?"

The opportunity is with us, but not for long! It looks like the last great call to us "upon whom the ends of the earth are come."

Like a Real "Home Village"

THERE has grown up on the western edge of Camp Travis a mushroom village which in unique picturesqueness would do credit to the most imaginative writer of Wild-West "movie" plays. The village consists of two rows of low frame buildings, all facing the east, toward Camp Travis, each row extending over about four blocks. The streets are not noticeable for their straightness. Cooperation is in evidence, however, to the extent that all the buildings are connected by a broad board walk; but the size, height and angle of the walk was left to the individual taste of the owners. Each shack has its own flaring sign, and each one that is painted has its own favorite color; but some have not gone in for paint at all.

But the village is "Wild-West" in appearance only. It is composed entirely of cold drink stands, restaurants, vaudeville shows, shooting galleries, photo-shops, skating-rinks, etc. In the rear row are more substantial buildings, the big new Salvation Army Hut, the Baptist Chapel, the new Methodist Soldier Church, a theater and a hotel. But the gambling dens of the old West are notably absent, and the thirst emporiums handle nothing stronger than innocent Bevo.

It requires no pass for a soldier from Camp Travis to visit "Parade Rest," as the village is called, and as a result the rookie can seek almost any kind of diversion he likes while not on duty. Also he is saved the expense of twenty cents carfare to San Antonio every time he has a hankering to see a show. The religious organizations at the village are having a phenomenal success, and are helping the new men soon to feel at home in the camp. Practically everything a soldier desires can be bought at the village, and he is said to the credit of the proprietors, there is little evidence of profiteering. The young people from the city also entertain their soldier friends at the church buildings, and all in all Parade Rest has become a very popular place with the Camp Travis men.

The village is under the observance of the city and military authorities at all times, and nothing of detriment to the soldier is allowed to flourish.

Desperate Use of Sunshine

SERIOUS modification of Germany's ambition to secure a "place in the sun" is evident from government effort to solve the diminishing food and fuel supply. So short has become the supply of fats and oil that large plantings of sunflowers are urged as a source of edible oil. Last year the German government offered premiums for the cultivation of sunflowers, and railroad right-of-ways there are extensively used for the purpose. This is in keeping with Germany's policy of utilizing all her resources to the utmost.

According to information received by the U. S. Food Administration, as much as 18 gallons of oil can be secured from the seeds of an acre of sunflowers, while the refuse is said to make a cattle feed comparing favorably in quality with other feeds now available in Germany.

Marion Harland's Corner

"Salt Down the Surplus"

THUS runs what may be styled "a hurry call," just issued by the Food Administration Bureau. In view of the apprehension of untimely frosts that haunts the minds of gardeners and housemothers in our proverbially fickle climate, and the unusual high value set upon the kindly fruits of the earth just now, readers will do well to read carefully, and if practicable to obey the simple directions succeeding the aforesaid call:

Where there is a big family to be fed through the winter and a rush of summer work, the surplus vegetables might well be salted down. The process is exceedingly simple, and the only equipment needed is good water-tight casks. While salted vegetables may not equal fresh in quality, they help materially to build up the food reserves, and when they are well-cooked and seasoned the flavor, though different from that of fresh vegetables, is good. Vegetables put up as directed will keep their crispness and color.

Directions

Gather vegetables when in the best condition and pack while they are crisp and tender. Cover the top with grape-leaves, chard or horse-radish.

Weight with a clean stone resting on an inverted plate. Do not allow mold to form, and keep vegetables covered with brine.

When all bubbling has ceased, about a week after packing, cover the surface of the brine with cottonseed oil or melted paraffin. Store in a cool place, and examine once or twice a week for a month.

For the brine allow 1½ cups of salt to 1 gallon of water. This is a 10 per cent. salt solution.

For a salt-and-vinegar solution allow ¾ cup vinegar to 1 gallon of above solution.

Green Tomatoes

Salted green tomatoes may be made into tomato stew, stuffed tomatoes, breaded tomatoes, salad and pie, or converted into mince-meat and chutney. Choose well-developed green tomatoes and pack in salt solution. Green tomatoes, packed in salt-and-vinegar solution, are good for salads and dishes.

Ripe Tomatoes

Select medium-sized ripe tomatoes, free from cracks or bruises, and pack in brine solution. Follow directions and your tomatoes will be firm and of good color when removed from either the brine or the salt-and-vinegar solution.

Ripe tomatoes preserved in the salt-solution generally require soaking for two hours before being used. After this soaking the skins slip off easily, and the tomatoes may be used as though fresh. For soups or scalloped or casserole dishes, soaking for one hour is usually sufficient, for the excess of salt seasons the other ingredients.

Ripe tomatoes preserved in the salt-and-vinegar solution require soaking for only about thirty minutes. When used in combination with fresh vegetables, they need not be soaked at all. The skins slip off easily, and the flesh is firm.

OWNERS of truck-farms in some sections of the United States, and families who rely upon their own gardens for a supply of vegetables, share in the perplexity amounting to dismay at finding themselves, after a sharp frost, burdened with a large quantity of green tomatoes that would have been fully ripe and available for a dozen purposes had the killing frost kept longer aloof. So many good things may be made of this "salvage" of the frost-bitten garden, that I insert a few recipes which may console the housemother for the premature blight of her promising rows and squares of this most versatile, wholesome and popular of the humbler class of "kindly fruits." I copy further from the Food Administration's Circular:

Mock Mince-meat

Three pounds salted green tomatoes; two pounds apples; one cup chopped suet; two cups molasses; one cup corn syrup; one cup raisins; one cup vinegar; one teaspoon cloves; two tablespoons cinnamon; one teaspoon allspice; one teaspoon nutmeg. Soak the tomatoes for two hours, and chop them fine. Chop the apples. Add the other ingredients, and cook the mixture until it is thick. This mince-meat will keep for some time in a covered jar.

Green Tomato Conserve

One pint salted green tomatoes; one tart apple, diced—not pared; two cups syrup; juice of one lemon; grated rind of ½ lemon.

Soak the tomatoes for two hours, and dice them. Cook the tomatoes and the apple in a small quantity of water until they are tender. Do not drain them. Add the other ingredients, and cook the mixture until it is thick and clear. If desired, about one tablespoonful of preserved ginger may be added.

ANTICIPATING that some housemothers may prefer to put up the tomatoes while fresh, rather than wait until they must be soaked in order to prepare them for cooking, I subjoin to the formulas extracted from the official bulletin a recipe for the quality of which I can vouch without a doubt:

Green Tomato Soy

Two gallons of green tomatoes, firm and sound and sliced without peeling. Twelve onions of fair size, also sliced; two quarts of vinegar; one quart of sugar (or three pints of Karo syrup); two tablespoonfuls of salt, and the same quantity, each, of ground mustard and black pepper; one tablespoonful, each, of whole allspice and whole cloves. Mix all together; let the mixture stand, covered, for two hours before turning into a granite or porcelain-lined kettle. Cook gently for an hour, or until the tomatoes are tender, stirring often from the bottom to prevent scorching. You may put it up in self-sealing cans while it is hot. Or, wait until it is cold, and turn into jelly-glasses, covering the surface with tissue-paper, and this with melted paraffin.

Before passing to other matters, be it observed that the mock mince-meat for which we are indebted to the Food Administration Bureau may be made of fresh green tomatoes late in the autumn, or early in the winter, thus avoiding the trouble of salting down.

THE reader of Dickens must be reminded often of Mr. Peter Magnus's "Bless my soul! here is another coincidence!" in the perusal of our beloved and informal Corner. The quotation sprang to my lips for the hundredth time this morning when side by side with the official bulletin containing instructions for this week's consideration lay a letter from an esteemed correspondent whose mind is running in the same channel—to wit, the value of vegetables in the human dietary, and the duty of getting the best results from a free use of them.

We will let her tell her own story:

I am much interested in Marion Harland's Corner and will try to tell you what I do with my vegetable peelings. As most thinking women now know, they contain our most valuable blood tonic, that which keeps our blood pure and therefore our bodies stronger and healthier. So, if we wish to keep the doctor out of our homes, it behooves us to use a little more time and thought in the preparation of our foods. All such vegetables as potatoes, carrots, parsnips, turnips, rutabagas, beets, etc., I scrub well with my vegetable brush and soap, cutting out any spots, then boil them in a small quantity of water till done, gauging quite carefully so there may be no water, or at least only a few spoonfuls, to pour off. Then, if there are any offensive skins, as in the case of old vegetables, peel them off, as the mineral salts are now thoroughly cooked through the starchy parts, and prepare for the table in any appetizing way you may wish. Cabbage we generally eat raw as slaw, chipping fine and sending to the table without seasoning, or often in our home—as we have plenty of cream—dressing with salt, celeryseed and sour cream and garnishing with eggs. Have your seasonings on table, such as vinegar, lemon-juice, olive oil, etc. In preparing green peas, always cook pods. Grains are more healthful when cooked whole, cracked or rolled, and served as mush with cream or butter. I was much interested in your Mock Devonshire Cream, as it is an old favorite of ours. Only, in addition to cream, we flavor it with salt and celery-salt or seed, none of our family caring for pepper. We not only use it as you mention, but also piled on any uncooked greens or with onions chopped and mixed in it, or any kind of dried fruits and nuts mixed with it. All are good and much more healthful than meats, and for those who keep a cow, much more economical.—Mrs. B. H. B. (Belvoir Farm).

Other faithful readers of the Corner will recollect that the Mock Devonshire Cream of which our member speaks was made of cream (or "cottage") cheese, whipped light with a little real cream, and eaten with jam as a dessert at supper or luncheon, spread upon buttered toast or heated buttered crackers.

Open Windows

ARE our windows open toward the New Jerusalem? Although Daniel was away from Jerusalem, yet when he prayed, he opened his windows toward that great city.

We are away from our great city, but when we pray do we open our windows? Sometimes it is easier to pray without opening the windows, but if we do not open them, we fail to get the sunshine coming straight from Him who is the city's light.

How are we to open our windows toward the city? By being kind one toward another; by helping the sick and sorrowing; by doing the things which help, instead of hindering other people from doing the task God has appointed them to do; by speaking the kind word.

If we fail to do these things, then our windows are closed, and if we do not open them, by and by the sills will sag, and we cannot get them to swing open at all.

So let us then open our windows in the early morning, and keep them open all day, looking out often upon the great panorama of waiting service that God in his love has spread out before us, and we shall be no longer tempted to pray with windows closed. Therefore let the windows be opened all the day long, and thou shalt be blessed.

Why Children Don't Obey

Obedience is the very foundation of character in all children. Yet how many parents discover constantly that their instructions to their children carry no farther than around the corner. And disobedience is simply the leader of a whole troop of bad traits. Wilfulness, selfishness, jealousy, disrespect, untruthfulness, ill temper and many other harmful, unpleasant qualities that a child acquires during the first few years of its life are directly related to that first great fault of disobedience.

New Methods for Old

Until now, scolding and whipping seem to have been the only resource at the command of parents. But new methods have been discovered which make it easy to train children to obey promptly, pleasantly and surely without breaking the child's will, without creating fear.

resentment or revenge in the child's heart, as whipping does. This new method is based on confidence between parent and child. When perfect understanding and sympathy exist, obedience comes naturally and all the bad traits that children pick up so easily are not given a chance to develop. A command, quietly spoken, brings instant obedience in every case—and even children who are habitually disobedient are quickly changed into willing, obedient boys and girls.

Highest Endorsements

This new system, which has been put into the form of an illustrated Course prepared especially for the busy parent, is producing remarkable and immediate results for thousands of parents in all parts of the world, and is endorsed by leading educators. It covers all ages from cradle to eighteen years.

Weak Points in Our Society to Be Strengthened

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. 1 Chron. 28 : 1-10

THIS topic was treated in the Christian Herald of August 28 as the Epworth League Topic for Sept. 8. In addition to what was said at that time we might add that many societies show weakness through their inability to grasp the world vision. If the Missionary Committee is the weak spot, the whole society is in danger. Other societies are weak in their social outlook. They have a very good time just among themselves; but a stranger somehow does not fit in. The Outlook Committee must have a real outlook, and a wide one. Another weak spot sometimes in evidence is lack of reverence in the Sunday evening meetings. They resemble too much the proceedings of a Study Club, there being too little of the spirit of worship and devotion. These are a few weak spots that are readily corrected, and it should not be necessary to appoint a committee to study the ways and means. Each member should be a committee of one, to see that he or she is not included in the weak spot.

The Church Building and the Church's Program

Epworth League Topic. Luke 4 : 16-21

NOTHING adds so much to the power of a church as a commodious building, complete in its appointments.

But many a beautiful building is a sepulcher of a society which, though not dead, is manifestly sleeping, and many an unimposing structure is made the center of the life of a community by the vigorous spiritual activities which center within it. The church, the assembly of believers, is the vital thing; the building is an accessory, but a useful one. The church's program concerns the building but little, except as the plans contemplate its use, but it concerns the assembly of believers individually and together, for no program can succeed without workers. The Methodist Church, through its accredited leaders, has outlined a most ambitious program, in which it plans to celebrate the achievements of 100 years of missionary activities. In many parts of the country the Centenary Program is already being worked with great success and spiritual blessing. Great problems and greater opportunities face the church in the year just ahead. The Centenary Program in its full development will place the church in a strategic position to meet these opportunities and problems hopefully and successfully. The home field, the foreign field, and every other field must be organized, inspired, energized and equipped. The program is a challenge to American Methodism. Leaders for this meeting may secure helps by addressing the general office, 740 Rush St., Chicago, Ill., or the Centenary Commission, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and much valuable material will be found in the "Winning the War" number of the World Outlook.

How Our Marines Fought at Château-Thierry

LEUTENANT D. A. HOLLIDAY of the United States Marine Corps, in a letter recently written, describes the fighting around Château-Thierry. The letter has just been forwarded to the Marine Corps Headquarters, Washington, by his father, Dr. J. M. Holliday, pastor of the Marion Presbyterian Church, Marion, S. C. He writes:

"An attack began one afternoon at five o'clock. The Huns had machine-gun nests scattered all through the woods. We got half the woods that afternoon, but both sides were gloriously mixed. About seven o'clock my company (what was left of it) started digging in. My commander sent me back through the woods to collect all marines available and bring them to our relief.

"Two things happened on that trip: I was chased by a German machine-gun two hundred yards; you bet I was scared! After that I was caught in an artillery barrage, and that accounts for my being gassed. It did not hurt me much at the time; simply knocked me down, caused vomiting, and made me feel rather bad. But to continue the trip—I returned with a few men; the company was reorganized, and late that night we moved to another part of the woods, to occupy a position held by only one platoon. Nothing happened for the next twenty-four hours. We dug in and ate German rations, all except the cheese. At one o'clock that morning we received orders to get ready for an attack at 4 A.M. In the midst of the discussion the Huns opened up on us. Thanks to two captured maxims and plenty of ammunition, we repulsed the attack. It was here I got slightly hit. At 3 A.M. we withdrew quietly, got some more ammunition by luck, and formed for the new assault, which was to clear the woods of all machine-guns. We got half way into the woods and then the music began. We managed to throw some dirt in front of us and continued to fire. My men were so tired that quite a number fell asleep on the shovel. It was there that I gave out. At first it seemed that I was going to sleep; but the gas and wound just put me out of business for six hours."

Makkavik, Hopedale and Nain, but through the unavoidable reduction in the Mission staffs, this work has fallen largely to the lot of the single-handed missionary, and this is too great a burden for him, and the mission workers have long felt that the instruction imparted in the few weeks of school was totally inadequate. This has led us to launch out a little farther, and, the ocean being sufficiently safe for female teachers to come from England, we hope to commence school in the autumn, and have the children with us for about eight months. During this time they should acquire a larger amount of education than has hitherto been possible. The one school will serve the three districts, Makkavik, Hopedale and Nain, and the children will be gathered from a very sparsely inhabited coastline of about 250 miles. The children will be conveyed hither and thither in autumn and in spring by our own mission ship, the Harmony. Parents will be required to start the children with an outfit of clothing, and will be asked to make a small contribution toward their board. Friends at home may be induced to send us parcels of clothing to replace the unavoidable wear and tear. Anything they may do for the work will be appreciated.

The Churches Must Unite

I AM much interested in the discussion, in the Christian Herald, of "The Church After the War." We must admit that the Church has fallen down in this war. Christianity has not fallen, but is working today, and doing a mighty work, through the Young Men's Christian Association and the Red Cross. The reason the Church has broken down is plain. Jesus said a house or kingdom divided against itself cannot stand. He also prayed that we might be one. The Church is divided into different denominations. We refuse to unite and become one; we claim to be branches of the Vine, but we can find no common basis on which to unite.

If the Church were united today this war would be impossible, or she could stop it in short order. God is the factor in this war. He has taken peace from the world, to punish the nations for their sins, to bring us to our senses and lead us to repent and to save us spiritually.

How can we expect the nations to establish permanent peace as long as the Church, which represents the Prince of Peace, is not at peace with herself? There are worse things than war, famine, and pestilence, and if this war will not bring us to our senses, then these other things will be sure to follow.

God could easily end the war, but that would not prevent this old world from committing spiritual suicide. The thing for the churches to do is to get down on their knees and ask God to help them to unite in Jesus Christ, and then appoint seven men, filled with the Holy Spirit, to form an advisory council, through whom Jesus Christ can rule in the nations of the world.

The Book says, "In a multitude of counselors there is safety." There are three who rule in heaven. There ought to be at least seven to make up the head of the Church on earth.

could he saved as against the continuation of the war through 1920. Mr. Hoover estimated that it would be necessary to ship abroad in the year ending July 1, 1919, 17,550,000 tons of meats, fats, breadstuffs, sugar and feed grains. Even this program means further self-denial for the Allies next year. At the President's direction Mr. Hoover said that he had assured our Allies that "in this common cause we eat at a common table." The shipments required mean an increase over the present rate of export of 5,730,000 tons in the year. This is greater than our apparent surplus. Mr. Hoover urges even greater simplicity of living than last year, in order that we may avoid rationing of the American people, which would be somewhat difficult because of the large number of people who take part of their meals in public eating places. Mr. Hoover closed his statement with this paragraph: "It is necessary that every family in the United States study its food budget and food ways to see if it cannot buy less, serve less, return nothing to the kitchen, and practise the gospel of the clean plate." According to the estimates of the Food Administration the prices of meats, vegetables, fruits, poultry, eggs and breadstuffs have risen an average of 3½ per cent over last year. This apparently low average is partly due to the fact that vegetables have decreased in price in most sections. Farmers have received 35 per cent more in prices than the year before.

THE U-BOATS' RECORD. Official figures made public on September 21, show that the net loss of Allied and neutral shipping by German U-Boat operations has been 3,362,088 tons. The total losses have been 21,404,913 tons; total construction 14,247,285 tons; the total enemy tonnage captured 3,795,000 tons. At present Allied and American construction is exceeding each month the submarine losses; the losses having been passed by construction in May. The United States Shipping Board, on September 22, had placed in service 356 vessels of a total tonnage of 2,045,875 and had launched 264 more of a tonnage of 1,223,566.

A NOTED PRELATE DIES. Cardinal Archbishop John M. Farley, of the Catholic Archdiocese of New York, died at his country home on September 16, in his 76th year. Cardinal Farley was one of the most able and influential of the Catholic leaders in this country. He was born in Ireland, April 20, 1842, was left an orphan at the age of 7, and made his own way largely from that time forward. He came to New York while still a student, and was ordained a priest in 1870. In 1884 he was appointed private chamberlain to Pope Leo XIII, and in 1891 he was appointed Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of New York. He became Archbishop in 1902 and was made a Cardinal in 1911. He rendered great service upon the entrance of America into the war in organizing work for the soldiers. He was also active in the work of publishing the Catholic Encyclopedia.

BREWERS BACK BRISBANE. A. Mitchell Palmer, alien property custodian, having stated that the brewers of America had furnished the money to purchase a great newspaper under the very dome of the capitol, and the facts being demanded, Mr. Palmer made public, on September 18, the documents on which his statement was based. These documents showed conclusively that Arthur Brisbane, editor of the Hearst papers, purchased the Washington Times, June 26, 1917, with money furnished by a syndicate of brewers. Some of the contributing breweries were German owned. The Senate ordered a searching investigation of the whole matter.

NEW ENVOY TO BRITAIN. It was announced on September 18, that John William Davis, of West Virginia, at present Solicitor General of the United States would succeed Walter Hynes Page as ambassador to Great Britain. Mr. Davis was about to go abroad as head of the American delegation to the American German Prisoners Conference, which was to meet in Berne, Switzerland, on September 23.

COMMERCIAL AGREEMENT WITH DENMARK. The War Trade Board and the special Danish mission completed in Washington, on September 18, an agreement regarding commercial and shipping problems concerning the two nations. The agreement is similar to those entered into with Scandinavian countries and with Spain. Denmark will receive a supply of foodstuffs, metal, machinery, textiles, chemicals, drugs, and other commodities which will aggregate about 352,000 tons annually. Danish tonnage not required for the transportation of this material is to be placed at the disposal of the United States and its associated powers.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The United States and Great Britain were reported, on September 18, as joining in an attempt to mediate between North and South China in the settlement of their factional differences. . . . Queen Wilhelmina, in opening the Dutch parliament or States General on September 18, expressed her sympathy for the cares and sorrows caused by the food situation and expressed also her thankfulness for the preservation of peace in Holland. The Queen declared Holland's intention to defend her neutrality. . . . During a strike of policemen in Cincinnati the Boy Scouts took the place of traffic officers. . . . The Federal War Labor Board, on September 18, upheld the eight-hour day in all war industries. . . . President Wilson has issued a proclamation providing that all brewing of beer and other malt beverages, including near beer and non-alcoholic drinks of that character, should stop on December 1, and that no grain should be purchased for malting after October 1. . . . Viscount Ichiro Motono, who resigned as Minister of Foreign Affairs of Japan four months ago, died at Tokio on September 18. Viscount Motono had been Japanese Minister at Paris and Brussels. He was Japanese delegate to The Hague Peace Conference and was ambassador at Petrograd from 1906 to 1916.

again took the offensive on September 18, striking first along the west side of the Jordan and then extending the attack along the whole front as far as the Mediterranean. They completely broke through the Turkish positions over the entire front. (For this part of the war story, see page 1106.)

On September 20, the American Artillery was reported to have destroyed one of the bridges spanning the Moselle in Metz and to have silenced one of the heavy batteries in an outlying fort. On September 21, General March, Chief of Staff, announced that the number of men embarked for overseas service exceeded 1,750,000.

The Germans on September 23, evacuated Vendeuil on the Oise north of La Fère, and the French troops held the line of the river for six miles between La Fère and St. Quentin.

In the Balkans the Allied victory continually assumed larger proportions. On September 23, the Bulgarian and German armies were in retreat along a front of 100 miles from east of Lake Doiran to west of Monastir, the heavily fortified and almost impregnable mountain country between the Cerna and the Vardar had been passed and the Serbian and French armies were debouching on the plains of southern Serbia, with the horder of Bulgaria at Strumitza only three miles away. The railway communications of the armies, both eastward and westward of the broken front, were cut and the 11th German division had been separated from its Bulgarian allies and was in precipitate retreat.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

REPORT OF PHILADELPHIA PROPHETIC CONFERENCE

THE unanimous judgment is that the great Philadelphia Bible Conference was the most momentous and important of its kind ever held in America, or perhaps in the world, both in numbers and significance. It was a Conference which at every session exalted Christ, and gave rich and stirring messages to His people throughout the world. There was no effort on the part of any speaker to exploit himself. From first to last, there was evidence in all that was said, that the most consecrated scholarship and reverent investigation was under divine guidance, and submissive to the leadings of the Holy Spirit. There was an entire absence of anything like radicalism, sensationalism, date-fixing, and dogmatism. The great fundamental belief of the Christian Church was discussed with a calm serenity that indicated conviction of its truth.

The speeches of the Conference will be welcomed by Christians and Bible readers everywhere, and especially by those who love the Lord Jesus Christ and believe in His promise. These addresses have been gathered under the official supervision of the Conference Executive Committee, and published by the Christian Herald in an authorized volume of 360 pages under the title of "Light on Prophecy." This step was taken by the Conference in order that the widest possible publicity might be assured for the book, as the record of the most authoritative assembly on prophecy ever held up to the present time.

trucks. The list includes vegetables, fruit, corn, wheat, milk, butter, eggs, chickens, live calves, cows, and pigs, fertilizer, wood, coal, farm machinery and repair parts, groceries, drugs, clothing, shoes, hardware, house furnishings, pictures, musical instruments, jewelry, and newspapers.

Without such direct transportation, many farmers, truck gardeners and dairymen declare they would have to give up raising for market. The vital need is to enable the farmer to give all his own time to farm work and keep his horses at work in the fields. Time spent on the road making a day's journey to market with a load of produce that can be hauled by motor truck in two or three hours is a definite loss to the food supply.

The motor truck stimulates increased production and cultivation of formerly unproductive sections remote from cities and railroads by providing a quick dependable means of shipping direct from farm to consumer or commission merchant. It is like having a railroad station at every farm and village store on the routes covered.

Motor express lines bring more trade to merchants and manufacturers in the city by increasing farm production and raising the purchasing power of the country for twenty-five to fifty miles around which draws its supplies from the city.

CONSUMERS also benefit. Fruits and vegetables arrive in market in better condition than by rail, because they are on the way only a few hours, and are handled only twice. Produce in Baltimore, with its fifteen truck lines, averages about 20 per cent. cheaper than in Washington.

Railroad congestion has forced farmers in Ohio to make use of motor trucks for hauling live stock to the Cincinnati stockyards. Of 77,244 hogs, 23,618 sheep, 28,545 calves and 27,721 cattle delivered to the yards over the highways last year, about 60 per cent. were hauled in trucks from a radius of thirty miles.

Of all classes of people the farmer has been the most dependent upon good roads, as they are essential to the satisfactory marketing of his products, the hauling of his supplies, and his pleasure. He is today the largest user of both automobile and horse-drawn vehicles, and the wear and tear on them from bad roads is annually enough to keep in repair the main highways and more important branch roads. He is simply paying for good roads in his repair bills, without having the advantages of easy travel. Now he is joined in his desire for better highways by all classes of manufacturers and shippers.

The difference between a poor road and an improved road may mean the difference between production at a profit and production at a loss, and in some cases no production at all.

Labor that will do the rougher work is scarce and demands increasing wages. The supply for public road work is usually drawn from the adjoining farms, where it is most needed for the care of crops. The application of improved methods will not only assist in overcoming this trouble, but will materially decrease the cost.

At this time it is not so much a matter of building elaborate systems of new roads, as of keeping those already established in the best of repair. Today thousands of miles of excellent and expensive American roads are falling into bad repair and becoming practically impassable on account of the lack of attention to slight repairs soon after the trouble occurs.

COMBINED forces of the government, states and counties will spend for highway improvement in 1918 the amazing total of $263,096,610.

While this sum seems staggering, eclipsing by eighty-two per cent. the expenditures of any previous year and in money figures that of 1917 by $118,797,750, road officials of the government and states say it represents merely a drop in the bucket of what should be spent before the war is concluded. They admit the railroad situation has made imperative lavish road appropriations—the total of this year is little better than half what Secretary McAdoo has announced as necessary for the upbuilding of the overtaxed American railroad system. Calculations by government officials are that, with good highways, motor trucks and motor vehicles are capable of carrying approximately 200 per cent. more freight than the railroads. In these same calculations they estimate the value of our highways at $6,240,000,000.

The productive possibilities of communities were considered above all else in determining the sums to be allotted for road improvement. Thus the South and Middle West appropriations exceed those of other regions by many millions. Texas, for instance, leads all others with contemplated highway development, announcing the amazing assignment of $25,000,000 for road improvement. Last year it spent $5,000,000.

Ohio, Pennsylvania and Michigan, which play a large part in any highway program, owing to the fact that all government truck caravans traverse their confines, are concentrating on those lanes used most by the big industries. Traffic between the huge rubber and steel cities of Ohio and Pennsylvania and shipping points will be uninterrupted in winter as well as summer. Plows are being purchased to keep open roads during winter months.

No large increases in appropriations are reported from the East and New England states, because highway commissioners there have never within the past decade allowed anything to interfere with a consistent road-building program.

REPORTS from State Highway Commissioners disclose some interesting individual features. In Oregon, for instance, the government and state bodies are spending five times what they did last year in order to build trunk roads into large timber tracts. From these is being taken the lumber for the armada of ships Uncle Sam is constructing. In many cases roads have been planked by army engineers to enable the heavy trucks laden with mighty timbers to pass.

A. C. McKibbin of the Missouri State Highway Board writes that in forwarding to Washington reports on traffic areas in Missouri he gave first consideration to live stock, grain, poultry, mineral and timber producing areas. Into these, he recommended, auxiliary and tributary roads should extend.

Iowa is entitled to the palm for consistent road construction. This state, with more automobiles in proportion to its total population, spent $15,000,000 last year and is doing the same this year. Approximately 6,000 miles of highways in the state are being improved and extended.

Recognition of the tremendous importance gasoline is playing in the war and in the sustenance of our automobile industry here is reflected in the figures from Oklahoma. Tulsa County, in the heart of the oil-fields, is spending $1,750,000, which is more than some states spent during the entire twelve months of last year. Another county, Okmulgee, is putting $800,000 into forty-three miles of roadway.

Wisconsin is putting into effect a trunk system of roads which taps every community of the state.

Arkansas, which last year spent $4,000,000, is investing $12,000,000 in constructing a series of highways between Louisiana and Arkansas, via Hot Springs and Little Rock.

Illinois and Indiana rank next to Texas in expenditures for road-building. Indiana has inherited 175 miles of the new market highway and is also eager to polish up its share of the Dixie Highway.

Texas's huge appropriation is not inflated by any large government tender. Federal authorities have given the Lone Star State just $875,000, and the counties and state have gone out and got the rest.

"Going Over"

THE National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. has begun to publish a weekly for free distribution to the men who are just ready to embark for "Over There." "Going Over" is the name of this paper, Volume 1, No. 1 of which is dated at Embarkation Camp, U. S. A., Monday, August 5, 1918. It is not a fly-sheet, but a regular well-illustrated, well-edited, man-size newspaper, with all the departments that up-to-date weekly newspapers should have.

"MR. BRITLING SEES IT THROUGH"

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS

Condensed from many reviews

"At this very moment drums are beating throughout America and the call is going out for men. Are you one of the thinking men or women of the nation? Has the spectacle of a world on fire shattered your standards, forced you to wonder desperately whether this is not, at last, the final breakdown of civilization? If you would understand England—if you would understand the war, you must read this story of how it came to one Englishman."—Daily News, Chicago.

"H. G. Wells' new novel is a powerful, strong story. . . . Has wonderful pages . . . gems of emotional literature. . . . Nothing could express the whole, momentous situation in England and in the United States in so few words and such convincing tone. . . . For clear thinking and strong feeling the finest picture of the crises in the Anglo-Saxon world that has yet been produced."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"Mr. Wells has written a truly wonderful book—a book that makes one think, stirs his blood, chastens his soul, fills his eyes with salt, scalding tears, leaves a grateful little glow in his heart. My urgent advice to every reader of these columns is that he at once proceed to buy and read 'Mr. Britling' and read it through. Then, as promptly as opportunity permits, let him sit down, and read it through again.

From a three-page review in The Christian Work.

"Mr. Britling Sees It Through is a great book, a very masterpiece of realism which once read can never be forgotten. Clear in style, vivid in action, profound in analysis, admirably restrained in temper, constructive in suggestion, caustic in criticism—it cannot help but live as a supreme literary achievement."—John Kendrick Bangs in The Rambler.

"Through the horror of the inconceivable madness of the twentieth century world at war and the agony of the loss of his splendid boy, Mr. Britling concludes, 'Religion is the first thing and the last thing, and until a man has found God and been found by God, he begins at no beginning, he works to no end.' His epitaph for the dead boys in France is, 'Our sons have shown us God.'"—Chronicle, Poughkeepsie.

"Every thinking American, having now the Great War for his or her own personal concern, ought to read it. It would help us to find ourselves in relation to the great events in which we are living."—Forecast Magazine.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS

Condensed from many reviews

"I have no words . . . to say how wonderfully this Wells war epic impresses me, how true it seems, how wise, how tender, how far seeing, how infinitely moving and potent for better understanding and general, uplifting good. . . . So vividly humanized, so honest and thoughtful, of such high philosophic virtue, so amazingly sound, selfless, searching, interpretative and human. So lifelike, moreover, with its quaint cleverness and irrepressible glints of humor . . . the thing still grips me."—Chicago Herald.

"Mr. Britling Sees It Through is the most thoughtfully and carefully worked out book Mr. Wells has given us for many a year. . . . A veritable cross section of contemporary English life . . . admirable, full of color and utterly convincing."—New York Times.

"Mr. Britling Sees It Through is the most significant and impressive book which has come from Mr. Wells' pen. . . . A strong book that every reader must prize."—New York World.

"Now that Uncle Sam has decided to 'see it through' for himself, there is a new pertinence, for American readers, in the wonderful revelation of the British mind in wartime, made by Mr. Wells in the supposed mental experiences of 'Mr. Britling,' who may indeed be taken to represent not merely the author's personal viewpoint, but that of the whole British nation."—Review of Reviews, New York.

"It appealed to me because it so clearly shows that although this war is the most terrible of calamities, still perhaps it is not all in vain if it can so stir the soul as to make us see that God is needed in every heart and that he is not a distant and cold judge of mankind, but is a pulsing, throbbing, living Being, ever present and ready to lighten our burdens and cheer our way."—The Continent.

Straws That Break The Stomach's "Back"

How Wrong Food Combinations Tear Down Mental and Physical Energy

By V. O. SCHWAB

I WAS walking down Fifth Avenue, New York, last Friday and happened to overhear part of the conversation of two nicely dressed women walking directly behind me. "Gracious," remarked one, "I certainly must be suffering from stomach trouble or something. I had a delicious dinner—excellent in every way, from the steak, egg-plant and peas to the peaches and cream. And yet I don't feel strengthened one bit—in fact, I feel more weak, 'trembly' and listless than before I ate anything."

No wonder the lady was "weak, trembly, and listless." She did not know it—but if the very same foods she had put into her stomach were hermetically sealed in a glass retort the result would be a chemical explosion sufficient to burst the retort. Think what most people's stomachs have to contend with—it's no wonder we're half sick most of the time! Even chickens and cattle on the farm are fed "balanced rations" in order to insure highest efficiency. And yet we human beings pour into our stomachs a mixture of inharmonious foods that scientists declare produce 90% of all sickness.

That is why we suffer so generally from gastritis, stomach acidity, constipation, nervousness, liver and kidney troubles, and the scores of other diseases which decrease our stamina and make life miserable for so many of us. That is why the average life of man is only 39 years—and why kidney and liver diseases have increased over 103% in the last three years! That is why you yourself are often "draggy", listless, and "jumpy"! It's just a case of piling one wrongly composed meal upon the other until one final combination of disagreeing foods proves to be the "straw" that breaks the stomach's "back"—then you are sick, perhaps violently sick and—do not know why.

Foods That Fight

When you eat a combination of foods that are chemically opposed to each other (as you probably do each day), do you know what happens? If your stomach could talk it would probably not mince words in telling the burdens you place upon it. These inharmonious foods combat against each other inside your stomach for assimilation and digestion. Dangerous toxins (poisons) are liberated, then absorbed by the blood and carried all thru the body. The gradual result for you is decreasing efficiency, mental depression, continual attacks of stomach and gastric trouble, and other dangerous diseases. The final result is the total break-down of the whole system and the clogging of all the vital organs with poisonous sediment and fluids.

Corrective Eating the Answer

Corrective eating is the one big secret to perfect health, unquenchable energy, unbreaking stamina. But to eat correctly and healthfully you must select the right combinations of food, eat in accordance with the requirements of your particular physical condition, your age, your occupation, and the climate you live in. Of course, you cannot be expected to know instinctively just what is right to eat. But there is one man who can tell you exactly. He is the most famous food scientist in America and has studied for twenty years every phase of this vital question. He is Dr. Eugene Christian, F. S. D., the noted physician, who has helped more than 25,000 people from all over the world to regain their health, vigor, and usefulness in the world. So much interest has been displayed thruout the country in the wonderful results of corrective eating that Dr. Christian has written a set of 24 Little Lessons for the use of people unable to call at his office.

Examine Lessons Without Cost

These 24 Little Lessons are distributed for free 5-day examination by the Christian Herald thru the cooperation of the well-known Society which Dr. Christian himself founded, The Corrective Eating Society. The compact, pithy little books contain the boiled-down experience of Eugene Christian's twenty years' study of foods and their relation to health and efficiency. They give actual menus for your individual system, tell what you should eat to meet the requirements of your particular occupation, your age, your physical condition and the climate you live in. In fact, these 24 Little Lessons will show you within a short time, just what it is to enjoy perfect health and freedom from bodily pains.

In the course of life, you, as an average American, will sit down to about 46,020 meals. Your health, your success, energy, and even the length of your life depend upon how sensibly you indulge yourself during these numerous mealtimes. Give some thought to your eating—eat scientifically and correctly, as Dr. Christian teaches you. It will enable your stomach to serve you efficiently and well thru a longer lifetime.

Little Lessons in Corrective Eating and 52 Big Numbers of Christian Herald - Great Value for Only $3.00

After thoro investigation by the editors of the Christian Herald of the Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, by Eugene Christian, we take pleasure in making them available to our readers with our absolute endorsement. So convinced is the Christian Herald of the merits of these books, we will send the set on approval. Examine them for 5 days. If you decide to keep them, send us $3 within 5 days, and we will also send you the Christian Herald for one year (52 issues), regular price, $2.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

Prayers in Time of Struggle

THE tenseness of the world crisis has emphasized the necessity of prayer. With a call from both nation and church it seems an opportune time to marshal and train the spiritual forces as special intercessors. Those who believe that our hope is in God and that he alone can bring order out of chaos have the responsibility of properly directing the peoples in prayer. Pastors may not only call upon their people to pray, but teach them to pray, and direct them in their prayers. Perhaps interdenominational prayer conferences should be held in every community, and the subject of prayer fully discussed and special objects of prayer presented by some competent leader. The following appear to the writer as some objects which should constantly be kept in mind:

1. That as a nation we thank God for the gift of freedom, trust him for its continuance; that we may be true to the obligations it imposes, assist the oppressed in every way possible, and encourage all who are struggling against autocracy to look to him for help in securing justice, righteousness and an honorable peace.
2. That the church and nation make humble confession of sin, pray for forgiveness, acknowledge dependence on God, ask him to show us his will, and resolve by his help to take a firm stand for righteousness and do as he directs in all things.
3. That although Satan seems to have such great power, believers of all nations may stand firm in the faith, be true to God and his Word, and seek a revival that will exalt Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords.
4. That messengers of God may not be confused by the conditions of the world, but, as true ambassadors, faithfully proclaim his Word.
5. That chaplains and all Christian workers in the army and navy may be filled with the Holy Spirit and fully equipped to lead men to Christ.
6. That our President be safeguarded, supported, and guided in all his decisions, and in selecting such counselors as shall give him the best the nation affords.
7. That the President's cabinet and advisers, congressmen, and all in responsible positions also be given special strength and wisdom, and that the officers of the army and navy and all in the service be blessed and their lives protected, and be led forward to victory.
8. That a patriotic fervor may permeate the whole nation, producing a spirit of deep sacrifice and the devotion of our entire resources to the cause the Lord has committed to us.
9. That officers and judges be specially guided in dealing with criminals, enemies, and traitors, to the end that the guilty be restrained and properly punished, the innocent freed from suspicion and suffering, the safety of our citizens assured, our industries protected and prospered, and all hindrances to our government removed.
10. That we praise our Lord for the abundant harvests and boundless prosperity of past years, and humbly petition him for seasonable rains and all other favorable conditions, so that the efforts for an increased harvest may be successful.
11. That the same blessings we seek for ourselves may be granted to our Allies.

R. L. WARNOCK.

A Mother asks prayer for a wayward, sinful boy, who has wandered from home; also for guidance through a financial crisis.

Mrs. T. sends a clipping from a Texas newspaper describing the great suffering of the people of western Texas from a long-continued drought, and asks that these people be very specially remembered in our prayers weekly. She also asks prayer for a mother in Israel, seventy-eight years old, who is involved in troublesome litigation; that a neighbor, Mrs. N. T., may be restored to health, and that she herself may be filled with the Holy Spirit.

About a year ago a Reader asked prayers for a sick mother. Just after praying the mother improved and has been better than the petitioner had dared to hope at the time of writing. She now asks prayer for another afflicted member of the family.

"Patiently Waiting" prays that a friend may succeed in both business and spiritual life, and that the divine blessing may rest upon the arms of the Allies.

A Friend, thanking God for many answered prayers, prays for the safe return of a wounded soldier and the bodily healing of another friend.

Mrs. C. O. promised God that she would acknowledge his goodness before men if he would take away a serious trouble that was coming upon her. She now thanks God for hearing her prayer.

E. B. C., who is unable to mingle with God's people on the Sabbath, praises God for the comfort of his divine presence even on her remote farm.

Mrs. R. W. acknowledges the blessings received from prayers for a dear son, and another who with broken health seeks to break away from the past.

Mrs. Y. A. B. acknowledges God's goodness in the healing of an only daughter who through a serious operation had gone down into the very valley of the shadow of death.

Mrs. R. S., who in her ninety-fourth year is "walking on the King's highway," and praises God for the many answers to prayer in the past years, wants her name added to the roll of the League, and requests prayer for the dear children who have lost sight of Jesus.

A Mother asks prayer for our boys in Camp Joseph E. Johnston, Jacksonville, Fla.

Mrs. T. E. M., praising God for answers to prayer, still hopes and prays for more changes that will make this world a happier place to live in.

One hundred and twenty-four ask prayers for the healing of relatives and friends, including a Reader, that daughter may be restored to health and trust fully in the Lord; Mrs. E. L. G., that daughter may recover from serious breakdown from overwork; Mrs. F. D., that daughter may be cured of her nervous condition; R. E. D., that brother may be restored to health and trust in and pray to God; Frank O., that brother may be healed of a very bad case of autotoxemia, which is beyond medical aid; Mrs. N. M., that brother be cured of tuberculosis; R. E. D., that health may be restored so as to be able to take a journey; Mrs. E. McC., to be cured of nervousness; Mrs. J. T., to be cured of kidney and liver trouble and leakage of the heart; Mrs. H., to recover from stomach trouble and have perfect assurance of a home in heaven; W. H. G., to be cured of stoppage in speech; A Friend, that a soldier may be healed and return home; A. C. K., that a relative may be restored to health without undergoing an operation, and also that another may regain the entire use of her limbs, now partially affected; M. G., that face may be healed; E. P., that children, sister and self may be healed both physically and spiritually; A. C. K., that a friend may be cured of rheumatism and that he may have the use of his limbs and be able to walk again; N. H., to regain health and that faith may be strengthened.

Twelve ask for restoration of sight, among which two ask for the removal of cataracts; Mrs. A. E. H., that eyes and nerves may be restored and faith increased so that trust in God will be unflinching; Mrs. M. B. R., that eyes be healed without resorting to an operation, but if this is necessary that she may successfully undergo it.

Thirteen ask for the healing of mind of dear ones, especially a Reader, that a friend who is in the insane asylum may be cured and restored to her husband and little son; Miss G. H., that a friend recover from an attack of insanity and return to her mother.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. R. S., Hummelstown, Pa.; Mrs. A. L. B., Pitts, Ga.; A Mother; H. C., Waka-rusa, Kan.; Mrs. R. W., Clarendon, Vt.; Mrs. B. F. W., Glastonbury, Conn.; Mrs. S. M. B.; E. J. W., Attleboro, Mass.; Mrs. Y. A. B., Macomb, Ill.; A Reader; "Patiently Waiting," McPherson, Kan.; S. S., Toronto, Canada; A Devoted Mother; Mrs. T. E. M.; A Reader, Chino, Calif.; Mrs. C. O., Washingtonville, N. Y.; I. L. R.; Mrs. J. D. M., Henryetta, Okla.; J. W. K., Harlan, Ia.; Miss L. L., Ferndale, Ohio; N. M. L., Louisville, N. Y.; Mrs. E. V. E., Jamaica, N. Y.; A Friend, Grafton Center, N. H.; Mrs. W. E. G., Los Angeles, Calif.; E. B. C., Nottawa, Mich.; A Believer in Prayer; Miss E. McC., Ryan, Iowa.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

Bringing Home to Camp and Mill

By FRANCES L. GARSIDE

OUTDOORS, row upon row of plain wooden buildings, lying squat in dreary geometrical precision, the streets that stretch endlessly past the doors choking with dust, or ankle-deep in mud.

Indoors endless lengths of cots, chairs, tables, each mate of the one next to it, and each placed in exact juxtaposition with its neighbor.

"If I could only see something different," said a soldier who had been in camp several months; "If I could only see one of those beds turned a little to the left or to the right, or a table out of line, or a chair acting as if it were in a room instead of at a meeting of funeral directors, I'd feel less homesick. It's this sameness that is getting me."

Multiply these endless rows of buildings lying squat in dust or mud; increase the miles of cots and chairs and tables; add to this sameness of scene homesickness, physical suffering, apprehension, worry over the dear ones at home and a choking terror at the thought of the miles that lie between; throw in a dash of the recklessness that is born of depression, and you have a picture of an army camp broad.

Into these camps there are dropping with incredible rapidity, considering the obstacles to be overcome, a Hostess House here, and another there, and each doing for the soul of the homesick soldier what the physician's medicine does for his body.

The War Department requested houses where women friends who visited soldiers in the training camps could be entertained. The Hostess House was the answer.

One hundred and one Hostess Houses have been authorized—64 in operation and 37 under construction. Ten are for colored troops.

Early in the war French women added to the American Young Women's Christian Association for help. The answer was 64 war workers and more sailing almost weekly.

They conduct social and recreation work for French women among the munition workers of Lyons, St. Etienne and Bourges; for French women in government employ; for Americans to serve in the social rooms for nurses at Red Cross Huts at fourteen base hospitals; in the Hostess buses of Paris and Tours; conduct Hostess Houses for American Signal Corps girls; and maintain Hotel Petrograd in Paris for American war workers.

Eight workers in Russia established club centers for girls in Petrograd, Moscow and Samara. Thirty centers in America have been opened where foreign-tongued women may find friends at all times. Interpreters are placed in camps, others sent to visit women in their homes, and bulletins have been translated into twenty-two tongues on food and labor laws, insurance, and the care of children.

THE largest and most important of the Hostess Houses abroad is the one located in the Hotel Petrograd in Paris. This bit of home is supplied with hot and cold water, baths and steam heat, and will accommodate 225 guests. The rates are five francs a day up, and elsewhere in Paris one must pay from 70 to 11.50 francs a day for food not as wholesome, but as well cooked. Before this Hostess House was opened the American girl earning eighty dollars a month in Paris had to pay sixty dollars for bare living expenses.

Miss Blanch Geary, formerly economies specialist of the National Board, opened and started the house, Miss Margaret Cook of Smith College, is the manager and Miss Irene Armes is the hostess. Before these three there pass every day workers of the Red Cross, Y. W. C. A., the Fatherless Children of France, and every society organized to make life less cruel for the victims of war.

The bewildered American girl just arrived, who him so often on street corners before this place was opened that I grew ashamed to write my mother about him."

One day in the Hotel Petrograd there was noticed a young boy who sat in a corner chair all day. No, he wasn't there to meet some one; he wasn't hungry, thank you; no, it wasn't because he was sick or tired—"It's just this," he said impulsively, "I'm hanging around here in order to hear you women talk. It has been so long since I heard an English-speaking woman talk that I feel as if I were sitting among my folks back home."

THE Hostess Houses in the United States are built and furnished with none of the difficulties that attend the opening of a Hostess House abroad. All the skilled men in France are at the front, and there is left behind the worker who is crippled, or who is in some way deficient. The American works by time table; the Frenchman works by calendar. The plumbing in the buildings that are available is old and defective. The woman in charge of opening a Hostess House finds new problems every day from insurmountable red tape in the lease to a range that bursts the day the cafeteria is opened, and a kitchen range that has burst is one of the rare accidents a woman can't repair with a hairpin. She finds when she enters the shops for chintz for her cushions and draperies that she must arrange and re-arrange her colors with a rapidity that makes her brain feel like a store-house of broken bits of rainbow.

"I started out to make our dining room gray and old blue," writes one worker, "and wound up with it white and green, but it is restful looking, and I found some china with a little border of pale green and yellow to match."

She must sign bread cards and sugar cards, and be up ready to go to market by five. She must translate everything from fish to fudge in the English language, and she must be prepared at any hour for a drain on her cupboard and her sympathies.

"But, oh, the joy of giving one of our own American boys back from the front lines a real American pie, eaten from a table spread with a cloth, and with the girl who looks good to him! Within half an hour after he enters our door he is changed from a tired, wretched, homeless being into a heartened, normal man. They make for the Hostess House the first place after cleaning up."

There are pianos, victrolas, reading matter, easy chairs, flowers, bright colors and good lights. And a woman who speaks the English language, and whose cordial smile and handshake are just like home! There are clean, well ventilated sleeping rooms for the girls; a well-lighted cafeteria where good meals are served at reasonable prices, and there are the parlors and lounging rooms where the girl and boy in uniform may meet, safe-guarded from the uncertainties of the shadowy parks and bright lights of the streets.

Every Hostess House established abroad meets every requirement of the Hostess House in our own land, and solves greater and more complex problems. It transports a bit of home across the sea, keeping intact all the way a spirit of encouragement, sympathy and cheer.

When the Whistle Blows

HE was bent and gray and old. His working days were plainly over but he still found opportunity for service, for he carried in each hand a market basket filled with lunch boxes and tin pails.

"I come here every noon," he explained, "to bring luncheons for my granddaughters and some of the doesn't know if her modest request in broken French will result in producing her trunk or calling out the fire department, finds the Hostess House something more than a solution of her troubles; it is a home, even guessing the location of which she is spared, for there is some one from the Hostess House who speaks English who meets her at the train.

"Oh," said a nurse who had been on duty many weary hours, "it is a rest to get away from seeing beds, beds, beds. If this Hostess House does nothing more for me than to put me in better humor, that means a great deal to the patients in my care."

"A carpet! Now what do you think of that?" exclaim girls coming back from work at the front, and "Oh, dear," sighed a young girl one day, "I wonder if you know what it means to have a place to meet a boy friend again in a place like this. I had to meet neighbor girls. I like to do it; it makes me feel that even a man past eighty can do his bit, and then it is inspiring to be here when the whistle blows. It makes me feel sort of hurrah all over."

A moment later there was a shrill whistle. "Hear that!" he exclaimed. "Don't you notice that it doesn't sound as it did two years ago? It used to boom 'it's noon, it's noon, it's noon,' but now it sounds of more than hour and dinner; it sounds of strife and suffering and sorrow and victory."

The gates opened and there poured into the streets girls, and women, several thousand of them; and a few men.

"See all the women?" he called, as he turned away to meet a group of girls who were making straight for him with flying feet. "That old whistle is beginning to screech just like one of them."

Evidently he repeated his joke to the girls for they were laughing as they relieved him of his load and led him to a shady spot under a tree where a few minutes later a lunch was spread with all the zest of a picnic.

But when it rains? Or winter comes? And there are girls who have no one to bring them lunches from home and more girls who have no homes. How about them?

The Industrial War Service Center of the National Y. W. C. A. is the answer. Wherever there are munition plants or factories employing women, there is stationed or coming a club house for girls. That the girls welcome these centers is told in the steadily increasing popularity of every recreation center that has opened.

THE girl who comes through the open gate at noon has three-quarters of an hour for a lunch and rest. Running across the street and through an open door, she finds herself in a large, sunny room. There are dainty curtains at the windows, attractive pictures on the walls, plants in all the windows. She picks up a tray, gathers up her weapons of attack and takes her place in line before a steam table where she is served with her choice of soups, meats, vegetables, drinks and desserts at just what it costs to put them on her plate.

If she cannot afford this she has the privilege of bringing her own lunch and of eating it in lunch rooms upstairs where hot tea and coffee and ice cream and pies are served. She has a pleasant room in which to eat her lunch, a restroom, a library, a player piano at her service when her meal is over, and she makes use of all of them. There are couches for the girls who need rest. There's a shower bath. The only tax she pays for all these privileges is the modest little sum asked for her meals.

Just before the big munition plant gates open there arrive from some miles away in many instances groups of women in white who work hard till the last girl has gone and the gates have closed. This spirit of sacrifice and service has an influence on the girl that stays with her. "I always feel when I go out of here," said a girl in overalls, "as if I had been the five-cent dinner is served. After dinner, supposing this were a restaurant, there would be the streets. To counteract this lure, club activities were set in motion two weeks after the cafeteria was opened. The girls themselves became responsible for these movement after the clubs were organized. A club numbers one hundred and twenty members. They have supper then a forum during which they are given a fifteen minute talk. Usually the speaker is from overseas or perhaps the talk is on morality, hygiene or current events. This is followed by a business meeting and a seven o'clock two army officers give the girls military drill. After the drill they go into a class room where there are classes in French, First Aid, an Officers Training Class, and knitting. Friday night is part night, the clubs alternating in entertaining soldiers or sailors. The girls do their own decorating, plan their own refreshments, arrange their own programs and take complete charge. This gives them the feeling of being at home." Almost every "girl" has a brother, sweetheart, a husband or a son in service. They knit every spare minute in their brief hour out of the factory. "We do more than knit," said a young woman. "We put our hearts and soul into the munitions. Wouldn't you like myself, you have a husband and three brothers in service?"

There are over hundred young women at this recreation center, pitiful little war bride with babies the fathers have never seen. There are girls who are widowed, but who are still in their teens. Hopeful, happy, torn with fear and anguish, every face bears the same light of something just a little higher and better than what pay day will bring. There is a purpose in every countenance, a look that makes you, if you are a man, turn away and violently blow your nose and, if you are woman, cry without shame. It is the face of the woman behind the man behind the gun; the sort of woman the country needs and who must be kept sweet and pure for the man who is coming back to her some day.

best-loved member at a family reunion and that I just have to live up to the good opinion they have of me."

In the evening from 5:45 to 6:30 a straight twenty-

EVERY one knows that Christopher Columbus was not the first discoverer of America, that the continents were named for Amerigo Vespucci, and that Columbus died in the belief merely that he had found a new route from Europe to the East Indies.

But while the journeyings of Amerigo are all but forgotten and only his name remains familiar to the public, the fame of Columbus is immortal throughout the world.

Because Columbus was a man with a vision. He had a mighty ideal and a mighty perseverance toward its attainment. He opened the way to others more fortunate than himself. He piloted mankind to a new hemisphere not only of fabulous wealth but of unknown freedom and liberty. He visioned more than he accomplished, but he accomplished more than the world even yet is ready to realize.

Indeed, the landing of Columbus marked an era in the history of human liberty. For to the land he discovered came first the Pilgrim fathers in 1620, seeking for themselves liberty of thought and freedom of worship. One by one our colonies were founded upon the principles of freedom, and when a German king sitting on the English throne sought to abridge them we threw off his yoke by force of arms.

That revolution stimulated and encouraged the French revolution, and our example more than any other fact led to the establishment of the republic of France, which today for its heroism and devotion merits and enjoys the admiration of all Christendom.

The example set by the United States turned all of the great continent to the south of us into republican territory.

All these facts, and others correlated with them, are brought fresh to memory by President Wilson's selection of the 12th of October, the 426th anniversary of

The Vision and Inspiration of Columbus

Columbus's landing in the new world, to be Liberty Day.

"We know now," writes the President in his admirably phrased proclamation fixing this date, "more certainly than we ever knew before why freedom brought the great nation and government we love into existence, because it becomes clearer and clearer what great service it is to be America's privilege to render the world."

It was the vision of Columbus to circumnavigate the globe. What that vision meant in his day cannot be comprehended now. Men in general, the Church and most scientists could not believe the theory that the earth was round. He was a heretic, a lunatic, in the popular mind, and perhaps the indomitable persistence of the great navigator was best shown by the determination with which he combated the powerful influences and persuaded Her Majesty Isabella of Castile to furnish the funds for his voyage of exploration. He opened the way for all mankind to become one community. It has required four and a quarter centuries for mankind to rise to a full realization of that opportunity, but it is rising rapidly to it now. Principles of human right and liberty, born and tested and strengthened in the land to which Columbus led the way, are today circumnavigating the globe as swiftly and surely as the great admiral's vision swept around it.

Democracy, finding firmest footing and clearest expression in the new hemisphere, is extending to the darkest recesses of the old. The strongest and clearest wording of this new vision of a world-wide brotherhood is given by President Wilson in his New York speech opening the Fourth Liberty Loan:

"We still read Washington's immortal warning against entangling alliances with full comprehension and an answering purpose. But only special and limited alliances entangle; and we recognize and accept the duty of a new day in which we are permitted to hope for a general alliance which will avoid entanglements and clear the air of the world for common understandings and the maintenance of common rights."

In these trying times, when all worth while the mankind has wrought in the world is in the balance the vision and the perseverance of Columbus offer inspiration and example. It is well for us all to remember and keep fresh in mind, not on Liberty Day alone but all through this world war, how the sailor after the long voyage into an apparently boundless ocean mutinied; how Columbus pleaded for just three days more of advance, promising at the expiration of that time to put about and return to Spain; how his spirit was cheered by the sight of a drifting branch with leaves upon it, evidently fresh from some neighboring land; how a bird came across the waters where still no land appeared and perched in the rigging; and finally how at night came from the caravel Pinta the welcome hail of "Land Ho!" and a waving light across the waters showed the presence of human habitation.

Today in the new circumnavigation of the earth from West to East, a leader with still clearer, broader vision, and even more purposeful and indomitable is in command.

The minds of men today are clouded by ignorance and self-interest as of old. The way to universal freedom of the nations, great and small, is all uncharted. Storms rage, the compass sometimes falters and cowards would mutiny.

But the vision of our leader we believe to be divine and every true American will stand steadfastly by him to the triumphant end. CHARLES GRANT MILLER.

The President's Plan for Peace

THE Metropolitan Opera House of New York was densely crowded on the evening of September 27th, with an audience of representative men and women of the metropolis, who listened to the promised speech of President Wilson, with which it had been announced he would open the great drive for the Fourth Liberty Loan. In his opening sentence, however, the President said: "I am not here to promote the loan; that will be opened ably and enthusiastically by hundreds of thousands of loyal and tireless men and women who have undertaken to present it to you and to our fellow-citizens throughout the country, and I have not the least doubt of their complete success; for I know their spirit and the spirit of the country." He then devoted his address wholly to the uses of the war and the mission of this nation in bringing about a righteous and enduring peace. He said in part:

"At every turn of the war we gain a fresh consciousness of what we mean to accomplish by it. When our hope and expectation are most excited we think more definitely than before of the issues that hang upon it and of the purposes which must be realized by means of it. For it has positive and well-defined purposes which we did not determine and which we cannot alter. No statesman or assembly created them; no statesman or assembly can alter them. They have arisen out of the very nature and circumstances of the war. The most that statesmen or assemblies can do is to carry them out or be false to them. They were perhaps not clear at the outset; but they are clear now. The war has lasted more than four years and the whole world has been drawn into

The common will of mankind has been substituted for the particular purposes of individual states. Individual statesmen may have started the conflict, but neither they nor their opponents can stop it as they please. It has become a peoples' war, and peoples of all sorts and races, of every degree of power and variety of fortune, are involved in its sweeping processes of change and settlement. We came into it when its character had become fully defined and it was plain that no nation could stand apart or be indifferent to its outcome. Its challenge drove to the heart of everything we cared for and lived for. The voice of the war had become clear and gripped our hearts. Our brothers from many lands, as well as our own murdered dead under the sea, were calling to us, and we responded, fiercely and of course.

"The air was clear about us. We saw things in their full, convincing proportions as they were; and we have seen them with steady eyes and unchanging comprehension ever since. We accepted the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men either here or elsewhere had defined them, and we have accepted no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. Those issues are these:

"Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?"

"Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest?"

"Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice?"

"Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations or shall the strong do as they will and the weak suffer without redress?"

"Shall the assertion of right be haphazard and by casual chance, or shall there be a common concert to oblige the service of common rights?"

"No man, no group of men, chose these to be the issues of the struggle. They are the issues of it; and they must be settled—by no arrangement or compromise or adjustment of interests, but definitely and once for all and with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weakest is as sacred as the interest of the strongest. This is what we mean when we speak of a permanent peace, if we speak sincerely, intelligently, and with a real knowledge and comprehension of the matter we deal with.

"We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the governments of the Central Empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other governments that were parties to this struggle, at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest. They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We cannot come to terms' with them. They have made it impossible. The German people must by this time be fully aware that we cannot accept the word of those who forced this war upon us. We do not think the same thoughts or speak the same language of agreement."

Of the first importance, he said, is a thorough understanding. No peace can be obtained by any kind of compromise or abatement of the principles we have avowed as those for which we are fighting. "There should exist no doubt about that," he explained with emphasis. If the nations associated against Germany mean to achieve a secure and lasting peace, "it will be necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it," and ready and willing also to create the instrumentality by which it is to be made so. "That price," he said, "is impartial justice in every item of the settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice but also the satisfaction of the several peoples. That indispensable instrumentality is a League of Nations formed under covenants that will be efficacious. Without such an instrumentality, by which the peace of the world can be guaranteed, peace will rest in part upon the word of outlaws, and only upon that word. For Germany will have to redeem her character, not by what happens at the peace table but by what follows."

The League of Nations, he explained, is in a sense the most essential part of the peace settlement itself. It cannot be formed now. "If formed now it would be merely a new alliance confined to the nations associated against a common enemy. It is not likely that it could be formed after the settlement. It is necessary to guarantee the peace; and the peace cannot be guaranteed as an afterthought. The reason, to speak in plain terms again, why it must be guaranteed is that there will be parties to the peace whose promises have proved untrustworthy, and means must be found in connection with the peace settlement itself to remove that source of insecurity. It would be folly to leave the guarantee to the subsequent voluntary action of the governments we have seen destroy Russia and deceive Rumania."

Speaking with confidence and authoritatively, and representing the government's interpretation of its own duty with regard to peace, the President stated some of the particular features which will be needed to make the peace program practical and satisfactory;

First, an impartial justice must be meted out involving no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. "It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standard but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned."

Second, no special or separate interest of any single nation or any group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all;

Third, no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the family of the League of Nations.

Fourth, there can be no special selfish economic combinations within the league, no employment of any form of economic boycott or exclusion, except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the League of Nations itself as a means of discipline and control;

Fifth, all international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world.

Speaking confidently for the nation, the President said that "the United States will enter into no special arrangements or understandings with particular nations. Let me say also that the United States is prepared to assume its full share of responsibilities for the maintenance of the common covenants and understandings upon which peace must henceforth rest. We still read Washington's immortal warning against 'entangling alliances' with full comprehension and an answering purpose." But only special and limited alliances entangle; and we recognize and accept the duty "of a new day, in which we are permitted to hope for a general alliance which will avoid entanglements and clear the air of the world for common understandings and the maintenance of common rights."

The President then explained that he had made this analysis of the international situation, not because he doubted that the leaders of the great nations with whom we are associated were of the same mind and entertained a like purpose, but because every now and again "mists and groundless doubts and mischievous perversions of counsel arise." And he regards it necessary at such times to sweep all the irresponsible talk of such matters unceremoniously aside and say things in the plainest words that can be found. "Neither I nor any other man in governmental authority created or gave form to the issues of this war. I have simply responded to them with such vision as I could command. But I have responded gladly." The issues, he declared, are such as no man can pervert unless it be wilfully. "I am bound to fight for them, and happy to fight for them as time and circumstances have revealed them to me as to all the world. Our enthusiasm for them grows more and more irresistible as they stand out in more and more vivid and unmistakable outline."

He then referred to a peculiarity of the war, that while statesmen should cast about for definitions of their purpose, and seemed to shift their view-point, the thought of the multitudes whom they are supposed to lead "has grown more and more unclouded, more and more certain of what it is they are fighting for." National purposes have been disposed by the common purpose of enlightened mankind. "This is a peoples' war, not a statesmen's," he declared. "Statesmen must follow their clarified common thought or be broken." This is the significance of the fact that assemblies and associations of many kinds, composed of workaday people, have demanded and are still demanding that the leaders of their governments "declare to them plainly what it is, exactly what it is, that they are seeking in this war, and what they think the items of the final settlement should be." They are not yet satisfied with what they have been told. "The common people fear that they are getting what they ask only in 'statesmen's terms'—and terms of the territorial arrangements and divisions of power, and not in terms of broad-visioned justice and mercy and peace," or in any terms that will satisfy their deep-seated longings or that seem to them worth fighting a war that engulfs the world. He for one is glad he has tried to answer these questions coming from the people in the hope that he may make it clear that his one thought is to satisfy those who struggle in the ranks and who are entitled, above all others, to a reply in a language that can be understood. He hoped that the leaders of the governments with which we are associated will feel free to say whether he has in any degree mistaken any interpretation of the issues, or in his purpose in regard to the means for reaching a satisfactory settlement. Nothing can be obtained without unity of purpose and counsel. Our only effective answer to Germany's peace drives is to show that every victory of the nations associated against Germany brings them "nearer the sort of peace which will bring security and reassurance to all peoples, and make the recurrence of another such struggle of pitiless force and bloodshed forever impossible."

World Acclaims Wilson Leader

IN all quarters of the Allied and neutral world this speech was hailed as a new milestone toward ultimate justice. The Liberal of Madrid pronounced it the "noblest thing that has been thought or said since the beginning of the war." The Manchester Guardian, proclaiming President Wilson the natural leader of the nations, said: "He comes forward giving voice and coherence to the feeling and desire of plain men." In Chile, Argentina and Brazil the press united to pay tribute to the President's ideals, and in London the Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of the English Church, said: "With the straightness and force which we have learned to expect from him, President Wilson describes the character and vastness of the issues that are at stake."

The Good Fight of the Faith

A SERMON BY REV. F. BERRY PLUMMER*

TEXT—I Tim. 6:12. "Fight the good fight of the faith."

THERE is no subject in which the world's teeming millions have a greater interest at the present time than war. Every newspaper, magazine or religious journal that we read contains articles on war and shows the positions of contending armies. Wherever two or more people meet—on the street, in office, field, mine or factory, at political or religious gatherings—everywhere, war is the subject of conversation or discussion.

We do not have to search very far for the reason. It is because the world is at war. Four years ago, the German hordes were unleashed by their emperor, who had become obsessed by the dream of universal empire, and were sent forth on a campaign of frightfulness to destroy cathedrals, maim children and women, slaughter Armenians, enslave Belgian and French civilians, commit piracy and destroy the peace of the world.

This mad king's challenge was accepted by the liberty-loving peoples, and all the nations of the world are either at war or seriously affected by the war. Men are dying by legions; armies numbering millions are on the march; the economic, industrial, political, social and religious life of the world is being changed; a new world is being born, and we are just now in the throes of its birth.

This is why we think, talk, dream, pray and preach war.

BUT this war, inconceivably great as it is in its proportions, is simply one phase, one battle of another war, the age-long struggle between right and wrong; a war that began in the garden of Eden, that has been fiercely waged through all the succeeding ages among all the nations of the earth, causing untold misery and woe, and is destined to continue until the devil is chained in hell, the knowledge of Jehovah covers the earth as the waters cover the sea, and the kingdoms of the world become the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Paul refers to this spiritual warfare when he exhorts his young brother Timothy to "war the good warfare; holding faith and a good conscience; which some having thrust from them made shipwreck concerning the faith. . . . Fight the good fight of the faith" (I Tim. 1:18; 6:12). This exhortation seems very much in place today. While every patriotic citizen is planning how to relate himself effectively to the successful prosecution of the war in which we are engaged as a nation, we must also plan how to relate ourselves as Christians to the most effective prosecution of this age-long struggle against the forces of evil.

Fighting the good fight of the faith demands, first, a formal induction into the army of the Lord and a personal consecration of our talents, energies and faculties to his service. We must allow that spirit to take possession of us which possessed the One who said, "I came not to do my own will but the will of him that sent me." Just as the soldier swears allegiance to his country and his flag, and promises strict obedience to those in authority over him, so the Christian soldier must personally and wholeheartedly swear allegiance to the Captain of his salvation and to the Kingdom of God and the banner of the Cross.

FIGHTING the good fight of the faith demands a strict adherence on the part of the individual to the fundamentals of our holy Christianity. No one ever fights earnestly unless he has engraven on his heart certain great principles which he believes. Our Christian warfare is a fight for the faith. Paul emphasizes this in his letters to Timothy. "If thou put the brethren in mind of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Christ Jesus, nourished in the words of the faith and of the good doctrine which thou hast followed until now" (I Tim. 4:6). He speaks of the good fight of the faith and of some having erred concerning the faith (6:12, 21). He warns against Hymenæus and Philetus as "men who concerning the faith have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and overthrow the faith of some" (I Tim. 2:18).

The term, "the faith," was very clear to Timothy. He understood that it meant the doctrines preached by Paul, viz., the deity of Christ, the personality of the Holy Spirit, regeneration, salvation by faith, repentance, the vicarious sacrifice of Christ in the atonement, growth in grace, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, future reward and punishment, and the other great doctrines that Paul emphasized so strongly. Never has "the faith" been more perverted than today. Mormonism, German rationalism and higher criticism exert their influence over large numbers. Even some good Christians are allowing some of the most sacred doctrines in their creeds to be diluted with error. But salvation comes not through the individual's service or sacrifice, but through his personal acceptance of Jesus as his Saviour.

But it is not enough to believe aright. Faith without works is dead. The Christian's real duty is to live the Christian life; to make manifest to the world by his daily conduct the teachings and meaning and power of the Gospel. A pure life is a source of great power and influence in the fight against sin.

THE good fight of the faith can be carried on successfully only as individuals identify themselves with the Christian Church and live the Christian life. Organization is just as necessary to Christianity as the organization of individual soldiers into an army is necessary for the success of the cause for which they fight. Back of the effort to Christianize the world is the organized Church of Christ. Back of the Anti-Saloon League, with its wonderful victories which in a very short time will culminate in a dry America, is the organized Church. Back of every successful reform movement, back of the Red Cross and every other form of war relief, back of the world's educational institutions, orphanages, hospitals and countless other expressions of beneficence and charity stands the organized Christian Church. Loyalty to the Church is a powerful weapon in the fight for righteousness.

The nature of our enemy demands that we fully equip ourselves for this spiritual warfare and that we be valiant and good soldiers in the fight. The maxim of one of England's wisest generals was, "In time of war it is the worst mistake to underestimate your enemy and try to make a little war." This Christian warfare is no light matter. We are compelled to stand against the wiles of the devil; "against the principalities, against the powers, against the world rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places." Because of the fierceness of the warfare we must be fully armed. Ours must be girt with truth, righteousness must be our breastplate, and the gospel of peace the protection for our feet. The shield of faith, the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit are necessary before our armor is complete.

The deeds of heroism of the Christian soldiers of the twentieth century ought to match the heroic deeds of the Christian soldiers of other centuries. The spirits of men like Polycarp, Ignatius, Hus, Ridley, Latimer, Luther, Wesley and Otterbein hover about us. The challenge to heroism to those who wage the spiritual warfare is even greater than those engaged in carnal warfare.

MANY are the rewards that come to those who successfully contend for the faith. All armies have special decorations and medals of honor for chivalrous conduct on the field of battle, but what are these when compared to the rewards of the Christian? One of the greatest of these is a consciousness of duty well done. At the beginning of the naval battle of Trafalgar, Nelson from his flagship "Victory" sent this message to his men: "England expects every man to do his duty." Shortly afterward he was struck down by a musket shot. Just before he died he looked into the face of Captain Hardy and said, "I have done my duty; thank God for that." Paul, the Christian warrior, triumphantly shouted before his coronation, "I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith." The greatest reward of all is the crown of eternal life which shall be given to us by the Saviour himself.

Stand up, stand up for Jesus.
The strife will not be long;
This day the noise of battle.
The next the victor's song;

To him that overcometh,
A crown of life shall be;
He with the King of glory
Shall reign eternally.

Christian soldiers of the twentieth century, you are in a worthy cause. You are commanded to take the world for Jesus Christ. Let your Christianity be militant and aggressive. Fight the good fight of the faith. Be good soldiers of Jesus Christ.

General Pershing Asks for Our Best Ministers

GENERAL PERSHING is trying to shape up the best army the world has ever seen, and he realizes the importance of having the best chaplains in that army. He knows that our men are arrayed against a mightier army and a more efficient army than any we Americans have previously opposed. He knows it is necessary to have a better morale in our troops than in the opposing force. Perhaps no one in the service has so direct an influence on the morale of the troops as has the chaplain.

Dr. Macfarland, Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, has recently returned from France where he had some interviews with General Pershing. He quotes the General in one conversation as follows:

"Ask the churches to send their very best ministers as chaplains, as they are very important influences in the highest efficiency of the army. The men under them need all kinds of help. They sustain the men especially at the most critical times when they need help the most. I thank the churches for the men they have sent."

It is a big undertaking to maintain the morale of our army in France. It is not so difficult now while our men are arriving there, and while those who have had sufficient preparation are engaged in a winning offensive. But when the boys realize that the war will last longer than the few months they expected, and when they realize that they are going against the most efficient machine the world has ever known, and when they find it impossible to get furloughs back to America, then will be their testing time. Our government is making every preparation in advance to meet the strain. The Church must do its part. Perhaps the most direct method by which the Church may do its part, is by giving the army her best ministers for chaplains as General Pershing requested.

Word comes frequently about the good success of those who are now in the service. One at a large cantonment in the Middle West writes, "The attendance at all regimental services is beyond our expectation." A hospital chaplain in one of the cantonments reports that he has from six to ten conversions every Sunday, and baptizes some soldiers every week. A candidate who has just become a chaplain wrote recently, "My work here as camp pastor goes well. Last month I baptized thirty, last Sunday night fourteen, and have others who are waiting baptism. One young man walked eighteen miles to be baptized, and two boys rode on horse back forty miles in one day to follow their Lord in baptism." A navy chaplain writes, "I held church out on the parade ground three Sundays because the Y. M. C. A. building would not hold them all."

The Federal Council of Churches working through chaplain committees of the denominations is doing everything to get the right type of men. Among those they have recently offered to the Department is one who has had successful experience for six years as chaplain in the Canadian militia. Some of the men, although without experience in the chaplaincy, have had valuable training for it in other types of executive religious work. One who will probably receive appointment, taught for some years in college in Japan, and was with the Japanese army eleven months during the Russo-Japanese war. I was later an executive secretary for the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and an executive secretary for the Men and Religion Forward Movement in the great campaigns. He is a cornetist of ability and had experience in leading music for many large assemblies. The War Department recently appointed a man who has a pastorate with twenty-three hundred members. Another is serving a church that pays $6,600. This means more than a salary of $6,600, the army, but he gives it up for a salary of $2,000 as first lieutenant. Several of the chaplains have had experience, some of them more than a year, as camp pastors and Y. M. C. A. secretaries. One is the deacon of a college which has sent hundreds of fine young men into the ministry. Three who have lately become chaplains had been selected by their denominations to serve on the denominational War Commission.

It is evident that the Church is trying to do its best in the selection of chaplains, and as the new men arrive in France, the Senior Headquarters chaplain at Paris sends word back that they are of the right type.

The Divine Ministry of Displacement

SUNDAY, October 13. Isa. 55 : 13. "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fig-tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree." These words unveil one of the great ways of our God. He displaces one thing by another. The fir comes up in strength and fills the place that was occupied by the thorn. The myrtle appears in vigor and makes its home in the bed of the briar. And so it is in the soul of man. God crowds out one thing by another, and the first thing withers away. He imparts his own spirit, and the new spirit excludes the old temper. He gives a vision, and some prejudice dies. He plants a royal virtue, and some miserable vice disappears. That is how the Lord makes his gardens. It is the wonderful process described in Dr. Chalmers's famous and familiar phrase, "The expulsive power of a new affection."

And so it becomes clear what a harrowingly disappointing way it is to try to create a garden in the spirit by merely pulling up the weeds. I read this counsel in a book of devotion: "Pull up one fault a week, and what a clearance there will be in the course of the year!" It is disastrous advice, and there will be no end of heartache at the close of the year. In the first place, who knows what his faults and vices really are? There are some which the Bible describes as "presumptuous." Anybody can see them because they are so glaring. But there are others which the Bible describes as "secret," and their hiding-place is as intricate as a rabbit warren. "Who can discern his errors?" Who can tell just where they are?

There is nothing for it but to hand over the thorny, stony desert to the Lord. "Here is the wilderness of my life! I surrender it to thee, most holy and gracious Lord!" And the good Lord accepts the surrendered desert. The first thing he does is to renew the soil by the mighty enriching energies of his grace. And then he plants his new growths. He plants the vigorous word of his truth, and the thorns and briars of falsity are smothered in its presence. He imparts his own peace, and there is an end of the thorns of selfish distraction, and there is an end of the briars of ill-temper and discord. And he gives his own joy, and the thorns of discontent cannot live beside it, and the briars of moroseness and bitterness pass away. That is the great secret of the transformed wilderness. It is our part to abide in the great Gardener, and he will make his own garden. J. H. J.

What Life Consists In

MONDAY, October 14. Luke 12 : 15. "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things which he possesseth." In these words Jesus strikes at the popular error of all ages—the belief that life consists in things. For nothing are we under deeper obligation to Christianity than for this, that it corrects our easy views of life. Since the first man started heavenward, there have been two conflicting ideals of life: one teaches that life's values are in the things we get and keep; the other holds that the chief end of man is to develop his highest powers, to live in a way of that which is beneath him, in love of those who are around him, and in reverence for That which is above him.

Jesus introduces these words with a warning against covetousness, following it with the parable of the rich fool. The man in the parable was a fool not because he was rich, but because he believed he could satisfy his soul with mere things. Souls are not satisfied with chattels. No one of us begins to live until he discovers his interior resources of satisfaction in the employment of his highest faculties. The cure for covetousness is not in the discouragement of commerce, but in the encouragement of a livelier commerce between earth and heaven. Jacob's ladder held "angels ascending and descending." Some of the angels were coming down, and some were going up. That means commerce between earth and heaven. Life at its best consists in the abundance of things we love and love and do. C. C. A.

The Seeking for Grace

TUESDAY, October 15. I Peter 1 : 13. "Hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." A Christian life is not only a product of divine grace, but a constant reaching out for and appropriating of grace. The three cardinal virtues which Paul has named—faith, charity, and hope—are all related to grace. Faith springs from the operation of grace, and exists by holding on to the grace which produced it. The love, or charity, by which faith manifests its presence to men is divine grace reduced to works of holiness. Hope, the correlate of faith in our present blessings, rests on and is fed by that same word of grace on which the Christian's faith is built, and makes the grace which shall be obtained in glory at the coming of the Lord its cherished object and the goal of its yearning. In trying times, when the strength of Christian principles is tested to the utmost, in seasons when the feeling of his unworthiness and the perception of his daily deficiencies overwhelm the individual Christian, he is compelled by the forces of evil without and within himself to engage in a fierce struggle to maintain his confidence in the divine promises. His hope becomes dim and faint. The suggestion that his expectation of the reward promised him is a baseless one becomes very strong and may bring him to the point where he is ready to throw away his hope entirely. Hence the apostle's admonition to "hope to the end." The evils of the present life are not the end but only an incident in our pilgrimage. They are, however, related to the end, inasmuch as they are tests of the constancy of our faith in every word that God has spoken and of that calm assurance with which the Christian awaits the outcome of all the perplexing issues of the present life. W. H. T. D.

Dallying With Dangers

WEDNESDAY, October 16. Hosea 12 : 8. "And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich; I have found me out substance; in all my labors they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin." Often men have greater faith in themselves and their acquirements than in God. This is when they have much goods laid up for many years and are well contented with their own accumulations, but are blind to their inward sin. They boast themselves in their evil pleasure that they can soon leave it off when they see the habit getting too strong. What confident cleverness in the midst of rioting passions! Gambling, drinking and lustfulness are undermining the soul, while they are all unconscious of the danger. Walking on the verge of the gulf of ruin, they fail to realize that it is but one step more out of life into the eternal future.

What presumptuous sinners we are, presuming on God's mercy and on our own finite strength to resist! Other men may be weak, but not we ourselves. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." If we listen, we could hear the heavenly Father saying, "O Ephraim, Ephraim! how can I give thee up!" But, unalarmed, we continue to dally with danger, dying with maladies, at the same time fondled by society and praised by false friends. We presume that the poisonous serpents of sin will not bite; that the flames of passion will not burn; that the strength of will will not fail.

The cemeteries are full of people of similar confidence, who, always on the down grade, never turned an upward look toward God in Christ, who alone could rescue them and guide them in the way everlasting. How many Ephraims are secretly borrowing money from the bank or cash drawer with the good intention of paying it back after they win in their investments! But, alas, they lose. The home and family are disgraced by the proud-spirited man who never expected as a criminal to inhabit the walls of a prison. E. W. C.

Christ and His Critics

THURSDAY, October 17. John 7 : 20. "The people said, Thou hast a devil." The wisest Man that ever lived, the purest, the best, the all-perfect, did not escape criticism. Some said he was a madman, some affirmed he was possessed of devils, and others even made bold to accuse him of being a glutton and a winebibber. If the flawless character of the Son of Man was not free from calumny, who are we that we should expect to escape unjust criticism? From the cruel things which were said of Jesus, we should learn to analyze criticism before accepting it as conclusive; to be patient under calumny, and not to engage in accusation without full knowledge of the facts in the case. He was a wise man who advised his scholars to ask three questions before they indulged in personal criticism: Is it true? Is it kind? Will it serve any good purpose to repeat it?

The faculty of criticism is not a high one. It is destructive rather than constructive. We are not unjust when we describe a critic as "one who dislikes the things that he dislikes more than he likes the things that he likes." Not always are critics mercenary, but in the cases of the critics of Jesus and of Paul they often were. The Gadarenes besought Jesus to depart from their coast because they were afraid his presence would interfere with their commerce in swine. The mob at Ephesus cried out against Paul because the people foresaw the effect of the Gospel upon their trade in idols. Not always is the motive of criticism selfish. Sometimes simple lack of judgment is responsible for it. Those who said to Jesus, "Thou hast a devil," did not consider how often he cast out devils. "A house divided against itself can not stand." In every age of the world idealists have been called madmen. Every great reform has been the triumph of an "absurd enthusiasm." When they said of Jesus, "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them," they told the truth. It is the glory of the church that its founder did and does receive sinners. How effective was his answer to this objection! "They that are well need no physician." C. C. A.

The Great Salvation

FRIDAY, October 18. Isa. 19 : 20. "He shall send them a Saviour, and a great one." Heb. 2 : 3. "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" Thus both Testaments emphasize the greatness of Jesus: the one, the greatness of his person; the other, the greatness of his work. Elsewhere (Isa. 9 : 6) Isaiah muses on the wonderful personality of the Child that is the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, and the Prince of Peace. The two natures in Christ, the divine and the human, united in one person, make him indeed a "wonderful" being. As the God-man, as God manifest in the flesh, he has accomplished all that was necessary for the redemption of fallen man. In his saving work is embraced the entire race of Adam. He is not a national hero, whose life-work redounds to the benefit only of his compatriots, but he is the world's deliverer. He is come, not to redress the political wrongs which a small nation has suffered at the hand of a powerful aggressor, or to alleviate the temporal sufferings of a few men, but to remove the curse from all the children of men, to restore them to a right relation with God, to reclaim their souls from misery and despair. The salvation which he has achieved is an everlasting salvation, and those who believingly embrace his work as rendered in their place shall not be ashamed or confounded, world without end. The individual sinner is bidden to look to him for the comfort of forgiveness every time he has sinned against God. If we sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, who is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world. From him we derive the strength necessary for our battling with sin in a world that is steeped in wickedness. If we have him in our hearts, we are stronger than all our foes, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against us. We are promised the ability to do all things by his enabling grace. What God has done for the world through Jesus is his last act of mercy to fallen sinners. W. H. T. D.

Power of Little Things

SATURDAY, October 19. John 6 : 9. "There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?" If any one will do his best to use what talent he has, he will be successful. What matters it how small the lad or the loaves when we place our all into the hands of the Christ? He can multiply our power and gifts till they will bless thousands. Therefore we should never forget to rightly estimate the riches of the Silent Partner in our firm.

St. Martin, upon entering a certain city, saw a beggar asking alms. Having no money to give, he took his knife and cut his cloak in half, giving the beggar one of the halves. That night he had a dream. He saw Jesus, who had on his shoulders the half of his cloak he had given to the beggar, and he heard the sweet words, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me." Our little gifts go a great way when they reach the Master. He increases our influence and our charities till they become worldwide, blessing the giver with joy and the multitude with plenty. He will make our little efforts by his miraculous power work together for the greatest good.

How much did earth's poor ones leave? Elijah let fall an old mantle for Elisha as the chariot rolled him up the avenues to his mansion. Jesus left a seamless coat, but not even that could his weeping mother take for herself. Paul left a holy life and the immortal Epistles, worthless to those who refuse to follow his example. Lazarus left a worn-out body at the rich man's gate when the angels bore him away to the palace of the King. The apostles and martyrs left bleeding bodies for glorified spirits. Wondrous exchange! Having nothing, yet possessing all things; poor, yet making many rich! E. W. C.

The Church and the League of Nations

OVER in England, the Church is receiving some pretty sharp criticisms for its failure to identify itself with the program for the creation of a League of Nations. H. G. Wells, the famous author of several books dealing with the religious lessons of the war, has published what is regarded as a notable rebuke to the religious world generally, and more especially to the British churches, for the blindness to the need of such an organization. Rev. Dr. Silas Hocking, another popular author—though of a different type, being broadly evangelical—has challenged public attention by the charge that no organized or sustained effort has yet been made to bring the Church into line with President Wilson's great idea. He reminds us that the objective of the League is "essentially religious." It aims at the realization of the Christian ideal. Yet there is not on record any act or pronouncement by the Church to show even sympathy, much less open approval and support of the project. A few scattering resolutions adopted by individual churches hardly alter the case. As a whole, the Church has passed it by, consenting that it should be left entirely in the hands of statesmen and politicians, to decide a question involving the highest spiritual hopes and ideals of the Christian world and one, moreover, that should challenge its interest and admiration and claim its strongest support. This is Dr. Hocking's summary of the situation:

For myself, I see no hope for the Church or the world unless, when peace comes, it is linked up with a League of Nations for the prevention of future wars. Without such a league, the terrible and devastating struggle through which we are passing will be in vain. The nations will begin to arm again, directly peace is declared, on a more extensive scale than ever. Conscription will become permanent and universal. Science will devote its energies to finding out new methods of destruction. Taxation, instead of diminishing, will increase. Militarism will be triumphant everywhere. . . . Now is the Church's great opportunity. Here, at last, is the hope and promise of a new order. Will the churches rise to the occasion, or will they go on squabbling over orders and vestments and the frillings and fripperies of ecclesiasticism?

Our own churches, like those overseas, need to be awakened. They may not be like those of which the British authors write as being "up against a dead weight of hidebound conservatism, vested interests, secret treaties and international jealousies." Yet the great majority of our churches are unresponsive to the loud call which is sounding throughout the world for them to take their place in the front rank of the spiritual battle for a new and better world order after the war. The present attitude of our church leaders today, with certain notable exceptions, is reminiscent of the course pursued at certain stages of the great struggles against slavery and intemperance. Now that even greater issues are at stake, it would be a lamentable thing if divisions and jealousies and other causes combined to make the Church hesitate until the great opportunity has passed.

The Great Liberty Loan Drive

WITH boundless enthusiasm, the great nationwide campaign for the Fourth Liberty Loan is under full headway toward complete success. Addresses by men from the fighting front are again a dominant feature, and stirring patriotic music and brilliant parades are heard and seen everywhere. All over the country the home fires are aglow with the light of genuine enthusiasm. It is the time for us all to show ourselves one hundred per cent American by doing our bit "to the uttermost" to help win the war.

To "save and lend to the Nation" is the universal duty of the hour wherever our flag flies. We have done well in the previous loans in buying Liberty Bonds. Now that the crisis of the war has been reached, let us not hesitate, but give our brave armies at the front all the support they can possibly need. In the Allied countries the populations are making such sacrifices as we do not have to face. It is true we have suffered hardships on account of the war, but they are as nothing in comparison with those in any other of the belligerent nations. Yet the whole hope of the world is today centered upon this republic. They look to us to save civilization. Through the heroism of our brave Americans, many of whom have yielded up their lives in the struggle, the tide of battle has been turned against the Huns. Overwhelming victory is in sight. They look to us for all the material aid we can give to win the war and bring abiding peace to the world.

No one with a spark of the true American spirit in his make-up can refuse to grant the help they need now.

Our government has made the terms of the Loan so simple that all can help. A Liberty Loan bond, as well as being an expression of patriotism, is the best of all investments. Save your money by Liberty Bonds. Put every dollar you can into the great aggregation of millions of other patriotic citizens. Don't mind if it pinches you. Your reward will be all the more precious, for in the years to come you will be glad a thousand times over that you responded to the country's call and at the great crisis helped to win the war and save the world from devastation by the Hunnish hordes and to bring in the new era of freedom, justice, and enduring peace.

A Dry Nation Next July

THE Senate put a long nail in the coffin of John Barleycorn by the passage of the war prohibition bill, and on Sept. 23 the House put another nail into the coffin by accepting that bill by a vote of 171 to 24.

The liquor people died hard in the last ditch. They fought desperately to allow the importation of wines till May 1, 1919, the date on which the manufacture of beer, wines, etc., is stopped in the bill. They cried pitifully that treaties with France, Italy, Spain, and Portugal, vine growing countries, would be broken, and that Secretary Lansing had joined in their request. The members of Congress, knowing how out of patience their constituents are at the flimsy subterfuges of the liquor men, by a vote of more than five to one refused the plea and decreed that importation of wine should cease on the signature of the bill by the President. The friends of temperance in the House claimed that the paramount treaty with our Allies was to win the war, that War Prohibition was necessary, and that the wine of the vine-growing countries in Europe or America was a hindrance to speedy victory.

The manufacture of beer, wine, etc., will end Dec. 1 next, and the present bill stops all traffic in any kind of liquor on July 1, till the end of war and of demobilization. Three-fourths of the State Legislatures will ratify national Prohibition, and the colossal evil that has cursed the world for 6,000 years will have been killed forever in our land. This was foreshadowed in "King Alcohol Dethroned," published this year by the Christian Herald.

No one rejoices more, nor has a better right to rejoice at the downfall of alcohol than this paper, which from its first issue till now has been a positive, persistent enemy of the liquor traffic and has demanded and worked for National Prohibition.

The Teutonic Unrest

IT has just begun to dawn upon the German mind that the propaganda of the Allies is spreading throughout the Teutonic lands at an alarming rate. They are paying the Teutons back in their own coin. What is more dangerous in German eyes is that, according to the Lokal-Anzeiger of Berlin, the growing demand for the democratization of the government has its origin in American influence. That journal says the American elements have apparently succeeded in establishing the conviction "that President Wilson's motives are pure and that he has the real welfare of the German nation at heart." Such a conviction, of course, could not be permitted to find root, as it would be fatal to public confidence in the professions of Junkerism.

Again, in the Vorwarts of Berlin, we read: "If eventually the Socialists enter the government—and such a time will come—they will do so in order to fulfill their great historic mission of helping peace and altering the present government's policy in accordance with their convictions of what the people need."

Other newspapers comment in a similar tone. The Rheinisch Westphalian Gazette says: "The motives for the note from Austria are multiple, but the refusal is unanimous. The Allied war cry is not one of boasting or bluff, but comes from the heart. We must recognize this fact, and also that it is justified, as the enemy must know our serious position while all offers of peace come from us."

All of which may be regarded as indicative of the great change that is now taking place in the German mind. It may also be taken as pointing the way to a new peace drive at no distant date.

Chancellor von Hertling went so far as to state that he was ready for peace, based in principle upon President Wilson's fourteen points. This statement, according to an Amsterdam cablegram, was made in the Chancellor's speech in the Main Committee of the Reichstag on September 24. "As you are aware," said the Chancellor, "deep discontent has seized upon wide circles of the population on account of the sufferings and deprivations the war has brought. . . . Our last offensive did not bring the success we hoped. . . . The situation is grave, but there is no cause to faint-hearted." And more to the same point.

Such admissions, following a succession of disaster on all the active fronts, Balkan and Near East included, reveal a hopeless state of mind in the nation, which is doubtless less due to propaganda influence than to the tremendous events that are now taking place. The only hope of allaying the growing unrest in both Germany and Austria lies in the old trick of granting reforms, which has already been used as prelude for a peace drive; hence, another movement in that direction is looked for before snow flies.

The Government and the Packers

THERE has been a good deal of discussion about the recommendation of the Federal Trade Commission that the government take over the stock yards, the stock cars, the refrigerator cars and distributing houses of the large packers. It has been said that Food Administrator Hoover may resign if the government carries out the full recommendation of the Federal Trade Commission. Mr. Hoover, who long ago declared "Food will win the war," is probably in a better position than any other man to know the value of the packing industry in this crisis. He is a man of sound, practical ideas, and we believe that a government which is dealing with practical problems will weigh the testimony of experience against the scales against theory.

No industry in the country has played a more important part in helping to win the war than the packing industry. In fact, those in a position to know have even gone so far as to state that, had it not been for the organized efficiency of the big packing plants, the Allies might have had a different story to tell at the time when we were able to put our forces into the war. But for the efficiency in handling the colossal output of products needed, our help might have been too late. It has been a tremendous task to feed the Allied armies and nations in addition to our own population. Germany did not think we could do it.

This is not the time to experiment on a matter that is so vital. An organization that has shown itself efficient, and which has responded on every occasion in the spirit of cooperation and self-sacrifice, should not be crippled at such a critical time.

Sacred Memories Revived by the War

GENERAL ALLENBY'S splendid victory in Palestine is growing daily. It is one of the most spectacular events of the entire war. In the sweep of the conquering Allies, the battlefront has passed over many places that are sacred in the associations and which have been in other years centers of interest to multitudes of pilgrims. Nazareth, now occupied by the British cavalry, is recalled by Bible readers because of its association with the Saviour's boyhood, for it is "the place where he was brought up." There he studied under the Jewish schoolmasters, and there, as he grew older, he taught in the synagogue. Many times has war swept over the little town. It has alternately been taken by Romans, Greeks, Crusaders, Franks and Moslems. Amid all its varying fortunes it has remained very much the same. After every fresh incursion, it was partially rebuilt, and during the Crusade occupation it was glorified with beautiful churches. Although in Moslem hands it declined in importance, yet many of the places rendered sacred through the memories that linked them to the time of Christ are still pointed out to the visitor.

We read in the dispatches also of the wide sweep of the war circling about Mounts Tabor and Carmel and along the shores of the Sea of Galilee. Once more there was a guard at the fords of the Jordan and the password was not "shibboleth" but "surrender." And the Turks who have made the land desolate and suffering such disasters as were prophesied by Ezekiel against Edom.

The hope of Christendom for a thousand years is being achieved. The Holy Land is torn at last from the hands of the Moslem. With the major part of Palestine now safely in Christian hands, we may look for a great work of restoration which will make it flow once more with milk and honey, which will bring back its fertility and its prosperity.

Last Tributes to Otto Koenig

A LARGE audience gathered in the Stephen Merritt Chapel, 223 Eighth Ave., New York, on Friday afternoon, September 27, for the funeral services of the late Otto Koenig, publisher of the Christian Herald. A very large proportion of those present were relatives of the deceased and personal friends of the family.

Pastor William F. Schoenfeld of the Evangelical Lutheran Immanuel Church, New York, preached the funeral sermon, from the text Jer. 31:3; "I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee." The preacher, who had been a lifelong friend of the deceased, spoke of his outstanding traits of character, which "were beyond a doubt a strong sense of justice, deep conscientiousness in the use of all his God-given faculties and powers, and a great generosity of heart of the type enjoined by Jesus, not letting the left hand know what the right hand is doing. No more powerful testimony for his justice, his fairness, and true brotherliness can be asked for than is furnished by the deep affection of all his co-workers and employees, down to the lowliest. The benefactions of the Christian Herald are known to all the world. But only those nearest to him knew of the amount of his personal benefactions and how cheerfully these were made. The nobility of his character as a man, a citizen, a friend, as attested by both the number and the character of his friends and associates. It may with propriety be pointed out as an incitement and encouragement to all young men with honest ambition, that it was by his indefatigable industry and by faithful adherence to the highest moral principles that he rose to his eminent and influential position, gained a really great success—a success not measured by dollars and cents, but by the power of beneficent service to his fellow-men, rendered according to his own light.

"It was my privilege to enjoy his confidence and no man ever opened his soul to me who revealed a more intense devotion to the principles of democracy. For him, America's democracy was America's glory. For his country he was willing to make every sacrifice, as was evidenced by his voluntary enlistment in the Spanish-American war. The terrible war now raging, with the unspeakable suffering brought by it upon so many millions of men, women and children, caused him deep suffering and this because there was in his heart not only love for his countrymen, but for all mankind. Otto Koenig's love for humanity extended to all countries and included all of God's creatures everywhere."

Passing to the spiritual characteristics of the deceased, the preacher referred to his soul-experience. The preacher said that after undergoing a soul-experience such as many others had undergone, "a great change had been wrought in him. Most significant were his confessed love for the Word of the Lord, and his habit of going to church, and his great desire that the Christian Herald should stand for a positive Christianity. When his last sickness came, conscious of his serious condition, he assured his friends that he was not afraid to die. Such a statement, from the type of man to which he belonged, means much. . . . No man, with the knowledge of God's justice in his heart, can honestly declare himself unafraid of death, unless assured of his deliverance from all sin in God's sight, of justification by Him and reconciliation to Him. This then is the reason why I have with all confidence applied to our departed friend the words of our Lord, assured that in him, too, His great love had proved itself victorious and achieved its end.

"Let us then not be engrossed by the vain and evanescent things of this world, or give ourselves up to a false hope of a paradise restored on this earth, but let us seek the peace eternal, the peace with God through Him who for us has fulfilled all righteousness

WE who have worked beside him know that he Could laugh and joke and listen tenderly.
We always felt his strength, his latent power,
Yet we have seen him bend above a flower
With smiling eyes. And we have seen him go
To any length to ease another's woe!

We who have worked beside him know that when
He suffered most he still helped fellow-men,
And held the reins of business in his hands,
And heard the wistful call o. other lands.
We know that, with his gaze fixed straight ahead,
He filled his place. And now that he is dead,

We who have known him have no word to say.
We only feel a heavy loss, this day—
We only feel a bitter loneliness
That he himself, perhaps, would never guess.
We only feel the tears begin to start—
For we who worked beside him knew his heart!

M. E. S.

and blotted out all our sin. O God, in mercy give us to see Thy great love for all the children of men revealed in Christ and by that love draw Thou us all unto Thee."

A solo, "I Know that My Redeemer Liveth," was excellently rendered by Mrs. A. Thom.

Several memorial addresses were delivered by other speakers. Rev. Dr. Iglehart told of his acquaintance with the deceased and spoke touchingly of the ties of love that had bound him to all of his friends and associates. "I take a flower," he said, "whitest with truth and righteousness, and a flower reddest with love, and I lay them on the bosom of this man as he lies so peacefully there, and I say: 'The day's work is over; farewell, my friend! Farewell! till the meeting in the morning.' The estimates of Pastor Schoenfeld and of the Editor of the Christian Herald are just, and I offer this brief tribute to the intellectual ability, the education, the indomitable industry, the veracity, the incorruptible integrity, the large-heartedness, the generosity of our dear friend. He was loyal to his family, to his friends, to the common people, to the great paper of which he was the head, and to the Kingdom of Christ, which he did so much to promote. Otto Koenig is not dead; he lives! He lives! These beautiful flowers, the exquisite expression of human love, that have been brought in such profusion, are the symbols of the realm of beauty he has entered where flowers never fade and summer never ends. If there were no heaven, the God of truth, of justice and of love would make one for such a man. May God bless this sister and the brother, and this nephew on whose shoulders has fallen the mantle of a father, and upon the nieces and nephews he loved so well, upon this young chaplain in his country's service, upon the great Christian Herald family, and upon us all, for Jesus' sake!"

The Editor of the Christian Herald, in behalf of the staff of that paper, paid his tribute of love, appreciation and respect to the memory of Mr. Koenig, in a few brief remarks.

Rev. J. G. Hallimond, the president of the Bowery Mission, spoke feelingly of his acquaintance with the deceased and of the great love and sympathy he had shown for the unfortunate and the down-and-out, helping them in many ways and largely in secret. He was not a man who blazoned his own charities, but believed in "doing good by stealth," and leaving the appraisal to Him who sees all things. Even when his generosity was abused, he would help again and again. Dr. Hallimond's address was a merited recognition of the personal activity of Mr. Koenig in many charities, both at home and abroad, his love of humanity reaching out to all lands.

Another solo, "One Sweetly Solemn Thought," and the singing of the hymns, "Abide with Me" and "Nearer, My God, to Thee," were among the musical features of the occasion.

At the conclusion of the services the friends and relatives formed in line and passed before the casket, which was banked by numerous beautiful floral tributes.

In the audience, besides the near relatives and friends of the deceased, were many of his business acquaintances, and there was a considerable sprinkling of ladies. The friends present included Rev. Walter Koenig, St. Paul's Evangelical Lutheran Church, Paterson, N. J., brother of the deceased; Dr. Frederick C. Heekel and Mrs. Heekel, the latter a sister of Mr. Koenig, with their family, including Chaplain Paul Heekel; Miss Hedwig Koenig and Rev. George Koenig, his niece and nephew; Mrs. Mary M. Klopsch and her daughter, Mrs. Gardiner Palmer, Mr. and Mrs. A. Sicker, Mr. Theodore Lamprecht; Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Waters. The Christian Herald staff was represented by Messrs. Graham Patterson, Wallace Patterson, Charles Dorr, Emil R. Weadon, A. S. Walmsley, Louis E. Orcutt, Charles G. Miller, and Frank Lovell.

Bulgaria Surrenders Unconditionally to Entente

THE Central Empire group was definitely broken on September 30, when the Bulgarian delegates (see page 1151) signed an armistice accepting all of the terms imposed by General D'Espercy for the Entente. The proposed terms were submitted to the Entente Governments and to Sofia before they were agreed upon. The terms of Bulgaria's surrender are as follows:

Bulgaria agrees to evacuate all the territory she now occupies in Greece and Serbia, to demobilize her army immediately, and surrender all means of transport to the Allies.

Bulgaria also will surrender her boats and control of navigation on the Danube, and concede to the Allies free passage through Bulgaria for the development of military operations.

All Bulgarian arms and ammunition are to be stored under control of the Allies, to whom is conceded the right to occupy all important strategic points.

Only the military situation was covered in the surrender, all political questions being deferred to the final peace conference.

The defection of Bulgaria stunned Berlin and spread consternation in Vienna, while it was followed by what appeared a premature announcement of an application by Turkey for an armistice. It was generally considered, however, only a matter of days until Turkey could be forced to make peace. With the destruction of her army in Palestine 10,000 more surrendered on Sept. 30, Turkey has left only the Army of the Caucasus and she is entirely dependent on Germany for military supplies for this army. With free transit through Bulgaria, the Allies could within a week have a strong army ready to invade Turkey and the fall of Constantinople would not be long delayed.

Similarly the Bulgarian action places the ten divisions of German troops in Rumania in a delicate situation. General von Mackensen was reported, on Sept. 30, to have arrived in Sofia with some German troops, which Berlin papers declared were received with enthusiasm, and it was expected that Germany would do what she could to establish a new line protecting the Danube from Allied attack. With the Bulgarians in Serbia laying down their arms, the German and Austrian troops which were sprinkled among the Bulgarian battalions for moral effect were left "in the air." The whole situation was in flux on Oct. 1st, the Allies were pressing northward, had occupied Uskub and pressed beyond it and the Germans were reported to be hurriedly organizing for the defense of the Nish-Belgrade line. With the way open through Bulgaria, it was not impossible that the Rumanian army might again be heard from; in fact, the whole situation was one of impending possibilities, and it was expected that the week following would be one of rapid and portentous developments. It is not impossible that Austria may make Bulgaria's defection an excuse for the laying down of her own arms. There were even signs of democratic revolution within Germany. On October 1 there was rioting both in Berlin and in Constantinople, and in Berlin the people had the upper hand of the authorities. Pan-German circles were calling for a dictator.

Liberty Loan Rushing Over the Top

THE Fourth Liberty Loan is running up into the billions by leaps and bounds. The New York district alone subscribed $200,000,000 on the first day and has kept up the pace steadily toward its quota of $1,800,000,000.

To a country already aflame with patriotic fervor, news of Bulgaria's surrender came like gunpowder to a crackling blaze. Fired by the victory, the Nation took up its bond selling with a great new enthusiasm. "One enemy disposed of; only three more left! Buy bonds and hasten the end!" Such was the message which Liberty Loan orators flung to cheering crowds throughout the land, and its effect was magical.

Another happy incident came early in the drive in the announcement that Brazil's flag will soon be flying on the battle front in Europe.

The whole nation, stimulated by the favorable war news and President Wilson's electrifying address, appeared to give serious consideration to the Liberty Loan. Thousands of applications were sent to banks and to committee members, and the canvassers found that there was little need for argument. Everybody seemed to feel his duty and showed willingness to subscribe. On all sides were indications that the public as well as the loan workers were proceeding about the business of making the loan a success with an earnestness and seriousness greater even than was shown in previous campaigns.

San Francisco was the first city to claim the honor flag by oversubscription on the opening day. Iowa was the first state to report her quota filled. In the third loan campaign also Iowa led by a wide margin.

Out of a mass of telegrams from various parts of the country telling how wage-earners are getting behind the loan, one from Wheeling, W. Va., is typical. All save one of 1,000 employees of the Richland Coal Company, who have been mining more coal during the war than they ever did in peace times, bought bonds during the first five minutes that they were placed on sale.

Residents of Great Falls, Mont., oversubscribed their quota in a unique manner. At the opening of the bond sale a procession of men, women and children who desired to buy bonds lined up before motion-picture cameras, and

THE modern battle front is just the last station on a railway line—or many railway lines; the myriads of fighters are but passengers who started out on a railway journey and alighted all at once. Napoleon's classic dictum is still quoted in Quartermaster circles: An army travels on its stomach. But without trespassing on the Quartermaster's ground, or abating one jot his claim to indispensability, it may be laid down as an axiom that the modern army goes—on cars. Its subsistence also goes on cars.

Let us imagine ourselves as being set down from an airplane just behind General Pershing's forward line, and ordered—as we doubtless would be—to proceed with all dispatch to the rear. Perhaps we should have to walk a short distance at the outset, or we might be given a ride in an empty ammunition lorry, but what we should come to shortly would be the railway line. It must be granted that in all probability we should have to have this fact brought to our attention—especially if it happened to be after dark when we arrived at the railhead. There would be no brilliantly lighted station, for this railway is the last twig out from a giant tree, the last capillary of a vast arterial system, and is of the variety known as "light." And light it is, the rails weighing only a few pounds to the yard, its gauge of the narrowest—twenty-four or thirty inches—and its locomotives and cars hardly more than toys.

But it is just such a line as this, duplicated at a hundred points, its aggregate trackage perhaps thousands of miles, which enabled Foch to press close on the fleeing heels of Hindenburg, which is enabling all the several armies of Democracy to oust and drive and harry the defeated and distraught Hun. Over these miniature roads, which are put together in a moment, shot to pieces, and put together again, shell is hurried up, food and material and men. If the engine is blown into fragments by a chance hit the cars are not so large but that men may push them forward.

YOU read in the papers, "The enemy shelled the back areas." What does this little pleasantry mean? It means that Martin, the fireman of your home local, that MacWilliams, the engineer of the Mail, that Henryson, the conductor of the Limited, will never again be back on the old run in "the States." It means that Pat, the section foreman, will not be back along the line bossing his gang, that Pedro and Tony and Olaf will not be tamping ties again under his watchful eye, lashed by his scathing tongue. At the first call the railroad men of this country—great and small—leaped to respond. More than one has received the Distinguished Service Medal, more than one wears the Croix de Guerre!

Continuing our journey we come to where the light railway links up with the full road from the nearest depot or base town. Perhaps by this time the sun is up, and we can see about us better. There will be some semblance of a station here.

And the locomotives and the cars will be lifeline. Moreover, and to our amazement, they are not the funny Continental engines and little box-cars about the size of packing-cases which we have seen on the French roads. Locomotive, box-car, passenger coach—every item is unmistakably of the "made in America" kind; even the whistle—which can be sounded here without giving information to the enemy, for we are now miles

The first contingent of railway men to go overseas numbered 2,100. The figure given out not so very many months later was 95,000—a pretty husky increase of husky men! But they had been told to instal, equip, and put into operation, with every ounce of mighty blows, were hurried on traveling bed of the steam row, and came out railroad ties.

One hundred and fifty thousand tons of 80 pound rails—enough to lay a hundred double-track miles—was a single order given American rolling mills. A freight locomotive weighing eight tons is not a small engine, and it can't be built in one country. Pershing asked for a hundred such, and they were delivered with greater rapidity than locomotives had ever been delivered before.

Nor was this line the only piece of American trackage; for one has from time to time whole lengths of lines, and branch roads which have been taken up over night, here home, from under very noses, and shipped abroad.

YET this little journey which we have imagined ourselves as having taken in France is but a small part of the whole big railroad story of the war—a story which is peculiarly American and will, it is hoped, some time be told. Speaking publicly a long ago on what was called the "transportation miracle," the amazing troop movement overseas, in which British as well as American ships played their part, Joseph Maclay, British Controller Shipping, said this vast carrying of men to the front would not have been possible but for the work of the United States' railroads.

So if your train has not run with the same speed as formerly, if there has been a delay to allow long strings of troop cars to slip past, if the station grounds where you get off look not so well kept as in former years, consider some of the few feats which railroad men in this country have performed since we went into the war.

If a man has a big job to do, he does it with the tools he has, or he buys new ones. But suppose it takes long time to manufacture tools, and the job calls for speed—what then? Especially what then if the tools are inadequate? There is but one answer: systematic elimination of less essential effort, concentration.

WHEN it was passenger traffic that was considered, this was accomplished by adding cars to some trains and discontinuing other trains. Taking over of the roads by the government made it possible in certain parts of the country to eliminate trains which competed, and without much inconvenience to the public, for there is still one train for practically every desirable hour of the day. When it was a matter of freight traffic—and army requirements necessitate the moving of 1,600,000 pounds of freight per day—campaigns were started among the shippers to induce them to load more freight to a car. In the coal districts the slogan was: "One ton more to the car." Shippers who delayed in loading an unloading also were heavily penalized. With all lines working as one vast system, as is the case now, it is also possible to reroute freight, sending it the shortest way. And so successful has this proved, that on incomplete returns and for a very brief period, record showed a saving of 1,233,664 car miles. Some railroad men regard this as one of the biggest economic strides made in this country during the war.

This locomotive, built in America, assembled in British shops, is now in active service behind the lines in France, the spider in the cobweb from the Germans—has distinctly the Yankee twang. The road is American, although in France.

WHEN the United States entered the war our admirals and generals in consultation with those of the Entente pointed to the map of France. The admirals said, "We will make that port our port of disembarkation," and the generals said, "We will run a railroad line from that port across the land to the battle front."

speed of which they were capable, a first-class American road, double-tracked, for the transporting of troops, ammunition, guns, and supplies. And they did it!

Regiments of lumberjacks from the woods of Maine and the forests of the Northwest were sent into Scotland and Ireland and the timber districts of France. Steam sawmills ready to set up had come on the ships with them. Trees which were older than the oldest American settlement fell under their

Liberty Loan Record of the Railroad Men

THE Liberty Bond record of the railroads is something of which the country may well be proud. And it is largely the power for organization which the American railroader possesses in supreme degree that accounts for that record. For instance, on one road employing some forty thousand men, the number of subscribers to the Third Loan was increased over the number of subscribers to the Second by five hundred per cent.

Here are some figures: On the First Loan, from the total number of railroad employees the country over, 241,280 subscribed $20,027,966. On the Third Loan, in the Eastern District alone—the railroad map of the United States was divided by the Railroad Administration into seven regional districts—seven hundred thousand employees took forty-five million dollars' worth of bonds. On the Third Loan the country over the railroad men's subscription was considerably above the hundred million mark, with the average subscription $77.

The Southern Pacific System's men gave the largest total subscription, $4,530,000; while the Santa Fe came next with four millions. On one road, the Rock Island, one hundred per cent. of the employees subscribed to this Loan. And subscriptions came from aliens as well as Americans. On the Chicago & Alton a record was kept of the aliens on a single division, and it was found that 154 out of 160 subscribed. Of these one was an Italian who mortgaged his house for $1,000 at six per cent. that he might buy a one thousand dollar Bond!

WHEN it comes to the Fourth Loan the railroads are breaking all previous records. The Southern Pacific may again stand at the head of the list, but from the campaign which the men of the cab and the caboose now have under way the prediction can safely be made that it will have to go considerably above its earlier total to do so. And the Rock Island cannot expect again to stand alone with its one hundred per cent.; several Eastern roads were, on the Third Loan, a close second; and they will not be merely second again. All the semaphores are down for the Liberty Loan Special! It's a clear track, and full speed—ninety miles an hour all the way!

Buy all the Bonds you can! And then go out and buy one more and say to yourself, "I don't know them personally, the men who are running the trains 'over there,' the men who are laying the tracks and building the bridges 'over there,' but just because they ARE there I'm taking on this one Bond more." And it will give you a feeling of brotherhood with the men left here when you walk past the cab and see the engineer, in his overalls and jumper, climbing down to oil the rods, a feeling of brotherhood which will make you want to say to him: "We're together on this war-run, friend! My hand is on the throttle beside yours!"

The Town that Wouldn't Buy Hardware

by W. Livingston Larned

EVERYBODY in our town made the observation, when Uncle Carter turned his hardware store over to his nephews—both young fellows, just from college—that it was a good thing, and that young blood was needed in such a business.

It seemed so natural to suppose that the new generation could do the job progressively. That is a popular modern axiom. It is difficult to teach old dogs new tricks, and times have changed! Young Mr. Henry and fair-aided, smiling Billy were certainly melads. Their father had been a small manufacturer in the next county, but political complications moved six big hills away from that locality, and Will Harvey died with his business.

And now Uncle Carter of our town had seen his way clear to even up an ancient score—a debt of love and gratitude—by taking the boys in and making them sponsors for the largest and most ambitious hardware shop at that end of Munro county.

True, Uncle Carter was growing old. His hair was beautifully white and we who had known him since childhood days suddenly noticed, as we saw him shuffle slowly down avenue D, under the silver birches, that he was very feeble.

And yet . . . we could not believe that this old man had come to this moment of lost utility.

For two generations Uncle Carter had opened the shutters of Twenty-nine Avenue D and closed them again shortly after the evening rain from the West brought the city sleepers.

His hardware store had thrust out its part into every home and structure and commercial enterprise of our town. It had roofed a church here and applied the lighting fixtures there, or it in a handsome new range somewhere else. The carpenters of our town always bowed to Uncle Carter when they saw him. He had equipped their tool chests, or sold them, over his counter, the very nails they drove for their daily bread.

As the old gentleman himself was inclined to put it: "I'd rather be in the hardware line than any other, because, don't you see, long after I'm dead I'll have the satisfaction of knowin' that my good works live after me. I never pick up on poor saws or hammers, which means that I don't sell of that kind. They will be fashioning houses in this state twenty years from now. That's the way my goods last. Everywhere I go I see helpful things that folks have bought of me, and it sort of makes me happy and contented. Years like what you buy in a hardware store gives back more actual dollar-and-cent value than any other line. You get them and profit by them and grow with them. Land sakes! I just couldn't sell ice cream sodas, for example. After the initial expense and the initial enjoyment, that's all there is to it. Imagine trying to cash in on a ten-year-old ice cream soda! I like to sell the goods that keep payin' for themselves over and over again from one family to another."

Young Mr. Henry and Billy entered into the spirit of the new undertaking with intense satisfaction and confidence. They were fairly well acquainted in our town, and Henry had worked for a while in a hardware store down Marshville way. The store was thoroughly modern, both as to its physical appointments and its stock. That was the way Uncle Carter had kept it; that was the way he turned it over to his nephews.

FOR one thing, Uncle Carter had managed to keep a young intuition. He read magazines and newspapers. He followed the important advertising campaigns. He made himself interested in world events. Uncle Carter sold the first patent milkster that our territory had ever seen. When folks read the initial announcements, they thought there was a joke to it and that the milkster was a calf in disguise. It was Uncle Carter who introduced our county to those splendid compact lighting and cooking plants for small farms, remote from power. He went out to the Hawkeye Dairy Farm on a cold January afternoon and personally installed the rather complex system, showing them how to feed the cows and hook up the engine and regulate the gasoline.

Then war came; suddenly, rather insidiously. At first it did not seem to disturb the quiet routine of our town, and it did not show on the books of the hardware store. People seemed to buy things in the same old way.

Pretty soon, as you know, the great drama began to unroll with more celerity. And here and there a lad from our town would be on the list who never came back to white gates and roses any more.

The commercial aspect took definite, tangible form. Our town cut short its expenditures. There were Thrift Stamps to buy, and Liberty Bonds and Red Cross memberships, and country people have a way of looking ahead. They saved; they put away; they did without.

When Uncle Carter returned from a visit to Silver Springs, he found the boys in great trouble. Things had gone from bad to worse. "Nobody is buying anything!" was young Mr. Henry's exact statement, as a three-cornered consultation was held at the store that same evening.

To add to the general dismay, a hardware salesman had called with an alarming declaration. There would be a shortage of certain lines. The government was curtailing manufacture. Steel was growing to be as precious as gold.

THE boys expected Uncle Carter to join in the chorus of complaint. He did no such thing. He smiled in that self-contained manner of his, and looked around the old store in such placid content that they were aggravated.

"You young fellows ought to be able to handle this," said he. "To hear you talk, we might as well close up."

"Nothing else to do," grunted young Mr. Henry.

"I'll come down in the morning—with my sleeves rolled up," said Uncle Carter in conclusion, his face growing suddenly grave. "What you must do is to convince folks there are some forms of economy that make matters worse instead of better. We'll grab this town by the slack, and show them where they are in error. A hardware store should do better business in war times than in peace times."

Things began to hustle shortly after eight A.M.

Both windows were cleared of household goods and arranged for a display of time-saving mechanical essentials. The store had the agency for one of the best of the lighting systems and farm power plants. Up to now the line had never been exploited. For some reason everybody thought that potato-peelers and kitchen cabinets were more important. A complete system was set up in one of the windows, with placards to show what it would do: turn meat-grinders, operate churns, supply juice for electric irons, light the dairy house and the barn and the outhouses in general, provide warm water, take the drudgery from the washing-machine and give relief to tired farm eyes after dark. Uncle Carter elaborated this display by cutting illustrations from current magazines and pasting them on squares of cardboard. Then he placed a placard in a prominent place, with this message emblazoned by a local sign-writer:

"These are times when it is unpatriotic to do things the old, slow, hard way. Conserve time and labor. Our men are needed in the army and on government work. Women must do more than ever. Help them accomplish this. Here is what a modern light and power plant will do. Its cost is insignificant as compared with the ultimate results obtained. Runs on kerosene. Self-operating. Makes it easier to get farm help."

THE village boasted no full-fledged electrical shop, but Uncle Carter was not the sort of man to stop, even if there was. Within two weeks he had gotten in a full line of electrical labor-saving devices of the very latest design. Simultaneously he began to advertise, in two-column space, in the local newspapers.

His trade-mark slogan was: "The Store That Saves Labor."

Conventional lines were moved to the rear of the shop and the little brothers and sisters of the power plant neatly displayed in their place. In his advertising copy Uncle Carter peppered away at the one big basic idea—an appeal to women: "More is expected of you; more you must do. And it can be accomplished if you do things the modern way. Make machinery do the drudgery and lift the larger burdens."

In some strange, fascinating, inexplicable manner, that appeared to be the very moving spirit of the new store—helping win the war by helping people help themselves. Three dozen ranges were ordered, but they were ranges with a patent fuel-saving device. For a week Uncle Carter had young Mr. Henry's wife actually give demonstrations in the store with that range. With the same shrewd, thoughtful care, Uncle Carter reached out to other lines—the staple lines—the ones the boys had not been able to move. It was suggested that every man should own his own tool chest. Those carpentering jobs should be done at home, for carpenters were not to be had at any price.

Should houses be allowed to "run down"? Was it fair to the property? No; repairs must be kept up. And with a tool chest and essential supplies, this work could be accomplished.

For his second window Uncle Carter used a "baby tractor" as display, together with the various accessories, tools, etc., that went with the line. And a little later on he "tied up" a mechanic who was an expert in tractor repairs. The consequence was that people came from near and far to consult this expert, bringing trade and new friends.

Each line was juggled with the same splendid foresight. If it was paint, then Uncle Carter exploited the wastefulness of neglecting this protection to buildings. He even displayed decayed woods and woods protected by paint. If it was sporting goods he told of the United States Food Administration's urgent call to people to fish and hunt for game that lay within the district laws. Sportsmen should hunt and fish. It was more than fun; it was doing one's bit. That reclaimed food meant other food saved for other purposes. He stimulated the building of chicken houses, concrete pig runs and meat houses, because they meant individual show of intensive production.

And back came the normal trade, made normal legitimately. As a matter of fact, the boys conceded that business was better than it had been in a long while; even booming.

THAT last afternoon, before he told them he would leave the reins in their hands for a while, he put his arms about their shoulders and said:

"There is nothing impossible in life. There is never a real reason for business failure. Times like these simply show us what we are made of. The town got 'cold feet.' It was saving money in the wrong way. And I set out to show them why and how. This store—and any hardware store in any town—can be of the greatest possible benefit to a community. It can do it by gradually and carefully guiding the trade. We thought all we were here for was to dish out 'hardware,' in the generalized sense of the term. That's rubbish. We have just begun to see what we can do to help win the war. And I tell you, boys, it's the cumulative power of these little educational stunts that make larger victories over yonder possible. America never was much for taking up innovations, especially we who live out in the remote sections. I have kerosene lamps in my house right now, and I'm ashamed of it. I could have bought a dozen electric-light power plants for what I've spent on kerosene. I'd rather have one good tractor than a barnful of mules or horses. Who wants to waste butter fat and rich cream and feed them to the hogs when a cream separator will prevent waste at an initial expense that means nothing? We can sell more than mere hardware; we can sell people the principles of right living and right working. We are dealers in short cuts to better results; that's our stock in trade. Keep up the advertising—never sell an article without explaining how it's going to make life easier and happier and cheaper, and if you need me again I'll be down at my place learnin' to run a tractor."

With that he was gone, hat in hand, his silvered hair crowning him like a halo under the brilliant golden autumn sunshine.

They told him he had grown too old

That Girl from Orchard Street

By
C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

CHAPTER VIII

IT WAS just after ten when Mary Ellis heard a tap at her door. It was the signal. She drew the knitted cap with its lining of paper over her hair, buttoned the leather military coat that Jean had brought her across her chest, and moved cautiously toward the door. Over in the corner Helen Synon slept, blissfully ignorant of what was happening so close to her. Mary Ellis kissed her fingers in the direction of the sleeping girl, and was gone.

Outside Jean Renault was waiting for her. In silence he reached for her hand and carried it to his lips. Still without speaking he linked her arm in his and led the way across the fields toward the apple orchard of their first meeting.

Beneath the leather coat Mary Ellis was dressed in a rough patched skirt which the captain had obtained from one of the women of the village. She wore a badly fitting man's coat and heavy woolen shirt, such as peasant women wear; also shoes that were too large for her and did not match. On her head she wore a knitted woolen cap. Under the skirt, with ends tucked into her odd shoes, she wore trousers. When the time came she would leave the skirt in a clump of bushes, and proceed in a garb more suitable for her trip through the trenches and into No Man's Land.

The costume had been carefully planned. Only a more than ordinarily careful scrutiny would have shown her to be other than a peasant woman of Germany.

As with her costume, Captain Renault had taken great care with her instructions. He had sketched for her the position of the château in relation to the open field where she would land, had given her the formula for Professor Bonheur, and had shown the plans of the road just south of the château which led toward the firing-line.

About her neck on a strong string she carried a tiny pocket compass with a medium-sized needle that glowed in the dark. This the captain had provided, as well as a store of coarse food. That was all; she had no money, no time-piece, nothing with which she might defend herself.

"Now remember"—he cautioned her as they hurried on—"the escape will not be easy, yet unless conditions have changed in the past few days you will have no great hindrance. This sector of the fighting line was very active during the first part of the war, but during the past year has been quiet. The Bavarians are holding it for Germany, and a few regiments of Americans still with their French instructors are on duty for the Allies. It is really the quietest sector. However," he laughed, "it will probably liven considerably now that the American boys have gone in there. A great many Bavarian women are back of the lines; to the chance observer you will be one of them. Under cover of darkness you will be able to crawl across 'No Man's Land.' The fire is never heavy at night—there will be little danger."

"And once I have crossed the line? You have never told me what to do."

"Why, give yourself up to the men on guard. They will take you to their commanders, and you will tell these men you wish to report to the Bureau in Paris. Of course you must not tell your mission to anyone—not until you reach the Bureau."

"And will they know of me?"

"Yes, I have reported that Mary Ellis has gone into Germany, and will probably escape by way of the American sector in Lorraine."

"I will escape," she corrected him.

He made no reply.

"It is very dark," he said presently. "Fortunately La Toure knows the way."

"La Toure?" Mary queried.

"Yes; the man who will pilot your airplane. Have you learned the formula and the maps?"

"Yes; shall I repeat the formula for you? You know it was only five when you brought me word that I might go and gave me my instructions. I have been studying the map of the woods about the professor's château and the formula ever since."

"Good—and the road back. I am more than ordinarily interested in your road back."

"Really, Jean, I have no thought of danger. My fates have been too kind to desert me now. What I fear most is that drop from the plane. Are you sure the parachute is strong enough?"

"Yes, and the drop will not be far. La Toure will see that you land in an open field. When I sent that wireless to Paris I tried to get permission for him to land and wait for you—but the chances of his capture are great, and he is very valuable."

"So he will let me down in my parachute, and fly back toward Paris."

THE captain did not answer. For many minutes they trudged through the light snow. They crossed a small ice-bound stream that ran beside a clump of trees, and so on into the woods.

Just as they were emerging he stopped.

"The plane is just the other side of the woods. Are you sure—sure that you want to go?"

"Yes, I am sure."

"And you know all the directions that I gave you?"

"Yes, perfectly. I have learned them, and burned the papers."

"Then—it is time for good-by." He crushed her to him with a sudden quick move, holding her close with his well arm, while he kissed her forehead and lips.

"Little girl, little Mary Ellis, you are going for the honor of France. You are going for the honor of the man who loves you. When you come back, all my life I will serve you; whether you come back or not I will see that France, the world, rings with the story of what you are doing tonight. Kiss me—kiss me once again."

She lifted her lips to his. For a minute they stood there in silence, and each offered a silent prayer that soon again they might meet.

The girl moved uneasily.

"Come," Jean said sharply, as if to hide his true emotions, and they went through the drifted snow to the field where La Toure awaited them.

CHAPTER IX

IN AFTER years Mary Ellis tried to remember her first flight in an airplane—and couldn't. She remembered seeing La Toure dimly in the foggy darkness, the outline of the big plane, and his smothered exclamation of amazement when he found that his passenger was to be a woman. Also she remembered climbing into the plane after the two men had twice explained to her the details of the arrangement of the parachute that was to be used for her descent into German territory.

Then had come the whispered word of courage, the press of Jean's hand, and the noiseless rush of air that told her that the big machine was in motion.

Further than that she had no definite memory of the long trip across France into Alsace-Lorraine. She supposed that there had been no attempt at conversation; she was not even conscious that La Toure had given her word that it was time for her to climb over the back of the big seat and grasp firmly the straps of the parachute. She wondered afterward how he knew his way in the inky darkness, how he found the big field south of the château. But the fact remained that she found herself standing firm on her two feet. Her greatcoat was gone; so was the paper lining to her woolen cap. She did not know it, but both of these had been discarded at La Toure's advice before she left the plane. They were conspicuous. Men of science will tell you that such lapses of memory are possible, even fairly frequent—and in Mary Ellis' case it was merciful, for it swept from her all thought of fear; gave her the artificial buoyed courage that makes men and women go unhesitatingly into places of danger and death.

The first real emotion that Mary Ellis afterward remembered was surprise and delight that she had dropped unharmed from the plane—that she was not even bruised from her landing. Where the parachute had gone she did not know; evidently the bar had slipped from her hands, and had been carried away. Then she realized that she had work to do, and that she must move quickly.

Her first thought was for the message that she was to deliver. She repeated it to herself, and found that she knew it perfectly; then she repeated the instructions that had been given her as to how she would find Professor Bonheur. Relieved that the rush of air and the apparent loss of memory had not robbed her of her secret, she thought next of the direction that she must take to reach the château. She drew out the cord to which her radiumized compass with the glowing needle was attached. When she found the direction north she set out cautiously in the direction where she knew lay the clump of woods surrounding the château.

SHE found it rough going over stony ground. Once she splashed through the thin ice covering of a pool, and her heart almost ceased to beat for fear that the noise might have startled some night prowler like herself. Jean had told her that there were no men quartered in the vicinity of the château, but then movements of troops change from day to day, and it was weeks since he had been near the place.

It seemed hours that she walked, though in reality it was not more than a couple of miles from the place where she landed to the clump of pine trees and the path of the professor's nightly saunterings. She hurried on, stumbling, scratching her hands on old berry vines, cold with nervousness, her feet blistering from the heavy wet shoes.

At last, when it seemed as though she could go no farther, there loomed from the darkness the even blacker shadows of the pines. With renewed effort she plunged through a drift and stood beneath them, resting her body against a great tree. She closed her eyes and prayed. After a minute renewed strength came to her, and she went more boldly, with greater confidence, in the direction of the brick walk that had once been famous for the men and women who had promenaded its length.

The walk was close to the edge of the trees. Even the snow had been shoveled—evidently because of respect for the famous professor's insane desire to walk round and round each night. A laugh bubbled to her throat. If they only knew! What fools these Germans were! They played for the larger fish and did not see the frayed strands in the cord they fished with.

The time seemed to pass slowly as Mary Ellis stood there listening, listening. As she waited her thoughts slipped backward over the weeks that had just passed. She wondered what they would say in Westport if they ever knew of her night's work. Mary Ellis was only human, and she thrilled with joy when she thought of the strange fate that had lifted her out from Orchard Street into this adventure. In the last few weeks she had come to be rather proud of Orchard Street, proud also for the petty triumphs that she would bring to her old shabby home when she returned. When they knew they would surely want to come and see her—they would want her to be their guest and to tell them all about France and Jean—but they would have to call on her Orchard Street first.

HER reverie was banished when there came to her keen ears the constant sound of shuffling footsteps. A then to her relief she heard the whist notes of the ballad that had been popular even in Westport, "Just a Little Love A Little Kiss." Instinctively she took two steps forward, and started whistle. The approaching footsteps stopped, and she ran in their direction. "Renault?" a man's voice growled excitedly. When she was quite close him she slowed her pace.

"No—but I come from Renault. I has been injured." And then, as if make the professor very sure, she repeated quickly the chemical formula she had learned.

"Is it a woman?" the professor seemed to ignore that the formula had been given him.

"Yes; some one had to get to you once. I seemed the only person available. I—I am engaged to Jean."

"A woman! Are you a Parisian? They say that Parisian women are fearless."

Mary laughed lightly.

"No; I am an American. I have been working in the devastated districts of France."

"American! American!" he repeated wonderingly. "Even here in this place where the Germans think themselves invincible they are beginning to talk the Americans. Jean Renault is a luck man." And then he suddenly repeated the formula that she had given him.

"That is correct?"

"Yes." And Mary Ellis marveled at the memory able to retain after so long hearing what seemed to her a most complicated chemical formula.

"Then it is time for us to part. Go speed you, mademoiselle, and carry you safely back to France."

He brushed against her somewhat hastily, and she stood listening to his footsteps as they died away into silence. As the last sound reached her, she sighed. Her errand was done. Even if death should overtake her, she had played her part in the conflict. Almost unconsciously she retraced her step through the snow to the open field. At the south of this field ran the country road, the road that led through the camps of armed men, toward the line that she must pierce if she was to find herself safe in France.

Grimly she went swiftly in the direction of the road. Haste and luck were what counted now. The haste she could supply herself; the luck—but luck is always the unknown quantity in any adventure.

CHAPTER X

MARY ELLIS'S first duty once she reached the road was to rid herself of the radiumized compass. This was the only tell-tale evidence that she was other than the middle class peasant woman that she pretended to be.

Then with a free swinging stride that she knew she could keep up for a lengthy period she started toward the firing-line. As she went steadily on she was relieved to find that the road showed no sign of having been recently used for heavy traffic.

When she had traveled what she judged must be a couple of hours she began to think of a place where she could rest and hide during the day which she knew must be fast approaching. She had not eaten any of the small store of food she had in her pocket. She was not at all hungry, but she did wish to conserve her strength for the following night and the great test it would bring. She had passed a number of scattered farmhouses, but no villages.

She decided that the next place she passed she would make a stealthy survey of the premises and if possible find a hiding-place. When she reached the front of the farm that was her choice she stopped and, bending close to the road, studied the tracks that would show the traffic from the road. She decided that several men had tramped the snow. Also there were marks of horses, and a heavy wagon. The men had been walking two abreast, and she followed the uneven path they had made. The way led past the house, with never a footstep toward either the front or back door. Evidently the house was deserted. She hurried on and reached the small barn. Here the snow was beaten down—flattened. On the snow lay wisps of black. They were hay. The big door was wide open, and she listened before daring to cross the threshold.

Finally, growing bolder, she spoke aloud—in German. Only the dull echo of her own voice came back. She stepped into the place, and began to examine the walls with her quick, nimble fingers.

What she found was an accumulation of old tools, three empty stalls, a pail over which she tripped, some pieces of harness, and a ladder that led to the loft above. This ladder she cautiously climbed. The loft to which it led was empty. Evidently, she decided, a body of men—soldiers from the way they had walked—had cleared out the place, and were finished with it. She crept over to a corner, thanking the thrift of the farmer who had built his barn so well. With her fingers she combed together the fragments of hay left on the floor. It was not a considerable amount, but would help to keep her feet warm, and would serve as a pillow. Then she ate some of her small store of food, and, curling herself in a ball, she slept.

IT WAS the cold and cramped position that wakened Mary Ellis. She turned over cautiously, rubbed her legs, and then stood upright. With brisk movements she sent the blood circulating in her veins, her young sound body responding quickly to the violent exercise. Next she crept over to the low loft door and looked out from a large knot-hole she found close to the floor. There was no one in sight, and to judge from the slant of the sun on the snow it must be past noon. Then she went back to her corner, and with a sidecomb proceeded to comb her hair: for Mary Ellis was a true woman.

When this most sacred rite was accomplished she brought from her pocket the remains of her store of food. It was not a great deal, but more than necessary for a scant meal. Therefore she divided it evenly, and placed the remaining half back in her pocket. Afterward came the problem of "What shall I do next?" Evidently there was nothing to do but to rest. She tried to sleep again, but could not. She moved toward the door and sat looking out through the large knot-hole. Long as she watched, however, she saw no sign of life—though once, when she had risen to walk about the room to keep off the cold, she thought she heard the creaking of a wagon.

With agonizing slowness the afternoon passed, and finally she looked with satisfaction at the long shadows as they died away against the snow. Soon it would be time to start. Impatiently she climbed down the ladder, and from the shadow of the open barn door saw clearly for the first time the place in which she had taken refuge. The farmhouse was typical of those that she had seen in France—possibly more stonily built. From the broken windows and the gaping torn rear door she fancied that this household had been loyal to France—that tragedy of some sort irked within the buildings. She had heard how many of the Lorraine peasants had declared their loyalty to France, and she knew the result, should the Germans hear of it. Also she knew that in the early part of the war Alsace and Lorraine were the scenes of heavy fighting.

STILL this building did not look as though it had been defiled years before. The breaks in the doorway seemed new. And surely it had been the last snowfall that the hay had been carted away. It was just one more tragedy—the destroying of a small world, some very small mark on the red map of horror that marks the domains of the God of War in the great struggle that was slowly sapping the strength of the entire world.

She amused herself by thinking back over the weeks that had passed. She went mentally back to Westport and laughed at the consternation her departure had caused. She reviewed in swift procession her journey, her first day at Printemps Vallée, and her meeting with Jean.

Dear, dear Jean! She knew that he was thinking of her, offering a constant silent prayer that she would return safely. She found that her own heart was praying that she might be spared—that having done her bit for France she might live for love.

Mary Ellis had a firm and trusting belief in God. That was why she sat fearlessly waiting for darkness.

At last she decided that it was wise for her to set out on her journey. She estimated that she must have trudged seven or eight miles through the snow the night before, and Jean had told her that the château where the professor worked was about twenty miles from the firing-line; not farther. Therefore she ought to be close to the village of fighting men—the men who were billeted, and the men who had constructed rough houses for themselves behind the lines. If what Jean had told her was still true she did not fear these villages. It would be dark, and one more peasant woman moving about would hardly attract any great attention. As for the rest—for her passage up to the front, her journey across No Man's Land! Well, Mary Ellis was not conscious of worry. She had reached that state where each moment cares for itself, and her duty now was to plod along the road.

She went boldly from the barn down the path made by the fighting men. She was filled with an insane desire to run—to rid herself of this land—but she knew better. Instead she walked slowly, lumberingly, imitating the clumsy gait of the women of the land. After she had gone a mile she was relieved to feel a breath of moist air against her cheeks. She remembered reading of the heavy fogs of the Vosges, and she hoped that tonight such a fog would cover the world with mist. A little farther on her heart almost ceased to beat when she heard voices coming toward her. She heard one of them speaking in German, and prepared herself to answer any question that might be asked her. Instead they came opposite her and passed her—all without seeming to notice that she was there. With a sigh of relief she hurried on.

In the next half-hour she met several groups—apparently workers going off to some point in the hills. Twice she passed a group of two or three soldiers.

It was not until she found herself emerging from a strip of woodland on the outskirts of a town that she was stopped, however, and then by two men on horseback—officers, she supposed—though she could not see.

"Are you French?" one of the men hurled a question at her in poor French. "What are you doing going in that direction?"

She stopped, curtsied, and did not answer.

The man asked his question again, first in French, then in German.

"German," she said quickly; "I'm going to my man."

"Oh, another of those bleating Bavarians here to see her man!" It was a different voice from that of the first speaker. "She doesn't know anything. They're all alike." And they rode on.

The meeting rather unnerved Mary Ellis, and a great weariness came over her. She walked more slowly, and began to wish that her journey was over. A little farther up the street the twisting flames of an open fire built at one side of the road loomed as a place of comfort. Men in uniform were grouped about it, and she knew she must not stop. She kept steadily on, her head aching, her heart for the first time growing sick with a dull fear.

She had regained much of her mental poise when a short way outside town she was stopped, this time by three men on horseback.

The worst season of the year for automobile accidents

SEPTEMBER and October are the worst months of the year for automobile accidents. Here is the reason. All summer long you have been running your car. Naturally the brakes are worn. Then there comes an emergency when you must stop quickly—but you find you can't.

That is what is happening to so many motorists this month. That is what may happen to you.

The solid foundation of Yale protection

"YALE protection" is more than a phrase. It is based upon the solid foundation of better products, proved better by the exacting service rendered millions of users.

Yale locks and hardware have been assuming the important work of safeguarding life and property for half a century. And today the house that can show the trade-mark "Yale" on its locks and hardware has placed its defense in the keeping of mechanically better and materially superior guardians.

Put your protection on a solid foundation—install Yale Night Latches, Padlocks, Door Closers, Builders' Hardware, Cabinet Locks—first making sure they are "Yale." And that means you will first see the "Yale" trade-mark on them. The same trade-mark that guarantees the famous Yale Chain Block.

Testaments and Magazines for Our Boys

IN answer to a request from Fort Riley, Kansas, a shipment of Christian Herald Khaki Testaments was forwarded in July. On August 9 Chaplain Gray wrote as follows:

August 9, 1918.

The Christian Herald,
New York, N. Y.

Your letter of a few days ago, and also the consignment of New Testaments for our service in the hospital, have been received. It is certainly very helpful to us to have these Testaments, which our workers are finding it very profitable to use for distribution among the men. As I think I told you before, our work in the hospital is very well organized; our workers are mostly Camp Pastors who have had a great deal of experience in parish work, therefore the service such as the distribution of Bibles is very intelligently and helpfully done.

I note your information that you will later be able to furnish us with a further order of testaments, and I assure you that we shall be very glad to receive them and see that they are judiciously distributed. With all good wishes.

(Signed) G. CHARLES GRAY,
1st Lieut., N. A., Chaplain.

We are in constant receipt of gifts for this work of supplying Testaments and Christian Heralds to the camps and the units in service over seas. We are in even more frequent receipt of requests for the Word and for the magazine. The magazine helps many a weary hour to pass in hospital or camp, and it points the way to the Word, which alone gives meaning to any hour. Keep the gifts coming and we will keep the Testaments and Heralds going to Our Boys.

Brown Birds

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE is a certain little town, somewhere in New Jersey, that is famous for the number of gaily plumaged birds that build their nests during the summer time in its friendly trees. It is a pretty little town, and from April to October the air of it is sweet with glad bird-songs and gay with the crimson and blue and orange flutter of wings. Folk explain away the fairy-like charm of the place by telling one, very gravely, that the town lies directly in the path the birds take as they fly from north to south and back again in the spring and in the autumn. Folk say it is natural that some of nearly every species of bird should settle there.

I have visited the town often during June and July and August. I have watched Baltimore Orioles swinging in their nests. I have followed with my eyes the swift flight of scarlet tanagers. I have seen the darting humming-birds and the vivid blue jays, and many, many others. And I have marveled at them.

"I'm sure," I told my hostess on one occasion, "that I have never seen so many bright colors! It's like magic. Don't you?"—I paused, thinking of our little city birds—"don't you ever see any sparrows here—any plain brown birds? Or do you only entertain the specially aristocratic birds in your own?"

My hostess laughed at me. "To tell you the truth," she said, "I don't believe I ever noticed a brown bird here in the summer. I reckon they're here, for we see them all through the winter time, but the other more brilliant birds rather blot them out when it's summer."

"So the little sparrows stay," I mused, after their de luxe relatives have gone south. How—how very human of them!"

"Of course," agreed my hostess, more hurriedly than understandingly. "And we're glad to see them—then!" she added.

ONCE knew a girl who was a pupil in a very fashionable finishing school. It was one of the sort of schools where a bank account meant more than personality—where well-tailored frocks were more important than modesty and charm. It was the sort of a school that used a social register and a check book for references.

The girl had the bank account and the tailored frocks when she started to go to the school—and her father had a check book that seemed inexhaustible. And so, quite as a matter of course, she soon became a favorite with every one.

The girl, besides the qualities that the school as a whole recognized, had modesty and charm. Perhaps that was why certain shy little girl who seemed rather drab and uninteresting was fascinated by her. The shy little girl layed in the background, half afraid to attract the attention of her idol, while the younger pupils went about noting her and the older students were asking her opinions. One wonders if the girl ever noticed the silent figure that stood in corners when the girls promaded in the courtyard at recess—one wonders if she ever felt the shy girl's mid devotion? One wonders . . .

It was just before she graduated that the girl's father died. He died very suddenly, leaving his affairs in a ratheruddled condition. And at the end of a very short session with an efficient lawyer the girl learned that the inexhaustible check book was no longer inexhaustible—that the bank account and the well-tailored frocks were matters of past history.

The girl had been popular at school. Being modest she had thought that it was because of herself that people liked her. But she found, before many days had passed, that she was wrong. The older girls didn't ask for her opinion any more—the younger girls didn't quote her. The teachers were—civil. And when, at recess time, the students walked in the courtyard, she was usually left to walk alone.

It was then that the shy little girl—the little girl who had always been a bit of background—suddenly proved herself. It was then that she put out a timidly friendly hand. It was then that she emerged from the shadow that she had always lived in. And the

LITTLE BROWN BIRD

If I were a little brown bird would I follow
The lure of the summer, the trail of the swallow,
Or sit, when the days grew short and chill,
On a frozen branch by your window sill,
Singing the songs that I loved the best
For the flower face at the window pressed?

If I were a little brown bird would I shiver
When winter had shrouded the blue of the river?
Would my songs be gay through the long dim hours?
Could a heart that dreamed of the southern flowers
Merrily trill through the wailing blast,
Till the summer came to your soul at last?

If I were a little brown bird, would the dying
Be daring and glad like the swift joy of flying?
Would fate be kind? Would the song be sad?
Would I love the strange little life I had?
Some hearts have only a song to give—
What more was there left in my life to live?

If a little brown bird, to your window falling,
Pressed close to the pane with a pitiful calling,
Could it find a refuge there from the snows,
Where the firelight tossed like a wind-blown rose?
Many strange things have happened to me—
Who knows who the little brown bird may be?

EVANNE BLASDALE.

girl was glad of her—glad with the gladness that only a thoroughly disillusioned young heart may know.

It was rather like the case of the brightly plumaged birds, I think. While they were nesting vividly in every tree, the people who lived in the little New Jersey town didn't notice the duller brown birds. Of course they knew that the duller birds were there. But it took the winter time to make them show up; to make their presence felt; to make people appreciate them.

It isn't necessary to tell of the friendship that sprang up between the two girls, so strangely isolated from the rest. It isn't necessary to tell how the friendship has lasted ever since the particularly trying graduation day when many other school friendships died. For the point of the story isn't the fact that the friendship was started, or that it did last. The point of the story is that the making of the friendship—of something worth while and beautiful—was there all of the time. And that it wasn't noticed because of something more blatant, that was also there.

The world is full of little brown birds, and, because we hear the gay music of more talented birds, because we see the bright plumage of other more graciously endowed birds, we are very apt to pass them by. But let a time of trouble come, a time of winter or a war or sorrow, and you'll find that they stay, while many of their brighter companions hurry away. You'll find that they stay, and that they brighten the landscape in a way that you wouldn't have thought possible.

Notes from Mission Fields

CORRESPONDING to our American Indians, the aborigines of western China are peoples of many tribes, differing not only from the Chinese in language, dress, and physique, but also from each other. The Gospel message has proved to be a great leveler and uplifter of lives and hearts. In Kweichow Province alone, about 6,000 have been baptized and received into the Christian Church. Many await instruction to be admitted to the churches. Mr. and Mrs. Merian, of the China Inland Mission, now on furlough at Germantown, Pa., expect in a few months to return to their work among these hill tribes. They are hoping to be able to take back with them the Bible and Pilgrim's Progress scenes. These are found of great value in helping the native Christians to grasp the Bible message.

THE War Department has released Captain Joseph W. Cook of the Medical Corps to accompany the Persian Relief expedition. Other doctors, along with nurses and relief workers, among whom are missionaries, compose the party. The recently reported flight of 80,000 Christian refugees from western Persia over into Hamadan or Teheran section adds to the already distressing burden.

YOU can split a hair with a poor razor. It proves nothing. It is not a test of whether it will shave easily, cleanly, and quickly—year after year.

A Genco Razor is a professional razor such as barbers use. It is guaranteed to suit your shaving requirements even though your beard be wiry and your skin tender.

Genco RAZORS

"Must make good or we will" is a guarantee backed by the largest high-grade razor factory in the world.

Genco steel, made by our own formula, is forged, hardened, and tempered by modern scientific processes into Genco Razors. Hand-grinding and hand-honing give each one the extremely fine, efficient edge that will make your shaving easier, quicker, cooler, and less of a nuisance.

Most Genco dealers display these razors in the counter case shown here. Look for it. Inspect Genco Razors carefully. If you do not easily locate Genco Razors in your town, drop us a card, and we will tell you where to get them, or we will supply you direct.

FOR some weeks, fellow Adventurers, I have been wanting to hold a "round-the-world" meeting, just to let you know that our little Neighboring corner is gradually extending its influence to distant lands. In many parts of the world, our "adventures" are being read and enjoyed, and are proving helpful.

From every state in the Union; from Mexico; from Canada, east and west; from the Orient; from England and Scotland and France; letters and adventures reach my desk. Some of these ring with appreciation of our bi-monthly meetings, and of the help these have been to an isolated man or woman across the world; others describe recent experiments, along lines of community betterment, inspired by what we Neighbors have done and are doing.

How I wish that you (whose accounts of unselfish endeavor have brought this response from far-away lands) might look over my shoulder as I open these letters with the foreign postmarks on them—letters from village, city and desert, mountain fastness and Scottish moor—and might thrill with me at the knowledge that all these dear, distant neighbors of ours are turning to us for comfort and cheer, inspiration and practical suggestions, and are finding what they seek.

TRULY, Adventurers, this is a harvest of which we may well be proud, as we have been engaged in this loving work only for one short year! May we, in the year to come, be of even greater service to our communities; ever enlarging our ideals and spreading further the Gospel of neighborliness! And may we continue to deserve such letters as the following beautiful one from Scotland!

Perth, Scotland.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: A very dear friend of mine—who lives in New Haven, Connecticut—sends me the Christian Herald every week, and it is very truly one of the lights in the street called Straight to show the way. To my dear old mother, who has just entered upon her seventy-ninth year, it is, next to her Bible, her chief source of spiritual joy, and I know that she reads it from cover to cover.

I would like to tell you that mother is especially interested in Adventures in Neighboring, and with you believes that the spirit of unwearied good-will is the great lifting power of the world. When we can do nothing else to right wrongs, lessen burdens, or mend life's hard places for weary feet, we can at least be kind—kind in face, word and deed. And how many dark places would brighten, heavy loads grow light, and new courage come to the heart, if only simple kindness were the rule of earth! WILLIAM INGLIS.

Our greetings to this sympathetic Scotch Neighbor, and to his dear old mother! Our greetings and our earnest thanks!

AND now, returning to our own continent, let us cross our northern boundary and step for a little visit into the Canada of romance: into the wide-sweeping province of Alberta, where the farms are sometimes four miles apart and sometimes forty. Here neighboring is a problem indeed.

And yet read the following letter, and learn how one woman—too big to allow distance to defeat her, brought the gospel of neighborliness to her home in a new land:

Neighboring in Canada

Canada, to many people of the United States, seems a far-away, bleak and frozen land; and so I pictured it before I came here. But I find Alberta, Canada, the same, in many ways, as our home country. We have flowers here, and grasses, and a fertile soil for grain. And I find that I am surrounded by the very kindest of neighbors.

But that is what I want to tell you about: how I got to know my neighbors. At first we knew no one. We lived here a year without getting acquainted. I waited for my neighbors to hunt me up; but they did not. So I decided that since they had not come to me, I would have to do something to bring myself in contact with them.

We are six and a half miles from town, so we can't depend on mixing much there. Anyhow, it was my near neighbors I wanted to get acquainted with.

So, on the fifteenth of March, 1918, I invited every woman in our school district to come to my home, obtaining the names for this list from the school teacher. Every woman came, as I had expected, and we had a splendid time together. For amusement I had plenty of Red Cross sewing.

Before the meeting broke up, we formed a "School District Friendly Club," elected a president, secretary and treasurer, and decided that the club should meet the first and third Thursdays of each month with some member. The members afterward took turns at being hostess, the names being listed alphabetically.

Our club has flourished ever since its founding. No hostess is allowed to serve more than two things for refreshments. And we do not have dues. When necessary, we take collections. Our motto is: to do all the good we can whenever and wherever it is needed. Our chief aim is to be friendly and neighborly with every one.

To sum it all up: we have done sewing for the Red Cross, bought flowers for the sick, had many social gatherings at the schoolhouse and homes for ourselves and our families, and have aroused a great spirit of friendliness throughout this neighborhood.

I am sending this in the hope that it may offer a suggestion to some of the other Neighbors, in return for the pleasure and help their accounts have given me. MRS. P. B. CROOKS.

What I liked about that adventure, comrades, was the fact that this little neighbor, instead of being standoffish and resentful because her neighbors could not find time to call on her, graciously took the first step herself.

NOW, in order to reach the scene of our next letter, we must drop southward on the map to where the cactus blooms; from Canada, that is, to Mexico. This letter is so marvelous a one that it needs no comment from me:

Neighboring in Mexico in His Name

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: Upon opening the Christian Herald of July 17, I was much impressed by the way you had set forth the 91st Psalm, and by your request that it be cut out, pasted on cardboard and sent to those gone to the front in France. And I felt constrained in spirit to write you, for the benefit of all who might be reached thereby, a brief account of some experiences the Lord has given me in connection with that most precious Psalm.

It was during the most trying times here in Mexico, three years ago, that I crossed the border and started on a missionary journey down through this entire west coast of Mexico, visiting the towns and holding forth the word all along the way. We fully realized the danger we were walking into, for even at the border we were not permitted to proceed until we had first signed a paper exempting those in control from all responsibility for anything that might be done to us and also forfeiting all claims for damages against the country. But we knew our God; and his promises, as given in the 91st Psalm, we counted all sufficient for anything that we might encounter. So, leaning upon that Psalm, we went forward, casting ourselves wholly into his hands to guard and keep; and as the difficulties and trials we met with became more trying the further along we went, we just turned to that Psalm almost daily, and were strengthened for every need. As correspondence with the rest of the world was cut off, we could not look for any encouragement from without; but were just obliged to look straight up.

At one place we were held prisoner for some time; and again, as we were going along the road, we were overtaken by a rowdy band and lashed to a tree in a dark night. At another time we were pounced upon and gone at with a dagger. Again later, we were taken captive by a lawless band. But in every case we found that the immutable promises given us by our God in that 91st Psalm held good; and that if we would raise our hands to him, claiming before him his promises that we were resting in, he would always deliver us, giving us a glorious victory. This was especially true in one case—the last referred to—when we were not only delivered from death but were given one of the best openings for the ministering of the Word that we had on that whole trip.

It was in a small wayside village, wholly in the hands of the bandits, who were holding up and plundering all who came through. We were turned aside and put in a dark room in a small dug-out. The only thing in the room was a heap of something in one corner, covered over with straw and then with bark. Realizing that it was the dead bodies of those they had not yet got around to bury, I perceived how absolutely we were shut unto the Lord, and saw the uselessness expecting any mercy from the bandits in that drunken condition. We knew, furthermore, that our conflict was not with flesh and blood but against all the hosts of spiritual wickedness. So by God's grace, in the name of Lord Jesus, we just looked to the Lord, claiming the protection of the Precious Blood not merely for ourselves, but for the host and for the town, against all the power of adversary, Satan and all his forces.

The situation changed immediately. The spirit of the adversary was lifted. We were soon brought out, treated kindly, and given good food: all we could eat.

Then, after we had eaten, the people came around and listened eagerly to the Word as read to them; and the different families in the settlement brought their children, that might bless them. And all the next (Lord's Day) groups would come to hear Gospel. We were never treated more respectfully anywhere. The third day, when we were about to go on our way, almost every one in the settlement brought us some kind present: a piece of money or an egg, or even a few flowers. Then one escorted us on our way toward the city we were going to.

Trusting this may be of help and encouragement to others, I remain, a humble servant Christ Jesus our Lord.

PHILIP MCLELLAN

I HAD hoped, Neighbors, to include several other adventures in this "round-the-world" number; but I find that there will not be room. So instead, in order to represent as many parts of the country as possible, I am going to fill the Forum with your brief greetings from the different states.

Before another meeting shall have been called, our Good News I Contest (which closes October first) will have been decided, and I shall be ready to announce the prize-winner. I want to thank all who have taken part in this contest for the splendid service they have rendered to the flag and country.

The Neighbors' Forum

Though I have loved the Christian Herald for fifty years, I think our Neighboring corner a fine addition to its work.—MRS. M. WOOD, New York.

I want to say to the old and lonely that I feel for them very much, and would like to hear from them and will write to a few personally, if I get one or two addresses. I am seventy-six. Will some dear Neighbor send me, or publish, the old poem about "P Under the Rod"? I shall be very grateful. Love to all the old and feeble!—MRS. M. WALTERS, California.

I have found many new and interesting things in the Neighboring Column. It is indeed helpful to us who are living in a lonely country. I wonder if you, or the Neighbors, could send me some of the names and explanations of some new games we could play out here in the Ozarks. We have a meeting of young folks at the farm clubs, and we have played all the games we know.—Missouri.

Let me say how very much I enjoy the Neighboring Department. I look forward to issues containing the Forum, as it brings all nearer to one another and the help Christian attitude.—MRS. A. S. MYR, Colorado.

Neighborly service is unlimited as to me and bounds, and whenever and wherever there are aching hearts we should offer relief.—JAMES BAILEY, Massachusetts.

I do enjoy reading the Neighboring Column as we live 10 miles from our nearest post office and neighbors. About the only social life I have is through letters.—C. H. CALIFORNIA.

The Neighboring Page is very helpful. MRS. J. J. YOUNG, Iowa.

DEAR NEIGHBORS: One of us—a Neighbor who is afflicted has sent us a very touching letter inviting helpful sympathy. Any one who desires to know more about this case can do so by sending me a postal.

VERA L. CONNOLLY.

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the writer, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

A. G. W., Hutchinson, Kan. In your issue of July 10, I notice a question in the Mail-Bag (L. B., Manchester, N. H.) regarding Paul's life in Arabia. It is not being mentioned in Acts. I have by my side the "Life and Epistles of St. Paul," by Conybeare and Howson. In chapter III, page 79, it says: "Many questions have been raised concerning this journey into Arabia. The first relates to the meaning of the word. It has always been a term of vague and uncertain import. Sometimes it ranges over Lebanon itself, and extends even to the borders of Cilicia. The native geographers usually reckon that stony district of which Petra was the capital as belonging to Egypt, and that wide desert towards the Euphrates as belonging to Syria. If he went into Petraean Arabia, there still remains the question of his motive for the journey and his employment when there. Either, retiring before the opposition at Damascus, he went to preach the gospel, and then in the synagogues testified of Jesus; or he went for the purpose of contemplation and solitary communion with God, and then perhaps his steps were turned to those mountain heights by the Red Sea which Moses and Elijah had trodden before him. We cannot attempt to decide the question. The views which different inquirers take of it will probably depend on their tendency to be practical or the ascetic life."

R. L., McComb, Ohio. "Out of tune"—that is what we can say of at least fifty per cent of the church membership of today. Who are responsible for this condition, and how can you reënlist this sleeping "don't care" church membership? Thousands of others are asking the same question today. Happily, however, there are many good people who are doing more than merely asking; they are working and planning and praying for revitalizing the church. All unite heartily and sincerely in the effort, and good must result. The war is impressing upon the world the need of real Christianity taking the place of what is too evidently nominal belief. Many consecrated Christians, including some of the ablest and best men in the ministry, are sounding the call. There is great hope for the future of this movement here as well as abroad.

L. C. K., Waterville, Kan. The questions in your letter are, in the main, controversial, and discussion would be profitless.

J. M. M., Portland, Ore. President Wilson is a highly trained and effective speaker. We have heard him address great audiences, speaking without manuscript; yet his address is so thoroughly constructed, so logical and complete at all points, and wholly free from faults and blemishes that usually mark temporary speaking, that it may be said to have borne internal evidence of careful study and preparation. There may be occasions on which he uses manuscript when he delivers his official messages in Congress; it is quite expected that he should read it.

J. C. R., Cambridge, Me. Damascus has frequently been referred to by writers as the best city in existence. There have been many of earlier date, but like Babylon, Nineveh and a long line of others, they have passed away, either destroyed by wars or by the ravages of the centuries.

Mrs. F. J. H., LaGrange, Md. The liberation of Jerusalem and a large part of Palestine from Moslem rule has brought the whole question of gospeling the Jews to the front. The sympathies of the Christian world are awakened in their behalf. It is a time when Hebrew Christian missions should increase in number and redouble their activities.

C. D. H. We do not think well of the proposition for such a change as you suggest.

I. M., Wheeling, Va. Gossip and slander are wicked, either in or out of the church. It is sometimes very difficult to deal with such cases. You should consult your pastor, and be guided by his counsel. If he knows all the circumstances, he may be able to apply a remedy.

H. L. G., Austin, Texas. You would do well to inquire of the preacher in question and ascertain precisely what he did say, otherwise you may be judging him wrongly through a misapprehension. The words on the cross, mentioned in Mark 15:34, are regarded by the leading commentators as being a sentence taken literally, but in a Chaldee or Aramaic form, from the opening verse of the twenty-second Psalm. That the universally accepted translation is correct is nowhere doubted. Jameson, Faussett and Brown's Commentary takes this view, and it is accepted by other commentators without question. The preacher you speak of may have had some other aspect of the crucifixion in mind, possibly relating to the passage in John 3:14, 15.

One of our readers, Mrs. Emma Bailey of Richmond Hill, N. Y., celebrated her eighty-eighth birthday on August 13. Many relations and friends called to congratulate her, while others sent letters, postcards and gifts. This aged Christian is a cousin of the famous preacher, Rev. Peter Stryker. She has a keen memory and a happy way of relating reminiscences. Mrs. Bailey is intensely American, and follows the course of the war as told in the Christian Herald, which she reads without glasses.

J. E. M., Ozark, Ark. The following are the requirements for a chaplain in the army and appointments are open at present for chaplains. The salary of a chaplain ranges from $2,000 to $3,000. Most chaplains are commissioned as first lieutenants of the National Army with a salary of $2,000, but they may obtain as high a rank as major in the regular army, which commands a salary of $3,000 per year. A candidate for appointment as chaplain in the army must be a regularly ordained minister of some religious denomination and must be recommended by some authorized ecclesiastical body. He must be under forty-five years of age, and able to pass satisfactory mental, moral and physical examinations. Application blanks may be had from the Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C.

Homes for Returned Soldiers

SECRETARY LANE of the Department of the Interior recently presented to the President and Congress a comprehensive plan for a preliminary study of the unused lands of the country, with particular reference to the irrigation of some 15,000,000 acres of arid land, the drainage of 70,000,000 to 80,000,000 acres of swamp land, and the clearing of approximately 200,000,000 acres of cut-over or logged-off land, with the purpose in view of reclaiming those lands through governmental agency and providing homes for returned soldiers.

That the Secretary's letter touched a popular chord is indicated by many letters from Senators and Congressmen, comment in Congress, and editorial discussion in leading newspapers.

Senator Sherman of Illinois writes: "I believe fully in reasonable appropriations to promote the facilities to the returned soldier when peace comes to acquire an interest in the soil and become a producer of needed supplies. I shall act accordingly."

Representative Sanders of Louisiana writes: "Now is the time to prepare the laws; now is the time to coordinate the efforts of the nation, state and individual, so that when our soldiers of democracy shall return triumphant after their final struggle with autocracy, the government will be able to say to them: 'Here are the fields and farms that we have prepared for you, not as a gift, but as something that you may acquire upon just and reasonable and equitable terms.' You may count upon me with voice and vote to do every and any thing possible to bring this condition about."

Secretary Lane is asking Congress for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for this work, and has written to Hon. Swager Sherley, chairman of the Committee on appropriations of the House of Representatives, calling attention to the legislation already enacted by our Allies. In this letter he shows how in England, Wales and Scotland the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries may acquire land to be apportioned among returning soldiers for mixed farming, dairying and market gardening. Inexperienced men are to be trained, meanwhile receiving a living wage.

In Canada, where unoccupied land is more plentiful and cheap than in England, the Dominion government grants 160 acres of land free to the returned soldier, with a loan of $2,000 five per cent. for improvements, to be repaid in fifteen years. Inexperience men are trained as in England at current wages. This offer is open to soldiers and soldiers' widows from any part of the British Empire. In Ontario 1 acre of land are given free with a loan of $500 at six per cent. The other provinces have laws providing in somewhat similar ways for returned soldiers.

In Australia, South Africa and New Zealand plans are being worked out for the settlement of returned soldiers on public lands on specially favorable terms.

In France provision is made for loans to soldiers and civilian victims of the war. But since a large part of the soldiers of France are landowners, the problem of demobilization will be a simple one. The French soldiers will simply return to their homes.

As Secretary Lane says, "The preparation of plans for providing opportunity for our returning soldiers cannot be left to the day when the war is over." We can have a job at pay for every soldier who returns from France if Congress will give the financial support needed. A while at work the soldier can be making a home for himself for which he can pay the government in forty years' time. This plan has received the endorsement of so large a percentage of Congress and the press of the country that it appears to be a probable program; it certainly is a practicable one. We have put $200,000 now for preliminary surveys and reports, but this will be increased undoubtedly by the incoming Congress. There is enough waste and undeveloped land in this country to give every soldier a farm, but of course no such program is contemplated, because all would not want farms."

Marion Harland's Corner

What Is Meant by "Doing Our Bit"

THE space I have devoted to this letter will not be grudged by readers whose ears are constantly offended by puerile fretting over the restrictions to which we should submit eagerly and faithfully:

I was born and brought up in England, but married an American, and have had a happy home on this side of the water for twenty years. It goes without saying that I am, heart and soul, in sympathy with the great cause for which the Allies are fighting. So, you will not misunderstand the motive that lies back of this very plain talk with my sister housewives in these United States.

I don't know who first talked about "doing our bit" in the war. The phrase has been caught up and used on both sides of the Atlantic with an eagerness that shows how meaningful it is. My object in writing this, my first letter to the Corner, is to put a direct question to the aforesaid housewives and their women readers: What does the query mean for you, personally and individually? Are you one of the many who offend real patriots by peevish complaints of shortage in sugar, flour, meat and other things used to regard as necessities of daily living? Has it occurred to you that, in submitting cheerfully and willingly to these minor privations, you are helping to "win the war"?

I read some time ago in the Corner a quotation from an Englishwoman's letter to the effect that we Americans have not yet entered into this conflict as the French and English women have. May I give a chapter from my own experience that corroborates this criticism?

Last spring I contrived to get over to visit my sister in England. She lives in a small town not far from the sea. There were six of us, all told, in the household. She had two children, I one; my husband and a nursery-governess completed the number. We had a comfortable house, pleasant grounds, and the appointments of a modestly luxurious home. In the matter of food we fared no better—and no worse—than our neighbors. We were all upon what was virtually a voluntary system of rations, prescribed by local laws and observed strictly by every household.

We had meat twice a month and white bread once a week. One pound of sugar per month was allowed to our family, and we used no more. How did we contrive to live? To begin with, three of us grown people drank tea and coffee without sugar. The nursery-governess was rather delicate, and we agreed to let her sweeten her tea and give a rest to the children as a rare treat once a week in a pudding. We made the meat go as far as we could, in various ways. When it was gone, we lived on vegetables, cheese and cereals, with occasional catches of fish. Eggs and milk played a conspicuous part in our bills of fare. They did not bear transportation well, and were to be had from our own neighborhood.

The Queen of England set the example of abstaining from the use of all commodities which were required in "The Service." That was the catchword all over the realm. It was unkindly to consume what the soldiers must have to keep them in fighting trim. Every child learned that by the time he could walk.

And it was all done bravely and without a word or thought of complaint. To make the warless plight worse, we could buy neither rum, molasses nor honey.

This was the "bit" done by Englishwomen at the time of which I write. Home letters told me of even more grievous straits to which my transatlantic friends are submitting as bravely as when I learned from them what practical everyday and hourly Patriotism with a big "P!" means to us women who stay at home and keep the pot boiling while our men are facing death on the battlefield. Pardon the length of this protest against the self-hearted submission to the exigencies of war and seasons, expressions of which vex my soul to desperation day by day when uttered by women who should be thankful that they are able to contribute their bit of self-denial and ingenuity and cheerful resignation for the sake of right and justice, now on trial in the light of God and man.

I enclose my name and address that you may assure yourself of the truth of all I have said down. The subject is too serious for fling, or for drawing upon the imagination. Mrs. A. J. M. (New York).

OUR English-born member has told the tale so well that no editorial amplification is needed. Yet may I subjoin one thought? Mothers all over the land are exchanging tearful and prideful congratulations because college-bred daughters are striving agonizedly for enrolment in the bands of trained nurses, interpreters and volunteer workers in the humblest nooks and crannies of the service overseas. And this is right and good—honorable to the sex and to the nation. I heard the other day of an accomplished young woman who has washed dishes for a year in a foreign base hospital and without a murmur.

"Mine was a whole-hearted offer of help," she says. "The powers that be have ordained that I am most needed here. In a word that this is my bit. I am a soldier under orders."

The woman who stays at home because somebody "must keep the pot boiling" has also her appointed task. And she, too, is "under orders."

It is fitting that we annex to the foregoing the rules published by the United States Food Administration relative to sugar rations:

Sugar Distribution

7. How much sugar can each person have?

Not more than two pounds per month per person for household use and a limited supply for the necessary preservation of fruits and other foods. The Army and Navy must receive their ration.

8. How is the Food Administration handling distribution of sugar?

Use of sugar in manufacturing anything but foodstuffs and explosives has been forbidden; manufacturers of soft drinks, candy, and other less essentials have been rigidly restricted; the supply of sugar to ice-cream makers and bakers has been curtailed. For ordinary household use, not more than two pounds can be bought at one time for town and city residents, and not more than five pounds at one time for country people, except at the discretion of the Federal Food Administrator for the state, or his deputies.

9. What restrictions have been placed on public eating-houses in regard to sugar?

For every ninety meals served not more than two pounds of sugar may be purchased.

10. Are there other rules?

Federal Food Administrators in the various states may make rulings to suit local conditions in regard to sugar for home canning.

11. Are civilians to consider themselves on a definite sugar ration?

Yes. They are in honor bound to use not more than two pounds per person per month. They are directed to use sugar substitutes as much as they can. "Substitutes" include corn syrup, honey, maple sugar, maple syrup, sorghum, fruit, fruit juices, etc.

The success of this program rests on the honor and co-operation of the American people.

AS a final contribution to the valuable recipes for preserving green corn for winter use, I venture to publish one too good to be laid aside for another season. There are still portions of our great territory where "King Corn" may be enjoyed in tender succulence as the national vegetable par excellence. The formula here given is comprehensive and clearly expressed. Those to whom it comes too late for present use will act wisely and well in clipping it from the paper and pasting it in the family recipe book. It will keep!

Dried Green Corn

Have good, well-filled ears of sweet corn all ready, as for cooking. Have ready a milk-pan or bake-pan, one that will fit into the oven. With a sharp knife cut off the top of grains of corn, then scrape all the milk from the cob, being careful not to scrape the husks. When the pan is filled to about two inches from the top, place it in a hot oven and cook until the milk is dried out. Stir often while it cooks.

Have ready a clean table, or dryer. Put a clean cloth on this and spread the corn out thin; cover with clean mosquito netting to exclude dust. Stir several times during the day, and leave it until it is perfectly dry. Then put it into a clean sack and hang in a good dry place. It will keep a year if dried this way.

When ready to use the corn put to soak in lukewarm water over night on back of stove. Next day let it stay where it will be hot, but do not let it boil until about half an hour before serving. Add a piece of butter, salt to taste, stir in a very little sugar unless you have good rich milk and cream. That is sufficient with a little thickening added to make the milk creamy.—Mrs. M. M. (Oregon).

A fireless cooker cuts the coal bill.

Break the coal to sizes no larger than eggs.

Some of us can afford to eat less food in order that none may be foodless.

Think What She Can Do

With Puffed Rice, Puffed Wheat and Corn Puffs on hand, think of the possibilities.

Three kinds of bubble grains to serve, each with a different flavor.

All can be served like other cereals, or served with melted butter.

All taste like airy nut meats. Salt or lightly butter, and they become food confections. They are ideal tidbits for hungry children after school.

Nothing else is half so welcome in a bowl of milk. The grains are thin, crisp, toasted, porous—puffed to eight times normal size.

They make an airy, nut-like garnish for ice cream. And they are ever-ready toasted wafers for a soup.

Any fruit dish is made doubly delightful with these flimsy, flavory globules scattered in it.

Puffed Rice Puffed Wheat Corn Puffs
All Bubble Grains
Each 15c Except in Far West

Two of these are whole grains puffed by steam explosions. Every food cell is exploded, so these grain foods easily digest.

The fearful heat creates a fascinating flavor. The explosions change the whole grains to fragile, toasted bubbles.

Corn Puffs are pellets of hominy puffed in like way to thin, flavory globules. All form the best ways in which these grains are served. No other method makes them so enticing, or so fits them for digestion.

Serve all of them in all the ways you can.

Get More Eggs On Less Feed

Egg prices this winter will undoubtedly be the highest in the world's history. Those who know how to feed to get winter eggs will reap enormous profits, while improper methods mean a loss.

Prof. T. E. Quisenberry, one of the world's greatest poultry authority and President of the American Poultry School, Box 1012, Leavenworth, Kansas, has issued a 16-page bulletin on "How and What to Feed for Heavy Egg Production and to Cut the Cost of Feed." This Bulletin will be mailed Free to interested readers, while they last. Hundreds of hens fed and cared for under Prof. Quisenberry's direction have laid 200 to 208 eggs per year, while the normal production according to U. S. Government reports is 60 to 80 eggs per year. Abraham Giving Isaac to God

Gen. 22: 1-14

The Spiritual Conception of Sacrifice

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THIS story of Abraham and Isaac on Mount Moriah must have been used again and again by the ancient Hebrews to explain why their people offered no human sacrifices. All around them were tribes who gave their best, even their sons and daughters, in fiery holocaust to heathen idols. Perhaps many a Hebrew chieftain was reproached by an alien with the taunt that he had never sacrificed a son to Jehovah his God. Then the story which is our lesson came to his lips as it was told him by his father, that God desires the utter dedication of all, even our dearest, but that he requires no mutilated bodies to appease his anger, preferring living souls doing his holy will, rather than dead children upon high altars. To such perplexed ancient worshippers the central feature of the chapter lies in the voice from heaven that cried unto Abraham, "Lay not thy hand upon the lad!" when he was about to slay his son. It was a revelation that God is satisfied with absolute trust and willing obedience.

The Lesson of Faith

To us, the story centers instead upon the wonderful faith of the patriarch in this supreme test of his life. He had come to believe that God should bless him with a numerous posterity, who should be a great nation. These hopes were fastened upon Isaac his son. Yet in the midst of his wanderings, his conscience became aroused to a deep sense of a withheld offering. Perhaps in the land of the Philistines he had witnessed the sublime devotion of some agonized chief who had sacrificed his first-born on the altar. It seemed to Abraham that Jehovah was calling insistently for a final proof of his loyalty, and that he, too, must offer up his son for a burnt offering.

How beautiful and awesome is the scene as father and son draw near the place of oblation! With what quiet trust the young man asks his father concerning the victim, "Behold the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb?" Can you imagine with what effort for self-control and faith came the answer, "God will provide himself the lamb, my son?" Then, when his son had willingly submitted upon hearing of the dread requirement, and lay bound, awaiting the blow, the discovery of the ram caught in the thicket opened up Abraham's eyes to the true will of Jehovah, the Everlasting Father. He did not desire the blood of a victim, but he honored and blessed the wonderful faith of his servant. New peace and new gratitude dwelt afterward in the heart of Abraham. He had triumphed in spirit in the very crisis of his career.

Giving Our Best to God

Abraham's sensitive spirit rightly felt that he could not withhold his best from God. In like manner we find David saying, "Neither will I offer burnt offerings unto Jehovah that cost me nothing." This fine feeling of sacrifice pervaded Hebrew religion. The first-fruits of the fields, the unblemished lamb and ox, the finest of the wheat, constituted their offerings. What a contrast between such a conception of worship and the pitiful poverty of soul evinced by some moderns who feel no compulsion to give to God at all, no gratitude whatever, or who perfunctorily dole out beggarly gifts upon his altars!

Fortunately, the great hosts of the people are learning to give nowadays. Moreover, the Great War is teaching us to give even our lives, yea, to give the lives of our beloved sons, dearer to us than our own. The spirit of Abraham is matched today in scores of American homes, from that of ex-President Roosevelt to the poorest of immigrant households whose young men have fallen in France. The emergency of today, like the upheaval in Abraham's heart, has brought out and developed the latent possibilities of utter consecration of the best and dearest for the cause of right and for the future of the Kingdom of God on earth.

How shall this affect our boys and girls in the Sunday schools? We trust that it will not be necessary for them in coming days to go to war or to send their sons to their death; one of our incentives in fighting is to safeguard their future from that very thing. But we do want them to imbibe that spirit of sacrifice which flows through the manhood and womanhood of America today. We must catch their imaginations with the sublimity of it all. We must also see to it that they have chances to deny themselves, to forego pleasures willingly, to do without luxuries voluntarily, and above all to think of their debt to God in deep and noble terms. It is so easy for them to become selfish and unworthy. Why, hundreds of children withhold even the money entrusted to them to give to God through the school! Speak plainly of the meanness and sinfulness of such selfish irreverence.

Sacrifice Must Be for a Worthy End

God does not desire sacrifice merely as such. He desires the spirit of consecration directed to noble purposes. What a horrible mistake even Christians made, when the old monks tore their flesh and mutilated their bodies, in a misguided belief that God would be pleased thereby! God wants sacrifices that are for a cause, that accomplish results, that change the current of events. He does not wish us to cut off a limb as an act of worship, but he does want us to be willing to lose an arm, or a leg, or life itself, in delivering his children from the cruelty of the oppressor. He does not wish us to go about starving as a token of repentance, but he does honor us for going without wheat that the hungry nations may be fed. It is for true faith to believe that every real sacrifice accomplishes results for God. In a moral universe we cannot fail of service, if we give to God and men our very best.

Supreme tests come to us all when sacrifice is very hard, even as it was to Abraham. Such tests in similar terms are coming today upon the fathers and mothers of young men everywhere just now. But for the most part, our daily self-sacrifice brings daily reward, and sacrifice becomes "not grievous but joyous."

We come to put the emphasis not upon what we give, but upon what we achieve and accomplish for God's kingdom and for the blessing of his children; not upon the selfish indulgence denied but upon the approval of Christ won. Dr. Trumbull once said, "Self-denial is liable to be painful and bitter at the start. Self-sacrifice can be and ought to be—it is when it is hearty and genuine—delightful and joyous from first to last. Doubtless the joy of Jesus was deep-grounded in the utter devotion of his will to the purpose of his Father. I knew he was sacrificing to serve. Hence he could say, 'Rejoice and be exceeding glad' even in persecution, because those who have been persecuted for righteousness' sake are treading in the footsteps of the prophets of God, in the way of sacrifice for men."

Loyalty to Truth

From Abraham let us learn to be utterly loyal to truth as God reveals unto us. Like him let us be teachable ever growing in the knowledge of his will, lest our obedience be stupid and blundering and formal.

Let us believe that the God who spoke unto our fathers will also speak unto us, showing us newer, higher more spiritual modes of worshipping and serving him.

Sunday School Method

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Getting All the Church Into the Sunday School

IN these days of national campaigns it may be of interest to know that the government is considering the launching of a campaign to build up the morale of the nation by urging church and Sunday school attendance.

In such a campaign full stress would be laid upon Sunday school attendance by both the church and the community. One verse of the Bible understood, memorized, lived, loved may be a Rock of Gibraltar—nay, more, the Rock of Ages—in life's emergencies.

So for the sake of our country it must be Back to the Book. But how?

First. Start family prayer in your own home. Read there aloud a portion of the Book each day. Make one verse in that reading your sheet-anchor for the day about the home. Do this for your spiritual conservation just as much as you save food or forbear luxuries for the conservation of the government's resources.

Second. Plan a campaign to get every member of the church in some class of the Sunday school as a war measure. The Sunday school needs workers to replace those who have enlisted.

This is the way one school (the Bushwick Avenue Central M. E. of Brooklyn, N. Y.) goes about it. The pastor, superintendent and associate superintendent unite in the following letter to a new church member:

"Our Bible school is interested in your recent entrance into the membership of the Church. Our hands are extended in a welcome most cordial. We hope that you are a lover of the Bible school, and that you are planning to enroll at once as one of its members here; also that because this is now your Bible school you will appropriate its privileges and do what you may be able to do to advance its usefulness. We would suggest that you visit next Sunday the class taught by Mr. — in the — Department."

Then to the teacher of that class is sent this letter:

"Mr. —, living at —, has recently joined our church, and the Bible school has invited — to unite with the school, suggesting that — visit your class. Will you endeavor to secure this person as a member extending such a warmth of welcome as will bind — to the school in helpful relationship? Appreciating your cooperation."

Third. Organize parents' classes. A good plan to start is with the parents of the youngest children. The mothers frequently come with the young children and will come more if there is a special class for them near their little ones. In our school we have now five large mothers' classes that started from one class of mothers of the beginners. We organized these mothers into the Royal Daughters. They had their monthly social gathering.

Then we found some fathers coming with these young mothers, and we challenged them to form a fathers' class. And now there are fifty fathers organized into the Tower Class because they meet in the church tower, and nearly all of the men have joined the church.

Once a month we have all these mothers together in a mothers' meeting.

Fourth. Get the children to invite their parents to join these classes.

"A little child shall lead them" is as true today as ever.

Through such steady pressure upon the adults surprising results come. One Sunday 500 men were aimed at as an attendance goal at church, and by getting all the school at work with their fathers 500 men were there. Then on Mothers' Day 500 mothers were the goal, and nearly 600 were there.

Routing Huns On All the Fronts

WHEN President Wilson declared for "Force without stint or limit" he anticipated the strategy of Marshal Foch which has been revealing itself since July 18, when the great German offensive ended in the beginnings of retreat. Hitherto an attack has been pressed home, and then relative quiet has reigned along the reestablished front. But Marshal Foch's offensives, when vigorously pushed as far as wise tactics indicate, have never wholly relaxed but have settled down to steady pressure. Thus, from Rheims all the way along the old Hindenburg positions to Ypres, the German armies were held in a death grapple with the ceaselessly active troops of the Allies. Foch gave them no rest. But he did not confine himself to this single reach of the far-flung battle line.

September 18 saw the Allied armies in action in Palestine and Macedonia. In both these theaters of war, careful strategy wrought real victories, armies were destroyed and the whole offensive plan of the foe has been trapped and disorganized. But it was not enough to attack at front and rear. On September 26, Marshal Foch unleashed the American First Army and the French armies on their left and sent them against the German flank in the Champagne country between Verdun and Rheims. On a front of fifty miles from Auberive to the Meuse, crossing the great Forest of the Argonne, the German defense system crumbled and the Allied troops surged forward.

The major attack was made by the Americans along a twenty-mile front eastward of the Meuse. General Pershing reported on the evening of the 10th that the enemy lines had been penetrated to an average depth of seven miles. 5,000 prisoners had been taken and the American troops were still pressing on. The French on the American left went in to an average depth of four miles, and French soldiers were advancing over ground and through villages held by the Germans since 1914. His attack was made almost on the anniversary of General Petain's Champagne attack of September 25, 1915. Petain then made considerable gains, tactically breaking the German line, and took 25,000 prisoners and many guns, but did not have the necessary reserves to exploit his success.

In Palestine, General Allenby's victory has throughout the week developed more and more into a complete and overwhelming defeat for the Turkish-German army, the number of prisoners had risen to 45,000 on September 27 and the Turkish Fourth Army, operating east of the Jordan, was surrounded with the British troops advancing northward from Amman on the Hedjaz Railway, with British and Arab forces eastward of its position, cutting it off from the Syrian desert, and with Arab troops advancing southward from the vicinity of Galilee. The British on Sept. 26 occupied Tiberias and two other towns on the Sea of Galilee. When the Turkish Fourth Army is accounted for, General Allenby will have destroyed a force of 100,000 men—the whole Turkish Palestine army—and will have practically cleared the way to Aleppo and a junction with the British in Mesopotamia.

The Bulgarian armies on September 26 had been broken into separate units. The Bulgarian First Army was practically surrounded northwest of Monastir, leaving all of its roads of retreat either cut or under gun-fire, except the trails leading through the mountains to Albania. The other Bulgarian armies are falling back, fighting desperate and unheroic actions, before the Greek, British, Serbian, French and Italian armies. There was no division of Czech-Slovaks in the war with the Serbs. The Serbs were over fifty miles from their starting place and had taken Veles and Prilep on the highway from Monastir to Uskub and Ishtib on the highway from Veles to the Bulgarian fortress of Strumnitza. The British and Greeks, driving northward from Lake Doiran, were over the Bulgarian border and fighting for the heights commanding Strumnitza. For the first time in the war, Bulgaria was invaded and popular unrest in that country was reaching a critical stage. King Ferdinand was reported to have appealed to Field Marshal von Mackensen, in command of the Teutonic armies of occupation in Rumania, to come to Bulgaria and take command of his shattered forces. Von Mackensen was said to have refused. Meanwhile the Allies' successes had inspired the Rumanian peasants to revolt and the German army of occupation faced serious difficulties.

During the week, the British and French continued to draw closer to St. Quentin. The British on Sept. 25 took and held Seleny and Gricourt, after three days of constant fighting in which counter-attacks mingled with attacks; 1,500 prisoners were taken in the fighting and important height positions were wrested from the Germans, who were thrown back against the main Hindenburg defenses.

The British forces advancing in Macedonia captured the Bulgarian city of Strumnitza on September 27, while their Serbian allies forced their way toward Bulgaria along the valleys to the northward, taking Kochana and Ishtib. With her armies driven back and hopelessly broken and her people almost in revolt, Bulgaria appealed to Germany for 300,000 reinforcements, which were refused. Finding no succor there, Premier Malinoff, with the consent of Czar Ferdinand, sent emissaries to General D'Esperey, commanding the Allied troops in Macedonia, asking an armistice for forty-eight hours to permit the arrival of two authorized delegates from the Bulgarian Government, "to arrange the conditions of the armistice and eventually the terms of peace."

General D'Esperey replied, "I can accord neither an armistice nor a suspension of hostilities tending to interrupt the operations in course. On the other hand, I will receive with all due courtesy the delegates, duly qualified, of the Royal Bulgarian Government, these delegates to present themselves in the British lines, accompanied by a parlementaire."

General Haig, on September 27, struck a new blow in the direction of Cambrai. With an American division on his right, he struck eastward along a front of about fourteen miles, penetrating over most of the front to a depth of three miles, taking Bourlon Wood, Fles-Quieres, Sauchy-Cauchy and crossing the Canal du Nord south-east of Mœuvres and seizing dominating heights against fierce enemy resistance.

Extending the front of attack to just north of St. Quentin, General Haig, on September 28 and 29, overran the main Hindenburg defenses along most of the distance, some thirty miles, and broke through the support lines around Cambrai, advancing to the southwestern and northwestern suburbs of this important railway center. An American army corps under Major General G. W. Read, U. S. A., crushed the Hindenburg line on a front of 5,000 yards, crossing the Scheldt Canal and capturing Bellincourt and Nauroy.

While the British with American help were thus smashing the important defense centers east of Arras, the French under General Mangin continued their advance across the Chemin des Dames, taking Laffaux and Fort Malmaison and driving forward down the slopes toward the hinge of the line at Laon. With these two vital points under attack, the Americans and French kept on with their flanking attack in the Champagne and along the Meuse. Resisting everywhere to the full limit of their powers, the Germans made most desperate efforts to halt this thrust against their flank. In spite of their resistance, however, the Allies moved steadily forward. By September 29 the Americans had advanced nearly fifteen miles, crossing all of the Hindenburg defense system and taking Briailles on the edge of the Kriemhilde line running from Grandpré across the Argonne and the Meuse to Damvillers. Here the Americans faced the Prussian Guard and once more took the measure of this crack organization, stopping its counter-attacks and pressing it back over two miles.

As if this were not enough for the tortured Teuton, the Belgians, on September 28, joined in north of Ypres and drove forward for several miles along a long front. They took Dixmude and Passchendaele and were within two miles of Roulers on September 30.

In all of these drives large numbers of prisoners were taken, the Allied total for the week exceeding 100,000 on all fronts, with over 500 guns. Since July 18 the total captures to September 29 were 200,000 prisoners, 3,000 guns, 20,000 machine guns and much other material.

The Balkan situation on September 30 appeared to have resolved itself into a race for Sofia. Germany, apparently repenting of her refusal to aid Bulgaria, was planning to send six divisions to the help of her ally, while the representatives of that ally were in Salonica, ready to treat with the Entente for peace. To provide troops for Macedonia, Germany was withdrawing her occupying forces from Rumania, and it was intimated that with her troops in Sofia she would prevent the closing of a separate peace agreement by Bulgaria. Meantime the Serbian, British, Greek, French and Italian troops continued northward, the British and Greeks being twenty-five miles over the Bulgarian frontier.

Bulgaria's peace representatives were General Lonkoff, commander of the Bulgarian Second Army; M. Liapcheff, Finance Minister, and M. Radeff, a former cabinet minister.

On October 30, although the whole battle line was swept by driving rain and the Allied troops had to fight weather, mud and Germans altogether, the fierce contests of the day everywhere ended in Allied success. About Cambrai the British, Australian and American forces passed the city on the north and were fighting in the northern and western suburbs at nightfall. The city was on fire. To the north Belgian and British troops took Roulers and drove the Germans from Messines Ridge south of Ypres. Southward from Cambrai toward St. Quentin the British mopped up the Hindenburg defenses, crossing the Scheldt Canal and retaking Villers-Guilain and Gonnelleu where German counter-attacks had pressed them back on the previous day. In the Champagne the French kept on and the Americans in the Argonne and eastward to the Meuse, after a day of fluctuating fortune, pressed closer to the Kriemhilde line, Germany's last ditch south of the Belgian line. The Germans threw fresh troops against the doughboys east of the Argonne and succeeded in driving a wedge in the line held by Kansas and Missouri divisions. Pennsylvania troops took the Germans in hand and drove them back with fearful losses.

From Flanders to Lorraine the whole German war machine was writhing in torment under Foch's implacable pressure and unending blows and the air was rife with the possibility of great events.

His Promise Is Sure

IN these days when the world travails and men's hearts grow strong or fail, it is well to know upon what our faith is founded, upon what our cause rests. Next week Dr. Keigwin eloquently portrays "God's Oath, the Ground of Confidence."

All things work together for good to the heroine of a story, so you may still have faith in Mary Ellis and may look forward to next week's chapters without misgivings.

Next week also a new message from Palestine, fresh from the lips of one just returned after months in the Holy Land.

Next week, too, a vitally interesting corner in cookery under Marion Harland's skillful hand.

"Closer to the Almighty"

THIS is the philosophy of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, the author of "The Harvester," "A Girl of the Limberlost," and other marvelously successful stories—to bring those who read her books "Closer to Nature and the Almighty." Mrs. Porter has opened the eyes of thousands to the wonder and glory of the world about them. Mrs. Porter, who has spent her lifetime with the birds, the moths, the butterflies, the herbs and the flowers, weaves into her stories the love of Nature, and every one of her novels stimulates the reader's interest in the life of the woods and fields.

Mrs. Porter's stories all have, as a fundamental reason of their existence, the author's great love of Nature. To impart this love to others—to inspire many hundreds of thousands to look for the first time with seeing eyes at the pageant of the out-of-doors—is her gift of rare quality.

Thousands of people have sent the author word that through her books they have been led afield and to their first realization of the beauties of Nature. Through the romance of life and the delights of Nature she directs the mind upward toward the Infinite into an atmosphere that is sweet, cleansing and exalting.

In writing of "A Girl of the Limberlost," Mrs. Porter said: "This comes fairly close to my idea of a good book. The book can, and does, present a hundred pictures that will draw any reader in closer touch with Nature and the Almighty, my primal object in each line I write."

Over 3,000,000 Copies of Mrs. Porter's Books Have Been Sold

ALL large book circulations come from only one cause—the recommendation of one reader to another. Mrs. Porter's novels are not only wholesome and clean, but they are romantic and cheerful. The people who live in their pages do things and accomplish tasks worth while. In the last six months of 1915 the sales of her books in the United States, England, Australia, and many other places were 625,000 copies for six months alone.

Another reason why Mrs. Porter's books have so great an appeal is that the whole family enjoy them. They are not for men, women, or children, but for all three; and an important feature is that they will be eagerly read by young people.

Rare Chance to Obtain a Special Edition of Mrs. Porter's Novels

IT is the desire of the Christian Herald to give its readers an opportunity to procure the best in literature at very reasonable cost. Of the many thousands of books which we have considered, we selected Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter's novels as the ones which should be in every Christian Herald home. Arrangements have just been completed with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works to print a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. These six volumes will be printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear, and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth, with gilt tops, making them especially attractive. Twenty-five full-page illustrations.

Mrs. Porter's Novels in 6 Volumes

AT THE FOOT OF THE RAINBOW An idyl of central Indiana—a tale of devoted friendship and tender, self-sacrificing love—the friendship that gives freely without return, and the love that seeks first the happiness of the object.

FRECKLES Few books of recent years have sounded such a new and wholly refreshing note as that which dominates "Freckles." It is a gem, full of beauty and sentiment and well worth reading. It is an out-door story filled with adventure and pleasant atmosphere.

A GIRL OF THE LIMBERLOST This companion story to "Freckles" has repeated the striking success of that book, which, published over ten years ago, has steadily increased its tens of thousands of readers year by year. It is an exquisitely simple love story which stands for true womanhood, as did "Freckles" for pure manhood.

THE HARVESTER Mrs. Porter has lavished upon this unique romance all the wealth of nature lore and nature love from her years of patient enthusiastic study. It is a charming blend of love, romance and the hidden delights of the woods and roads.

LADDIE, A TRUE-BLUE STORY The love story of Laddie and Pamela Pryor, the English neighbors of the Strattons, as told by Little Sister, the youngest of the Pryors, is a genuine "home-story" close to the heart of Man and of Nature.

SONG OF THE CARDINAL A beautiful and touching story of the love of a Cardinal bird for its mate with an appeal to every one who cares for true romance, as delightful for its descriptions of wild life and nature as for its tender human feelings.

filing past ballot boxes and telling clerks registered their subscriptions. In thirty minutes the city's quota was oversubscribed.

In New York City every block on Fifth Avenue included in the Avenue of the Allies is thronged daily with sightseers. From far and near they journey to admire this inspiring decorative feature of the Liberty Loan campaign.

Reports which flood the Treasury Department from all parts of the country give promise that something of the impetuosity of American soldiers on the western front is actuating the army of more than a million Fourth Liberty Loan workers who have dedicated themselves to gathering the great golden harvest. The only anxiety felt by officials is lest the tremendous initial success may cause overconfidence. Every worker and every citizen is expected to continue to do his utmost up to the end; and if far more than the $6,000,000,000 is subscribed, the more the better.

INFLUENZA EPIDEMIC. Spanish Influenza, which began to appear on this side of the water in midsummer had reached epidemic proportions on Sept. 28, and the full power of the government was being exerted, in unison with the health departments of the States and cities, to stamp it out and keep it under control. The disease has been identified as our old friend the "Grippe"—a form of pneumonia—and is infectious. On Sept. 26, there were 6,139 new cases in the army camps in the country and 723 new cases of pneumonia. There were then in all camps 35,146 cases of influenza and 3,036 cases of pneumonia. Because of this condition the call for 142,000 new registrants to report to the camps was canceled. The influenza was seriously epidemic in Massachusetts, there being 85,000 cases in the State and the daily number of new cases was increasing in New York and other eastern cities. The Public Health Service, on Sept. 27, asked for an appropriation of $1,000,000 to fight the disease, and a resolution was introduced in Congress to make the money available. The American Red Cross and the Public Health Service rushed nurses and physicians to Boston to fight the epidemic, and Nova Scotia, remembering Halifax, also sent aid. On October 1 the health authorities were confident that the epidemic was under control.

PRESIDENT URGES SUFFRAGE IN SENATE. President Wilson appeared before the Senate on September 30, and asked that that body pass the resolution proposing a Woman Suffrage Amendment to the Constitution. The resolution had been the subject of debate for a week and appeared doomed to defeat since the opposition held solidly a block of 33 votes against it. The President urged the action as a war measure, and as a means of clearing our own democracy of any charge of insincerity.

HERTLING RESIGNS. Count von Hertling, on Sept. 27, resigned his post as German Imperial chancellor, and Admiral von Hintze resigned as head of the Foreign Office. The Kaiser accepted the resignations. There was a report that Lieut.-Gen. von Stein, Prussian Minister of War, had also resigned.

ARMY ENDS BRITISH STRIKE. The British Government took prompt action, on Sept. 25, to put an end to the strike of the engine drivers in South Wales and of the engine drivers in parts of England who struck in sympathy. The government promptly put soldiers on the trains to replace the strikers, and the strike collapsed.

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND DIES. Archbishop Ireland, of the Catholic Archdiocese of Minnesota, died on Sept. 25. He was born in County Kilkenny, Ireland, April 11, 1838, came to the United States with his parents in 1841 and reached St. Paul, Minn., in 1851. He was studying for the priesthood in France when the American Civil War broke out. He hurried back home, was ordained, and became chaplain of the 5th Regiment of Minnesota volunteers. A leader in every good cause, the Archbishop was particularly noted for his stand upon the temperance question having organized the first temperance society in the Catholic church. He became Archbishop in 1888.

FORMING A NEW RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT. It was announced from Paris, Sept. 24, that members of the constituent assembly in Russia, which was dissolved by the Bolsheviks because they could not control it, were forming a single government for all that part of Russia not under the control of the Reds, at a meeting of the Provisional Cabinet being held at Ufa, European Russia. Col. Boris A. Duroff, on Sept. 20, became Governor General of the region of the North, replacing the Tschaikovsky government at Archangel and acting under the authority of the central government at Samar. A central government was also being organized in Siberia. American Consul General De Witt C. Poole, who remained at Moscow until he was ordered away by Secretary Lansing for his own safety, was reported, on Sept. 21, as safe in Helsingfors on the way to Stockholm. On Sept. 25 there was a report that a number of French and British officers who were taking refuge in the American Consulate at Moscow under the protection of the Norwegian Consul had been surrounded by a Bolshevik Guard who demanded their surrender.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The last negro soldiers of the 24th Inf., convicted of complicity in the Houston riots, of August of last year was hanged at Fort Sam Houston on Sept. 24. Six of the rioters were sentenced to death and 99 others one killed himself, and the rest were sentenced to prison for terms ranging from 2 years to life. . . . Fire in the New Willard Hotel in Washington, early on the morning of Sept. 24, sent the Vice-President and some sundry Senators, Representatives and diplomats to the lobby and the street in hastily improvised array, the Vice-President reaching the writing room wearing a bath robe, house slippers and a black felt hat. . . . Henry Ford, who was nominated for Senator from Michigan on the Democrat ticket, with his consent, but without any effort on his part, announced on Sept. 25, that while he would serve as Senator if the people should so desire he would not spend a cent to be elected. . . . In a severe hurricane off the coast of Lower California, on Sept. 17, two new vessels of the United States Shipping Board fleet, the steel steamer Blackford, and the wooden steamer Cove Bay foundered. The crews were saved. . . . There was a report on Sept. 26 that the Russian Bolshevik Government had issued a decree stopping the reign of terror condemned by President Wilson. . . . With numbers running from 1 to 17,000 the nation's greatest lottery, to decide the order of service of the 13,000,000 men who registered on Sept. 12, was opened in Washington on Sept. 30 by President Wilson. Number 322 was the first drawn. The drawing was completed at 8 A.M. on Oct. 1, number 12,734 coming out last. Provost Marshal Crowder on Sept. 29, notified all draft boards that the military program required that all men in Class 1 be made available for training within 90 days. . . . The U. S. Battleship Minnesota struck a mine off Delaware Breakwater, on Sept. 29, but was able to make port under her own steam. . . . To avert a coal famine and to meet all the needs of the war program Fuel Administrator Garfield on Sept. 30, launched a coal drive to continue until April 1. He asked the bituminous operators and miners to produce 12,234,000 tons a week and the anthracite interest 2,030,000 tons.

Saving Shipwrecked Men

THERE is no more sensible, more worth-while, or more needy form of fraternal aid than yours. You not only save men's souls, but you save their lives for society. You keep the breeches-buoy working by which shipwrecked men get back from the midnight sea of despair to lives filled with new hope and courage. If the charitably inclined people of this big friendly country of ours only knew, as I know, that the majority of men behind the walls are at heart good men, who crave nothing more than one more chance to show that they are good men, your society would have the hearty support which it deserves. I am sending you $5. If I had $50 more I would send it, too. God bless you and the society."

Thus wrote T. W. W.—a man whom the Prisoners' Relief Society had placed in a position in Baltimore, Md.

"I only regret that people who are able to help you in your good work cannot drop in and see as I have the earnest hard work that you are doing and the good that you are doing for those poor fellows staggering along the border-line between hope and despair, stung by the shock of humiliation and stazed by the long terms of confinement and abuse. I blew into your office unannounced and was treated with kindness and confidence and a sincere desire to help me to help myself. Your enthusiasm in the work and the great need for its continuance should enlist all good people to aid you, and it will. Keep on keeping on for the sake of the poor fellows who can't."

Yours gratefully,
(Signed) JAMES O. B.—."

Thus wrote a man who was directed to the office of the Prisoners' Relief Society when he thought all hope was gone. He is now working in the government printing office, working overtime and undays printing Liberty Bonds; happy in his work, and making a new name and a new record which he may be proud to acknowledge before the world.

In one of the leading churches in Washington is a young woman, a member of the church, now earning $90 per month, as yet only twenty-four years old, a high school graduate, who was sentenced to Auburn, N. Y., prison before she was twenty-one, serving two years. After her release she secured a place in the hosiery department of one of New York's department stores, was recognized by a former acquaintance, who told, and she lost her job. For two months she lived in a dive on New York's East Side; then she drifted to Baltimore, where she had once lived and worked. While waiting in the rain for a street car a gentleman shared his umbrella with her. It rained harder and they stepped into a recess in a building for greater protection. After some talk, and finding him sympathetic, she told the story of her past, and the man gave her $5 and made her promise to report the next day to the office of the Prisoners' Relief Society in Washington. He refused to give his name, but merely told her he was a member of the Baltimore Rotary Club. The next day, which was a day in April, 1918, the girl turned up at the office of the society. She was found a position as clerk in one of the leading stores of the capital, room and board was secured in a Methodist family, and she learned typewriting evenings at the offices of the society. Today this girl is helping to win the war.

These are just glimpses into the day's work of the Prisoners' Relief Society, now established at Washington, and doing excellent work.

The society's budget for the year is extremely moderate. All that they ask is $3,000, or $250 a month. Their building is self-supporting and furnishes them rent free. They are at no cost for fuel; in placing men in employment they have the active support of the Rotary Club, the great railway corporations, and large employers of labor, through whom they are able to secure positions for as many men as apply.

We do not know of any work which accomplishes so much upon such a small budget. The Christian Herald Family has loyally supported this work from its inception, and we urge upon each member of the family that he examine his ability to give and send us some money at once for this work, which is so imperative just now when every hand that can be set at work is needed in the great enterprise of making the world safe for democracy and smashing the Hindenburg line of tyranny.

Send all gifts for the Prisoners' Relief Society in care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Four Years of War Trade

EXPORTS of manufactures from the United States in the first four years of the war equal in value those of the seventeen years preceding; exports of foodstuffs are as much as in ten prior years; while exports of manufacturing material show a decline. A compilation by the National City Bank of New York shows that our total foreign trade in the first four years of the war was $9,232,000,000, and in the four years immediately preceding, $15,972,000,000. The imports increased from $6,887,000,000 to $9,558,000,000; exports from $1,084,000,000 to $19,674,000,000. The increase in imports is practically 40 per cent., and in exports, 117 per cent. The fall in the value of manufacturing material exported is due chiefly to decline of about 33 per cent. in quantity of cotton exported, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Belgium and Russia having been practically out of the market. Foodstuffs exported in the four years war aggregated $4,852,000,000 against $738,000,000 in the four years preceding. Manufactures exported in the war years aggregated $11,526,000,000 against $4,212,000,000, while the group "miscellaneous" was $300,000,000 against $31,000,000, due to the fact that it includes horses and mules. Thus in exports, manufacturing material shows a decline of approximately per cent., foodstuffs an increase of 9 per cent., and manufactures an increase of 174 per cent.

The total value of manufacturing material imported in the four years of war was $3,913,000,000 against $2,336,000,000 in the four years preceding; foodstuffs, $2,521,000,000 against $1,661,000,000; and of manufactures $3,058,000,000 against $2,829,000,000. Manufacturing material imported shows an increase in valuation of 67 per cent., foodstuffs 52 per cent., and manufactures only 8 per cent.

Imports from Europe in the four war years are but $2,204,000,000 against $3,376,000,000 in the pre-war period, a fall-off of 35 per cent., due in part to the absence of trade with the Central Powers and Belgium, while the Allied countries had comparatively little merchandise to send us. The exports to Europe, however, show for the four years $13,568,000,000 against $5,616,000,000 in the four pre-war years, an increase of 141 per cent. This total to Europe included that sent to Russia by Asiatic ports.

In the trade with North America imports of the war period show an increase of 95 per cent., and exports 73 per cent. From South America imports show an increase of 114 per cent., and exports 72 per cent. In the trade with Asia imports show an increase of 117 per cent. and exports 121 per cent., exclusive of that sent to Asiatic ports for transfer to Russia. From Africa imports show an increase of 142 per cent. and exports 75 per cent. From Oceania imports show an increase of 152 per cent. and exports 43 per cent.

What Has This $150,000 Cow To Do With LIQUID VENEER

READ THE WONDERFUL STORY—a story which tells how Liquid Veneer made it possible for the President of the Liquid Veneer concern to acquire the greatest herd of pure-bred Holsteins in the world, including this $150,000 Liquid Veneer Cow, champion of the world over all ages and breeds.

This story tells how Liquid Veneer revolutionized dusting methods, how it became so dear to the hearts of millions of housewives and why it is

To illustrate the greatness of this Liquid Veneer cow, remember, that she has produced as high as 7 3/4 lbs. of butter and 52 quarts of milk in a single day, more than 10 times the production of the average cow.

To prove the value of Liquid Veneer, use it the next time you dust, and you will be delightfully surprised at the ease with which it cleans, renews and brightens. You get the same high quality at the same old prices, 25c, 50c and $1.00 a bottle.

To obtain the story, write us, telling us what you think is the most striking feature of this ad. That's all. The story will be sent free!

Your Coal Problem

A Common Sense Solution

IT'S a common sense solution, because it solves it in a common sense way.

It simply takes greater advantage of nature's laws, in a way that squeezes more heat from the same coal. Or burns less coal for the same heat. Which fact is true, whether you compare the Kelsey with steam, hot water or furnace heats.

Why it saves, and what it saves we will gladly tell you.

The Texas Ranger's Testament

By THOMAS H. ALVORD

A "Y" SECRETARY was doing his "trick on the desk" in one of the huts in camp. The rush of the evening had slackened. But over at the end of the desk was one man looking lonesomely through the cards in the rack.

"Good evening," ventured the secretary.

"Good evening, sir," replied Adams. "Well, what's the good word to-night?"

"Oh, everything's the same as usual." "Anything going on across the road today?"

"No, nothing special."

"About time for some of you fellows to be transferred, isn't it?"

"I wish to goodness they'd move me on, or send me home, or ship me away from this bunch."

"Want to move, hey? What's the matter? Sick of the army already?"

"Guess the army's all right, but I don't fit with the fellows at the barracks. I've seen lots of rough life, too, believe me."

"Where is your home?"

"Well, I was born out in Arizona, but the last two or three years I've been down with the Texas Rangers. Know about them, don't you?"

"Yes; but how did you ever happen to land in this camp 'way up here in the North?"

And then this tall, brawny, muscular fellow from the Rio Grande told how he had been sent to Philadelphia with a shipment of horses, had squandered all his money in the city, and had been obliged to get a job there and earn enough to carry him back home.

THIS particular evening he had come over to the Y. M. C. A. hut and stood glancing at the post-cards in the rack when the secretary greeted him with the cheery "good-evening." Whether it was the smile, the tone of the voice, the atmosphere of the place, or something else, he graciously returned the greeting and began to talk. Many a disheartened or disgruntled soldier has been cheered up through a little informal chat with the man "on the desk"; his ideas have been changed, and he has been led to look at situations through a different-colored glass. This man who sells stamps and deals out stationery does something else. He "gets next" to many of those soldiers who come along to buy postage or to stop and chat a few minutes. Issues of life and death are discussed there.

"Are you in a hurry?" the secretary asked Adams.

"Not especially," was the reply.

"Come into my room for a few minutes."

He did so gladly, and then it was that he related some of his experiences out West. At twenty-three he had joined the Rangers, stayed with them two years, and then returned to the ranch life for the few months before he was sent to Philadelphia with the horses. He related incidents which he had witnessed in Mexico, horrible enough to have been perpetrated by the Germans. Then slowly he reached his hand into his shirt pocket and pulled out a little black Testament. "You gave me one, Sunday," he said. "That one I carry in my overcoat. This one I keep in my shirt, and I wouldn't take all the money in the world for it. A Y. M. C. A. man down on the Mexican desert gave it to me. I was on my way back from Eagle Pass after a thirty-day scouting trip, tired and dirty and hungry and thirsty and full of sand-fleas. This man overtook me and said he was going my way. He gave my pony a good meal, and handed me something that beat the salt pork and hard tack I'd been putting down for the last thirty days. Then while we were talking he pulled up his sleeve and on his arm was tattooed 'Y. M. C. A.' with the triangle. We talked for an hour or so, and meantime he sized me up pretty well, I guess—I sure was a tough one and no question—for he says, 'Did you ever stop to think about God?' Of course I had to tell him 'No.' We don't beat around the bush down there. It's the truth or a lie point blank. And then he reached into his saddle-bag and brought out that little black-covered book. He read to me out of it, explained the verses, and told me about Jesus. I guess he must have talked to me about the Bible for half an hour; then he sketched a picture of Jesus in the back of the Testament, handed it to me and told me to read and think about what he had said. And just before he left he passed me over twenty dollars."

"He certainly gave you a good lift."

"Yes, sir; that man was white! But I was telling you about the Testament. I suppose I carried that book around in my pocket for a week or two without even looking at it. But later on I used to read a few verses now and then, though I didn't understand very well what they meant. Do you know, that was the first time I ever read the Bible? Well, some weeks afterwards, my comrade and I were sent on a scouting expedition again."

AND then he launched into the thrilling story of capture by Mexican bandits, the agonizing death his partner suffered, and the violent efforts he himself made to escape before his turn should come. "But all of a sudden," he said, "I remembered that Y. M. C. A. man and his Bible, and I knew enough to say 'God help me!' And whether you believe it or not—I do—he did help me, and I got away. I had to move some myself; but here I am. And let me tell you that I've read that little Bible ever since, and thinking about it has done me a lot of good."

It was almost time for call to quarters, and the ranger had to go to his barrack. But the next evening he came over again to the building. He had found not only an interested listener, but the friendly atmosphere he craved. And he told more stories of the life on the border, talked more freely of the trials in the barrack here in camp, and although he said he longed to be transferred to another unit, he was afraid, too, that he was to be discharged because of a physical defect caused by over-exertion when he was with the Rangers.

And then the conversation drifted back again to the Y. M. C. A. man on the border and the little Testament. Gradually it came nearer to the vital issues in the life of this young fellow, reared where the Christian religion was counted as of small moment, tossed around from place to place, and living always in an environment where right and wrong were settled by the gun, and where there was little time or opportunity or inclination for a man's soul to develop. And yet right in that very environment he had been met by a Y. M. C. A. man, who made a practical application of the Christian religion and set the leaves to work; and then, by a strange chance—or a Providence, perhaps—he had journeyed way from the southwest to a northern camp and there had fallen in with another Y. M. C. A. man, who picked up the work of the first and carried it on a little further. For, just before taps that night in a small room of the Y. M. C. A. hut, this man Adams gave himself without reserve to a Christian life.

And the next morning he left camp—transferred by sudden order from Headquarters—gone without time to say good-by.

Young People's Topics for October 20

What Is Christian Citizenship?

Topic. Isa. 62:1-7

THE Christian owes allegiance to the state and to the Saviour who has redeemed him. As a citizen of the kingdom of heaven it is every Christian's duty to proclaim the Gospel of salvation, the good news, by word and by life. The good of the state must be the first thought of every loyal citizen. The Christian citizen's duty is thus, but intensified. Except where a great moral question is involved, it is not the duty of the Church to mix in politics, and where it does it usually lowers its standards without greatly alleviating political conditions. It is the duty of a church man to be in politics to the very limit of his opportunities. It is his duty to support the movements which aim at righteousness; to oppose men who he has reason to believe are unworthy aspirants for public office; to support with all the power of his influence and action men who he is convinced are worthy of the public trust. It is his duty to read as much as he can about the various aspirants for public office and know their records as well as he may; to vote at the primaries according to his conscience, rather than according to the suggestions of any political organization to which he may belong, and to vote at the election for the best man proposed for each office regardless of party lines. It is well enough to belong to a party, but the servile voting of the party ticket is not for Christian men. The man who fails to vote at the primary has failed in a part of his first duty to the state, for the primary, since it places before the electors the men who will receive their suffrage, is many times more important than the election which follows. It frequently happens that the failure of good men to attend the primaries results in there being no worthy candidates for public office upon the resultant ticket, and political rings find their opportunity for personal profit in public office largely through the failure of honest and independent citizens to exercise their privilege and perform their duty in the primaries. But when the election has passed the Christian citizen is not through with his civic duties. He only serves Christ and the State when he is at all times and in all places active as a proponent of right and an opponent of wrong.

Epworth League Topic. Ezek. 47:1-9

THIS lesson is based on chapter 2 of the Home Mission Study Book, "Christian Democracy for Americans."

The book may be obtained from any book concern of the Methodist Church. Special helps for leaders may be obtained by addressing the central office of the Epworth League, 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill. The rural church has suffered a decadence through waning interest. It is now coming back as a strong factor in community life because its eyes have been opened. The country church today is, even more than the city church, a center of community life and helpfulness. It is more than a preaching station, although it is that more than ever; for the Word is with power when people attend and they come to the church from which flow streams of practical helpfulness. Its activities make not only better lives but better farming, better stock raising better home making and better comradeship. A number of the recently published Adventures in Neighboring have been concerned with the wide activities of the rural church. Its opportunities are almost legion; its demands upon the man who serves it are diverse and multiplied, but altogether men are finding it a job worth while and young men and women are finding through the reborn rural church that the life on the farm can have fully a much meaning as that life in a crowded city which once lured them from the open country.

ART-CARPETS

Congoleum Art-Carpets have all the artistic, practical, and sanitary qualities that have made the Congoleum line famous.

They have the appearance of fine carpets without the latter's unsanitary, dust-collecting texture. A damp mop keeps the surface clean and cheerful.

They are made in patterns of de luxe beauty in twelve different colors. These patterns are an exclusive feature of Congoleum Art-Carpets, something never before attempted in printed floor-coverings of any kind. The result is unusually attractive designs in Oriental, Chinese-matting, and conventional effects, suitable for any room in the house where a low-priced floor-covering is desired.

Further, the fact that these Art-Carpets are three yards wide (108 inches) makes possible fewer seams — in some rooms no seams at all. Like all other Congoleum Floor-Coverings, the Art-Carpets may be laid without fastening of any kind. Congoleum Art-Carpets come in rolls and retail at $1.25 per square yard.

Congoleum Art-Carpets and Floor-Coverings take the place of more expensive woolen carpets and rugs, saving you money which you can devote to Liberty Bonds, W. S. S., or other patriotic purposes, and also helping you to "Do Your Bit" in saving WOOL which is so urgently needed to keep our soldiers and sailors warm this winter.

The Gold Seal Is Your Protection

Look for the Gold Seal, as illustrated below, which appears every two yards on the face of the goods. Remember the name. If you don't see the Gold Seal, insist that the salesman show you the name "Congoleum" stamped on the back.

Weed Chains of Solid Gold

—would not be worth as much as the Weed Chains of Steel you use on the tires of your passenger car and truck.

Steel is worth more than gold now, for in these days we measure the real value of a metal by the work it does.

Conserve your Weed Chains as you must conserve gasoline.

Use your passenger cars in bad weather only when it is necessary.

Weed Chains must be saved for trucks and essential passenger cars, which should be kept going rain or shine.

When you must use your car put on your chains at the first drop of rain, and take them off the moment the road is safely dry.

Waste through reckless, unnecessary use is now a crime.

If you don't help save Weed Chains, as you are helping to save gasoline, there will be a national shortage.

This means not only a tremendous loss, through injury to cars and trucks, but the checking and curtailing of essential industries to which these cars and trucks are essential.

Cars and trucks must have chains on slippery pavements and muddy or snowy roads.

A nation-wide shortage in Weed Chains means the use of makeshifts—a harmless rope, or ruinous non-creeping chains that give a certain amount of traction, but cut the tires to pieces.

"THE Great German Retreat

THE German army is preparing to evacuate Belgium and return to our own frontier. Germany will show the world that she really wants nothing in the war except to defend the fatherland! Such was in substance the startling statement made by General von Falkenhausen, military governor of Belgium, on October 1. The great retreat had, in fact, already begun, and had been going on, it was explained, as a "pre-determined strategical movement." Now, however, it assumed a new character. The surrender of Bulgaria to the Allies, and the knowledge that Turkey had already taken steps for similar action, together with the overwhelming reverses along the western front and in the Near East, have awakened a fear akin to panic in Germany—panic that may easily lead to open revolt.

It was no surprise, therefore, to learn on October 2 that the military governor of Belgium had taken time by the forelock and removed all the archives from Brussels, and that the German armies were in the first stages of the general retreat.

While these developments were not unexpected, it was not believed that they would come so quickly. They inspired the Allies with greater energy and determination to push forward on the western fronts.

The Belgian, British, French and American forces began to sweep the enemy back all along the 250-mile front. Cambrai was on fire but strongly held by the Germans. There was fierce fighting around St. Quentin, the Australians bearing the brunt of it. In the Champagne, the Americans and French, after a desperate struggle, swept forward. In the Argonne Forest the American troops beat down the German opposition. As they approached the Kriemhilde line,—the last hope of German defense—they encountered a maze of barbed-wire entanglements, and heavy fighting became heavier as the Germans resisted desperately.

On all the fronts it was the same story of desperate resistance, finally yielding to the irrepressible determination of the Allies. Some of the hottest fighting of the war took place in those first days of October, with huge forces engaged on both sides. Between Cambrai and St. Quentin it is estimated that 36 German divisions, aggregating 420,000 men, met defeat and lost thousands of prisoners.

Simultaneously with the news of the beginning of Belgium's evacuation came intelligence of the fall of Damascus and the capture by General Allenby's troops of 7,000 Turks. The road is now open for the British to sweep northward and westward, and to cut off the last remnants of Turkish power in the Near East.

On October 3 came the news that Lille was being evacuated, and that an immense amount of booty had been taken away by the Germans in their flight. Its occupation by the Allies was imminent. Lille was the most important German base in Flanders.

All over Belgium, Allied airmen dropped pamphlets urging the people to have a little more patience and assuring them that their hour of complete liberation was approaching.

It was also learned that Germany had lately deported the population of some twenty towns and villages in Alsace, in expectation of the battlefront changing to the frontier. It is now evident from many unmistakable signs, that Germany knows the final defeat of the Kaiser's armies is approaching. What may befall the retreating troops on their way to the Rhine can only be surmised. There are possibilities of encirclements which may endanger the divided commands on their long retreat and result in large captures, if Foch should succeed in maintaining his present strong offensive, which is altogether likely. A crisis is near, but, as President Wilson has wisely urged, we must not be ruled by overconfidence. Hard work is ahead and plenty of it, but the indications all point to the ultimate triumph of the Allies.

AS we went to press last week the air was vibrant with impending events along all of the many active fronts of war. On October 2d it was evident that the great Hindenburg line was cracking, and that the huge German war machine was preparing for another backward "strategic" step. As has been the case before previous retreats, the Germans fought desperately to prevent further advances by the Allied troops. About Cambrai a battle raged which many soldiers declared the greatest in the history of the world. Fresh German reserves were thrown in with reckless prodigality, yet the result of two days' fighting saw Cambrai nearly surrounded. Heights of great strategic importance were firmly held by English divisions who took Crevecoeur and Rumilly,

Quentin, on Oct. 2, British and American troops broke completely through the Hindenburg line over a wide front, south of Le Catelet, but were met by an immediate counterattack in great force by the Germans which pushed them back slightly, preventing a complete break through. One American division was here surrounded for nearly a day. When relieved by Australian troops its position was banked by dead Germans.

In spite of this desperate fighting, however, the whole German line to the sea was in retreat.

On Oct. 2 Belgian and British troops had cut the Roulers-Menin railway east of Ypres and had pressed far beyond Dixmude, in the north. Progress was being made in the direction of Thourout and the Allies had only a short distance to go to flank the Germans out of Ostend, and to make their position at Bruges extremely uncomfortable. From the sea-coast, where British monitors were assisting the advance, to east of St. Quentin, the German line was being withdrawn, the retreat being especially rapid in the salient around Lille. Between St. Quentin and Rheims, along the front south of the Aisne and north of the Vesle, the Germans were also retiring, having given up the heights of St. Thierry, northwest of Rheims, on which they had fought the irresistible pressure of the French for many days. Following up this retreat the French took more than 2000 prisoners. East of Rheims, in the Champagne and eastward to the Meuse, the Germans were again withdrawing, apparently attempting to take refuge from Gen. Gouraud's army and the American first army in their Kriemhilde positions. American and French patrols were closely engaging the German rearguards. On Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 the Germans counterattacked against the Americans in the Argonne Forest and the valley of the Aire, east of the Forest. Although the line swayed more or less, the final result of the two days' counterattacks was further loss of ground by the enemy. Oct. 2 saw no counterattacks and a withdrawal toward the new positions.

The French, on Oct. 1, completed the capture of St. Quentin, and progressed measurably beyond the city. The Germans left the city on fire, and did their best to destroy it, sending ahead of their troops every civilian remaining in the city.

Jerusalem Returns to Normal Living

A MEMBER of the American Colony in Jerusalem, in a recent letter, gives some highly interesting facts in connection with the wonderful relief work conducted by the colony almost since the beginning of the war. That work was made possible through the sympathetic co-operation of the readers of the Christian Herald, many of whom sent their contributions for that purpose. The letter says:

"Seventeen of us have been very busy in the relief work, which we undertook without sparing ourselves, so that the poor might the sooner be helped, until the helpers whom the Syrian and Palestine Relief Committee were expecting should come. Now that these are arriving, we are gradually withdrawing, for some of the sisters must have the needed rest, as they are threatened with a breakdown. We had been worn out in the hospital work the last few months, with harrowing sights, night vigils, and wasted energy caused by the uncertainty of the arrival of the trains. We might be notified that 150 wounded were coming and everything would be needed for their comfort; we would sit up expecting them for from two to ten hours. We could not risk going to sleep. Above all was the constant erosion of strength and vitality caused by the uncertainty and tension, never knowing what was to happen next.

"Yet, thank God, out of all our afflictions God has delivered us and brought us into a large place! The tide has turned and all that annoyed and threatened us during the past four years is reversed. We are not in famine, the pestilence is checked, our lives are in safety, and instead of the controlling power seeking our harm and suffering, everything is done to care for, feed, clothe and employ by the thousands those who have been rescued, who, alas! only too soon, like the Israelites of old, have forgotten the taskmasters, and fail to show their gratitude for the release. Jerusalem has already an abundance of living water, brought in from Arroub, the dream of prophets and seers, the theme of the sages.

"It is an absolute fact that it would have been possible on the 9th of December, 1917, to have gathered all the foodstuffs to be found in the markets of Jerusalem into two good-sized rooms. The population had been reduced by typhus and starvation, drained by the military calls, and transportation had disappeared because of all horses, camels, and donkeys having been requisitioned, nominally purchased and sacrificed in the desert adventure. Nothing could be brought into the city except on old men's backs or on women's heads, and even these were driven farther and farther from the city through the paper money depreciation. The peasants were driven first to the outskirts of the town where they could more easily exact the kind of money and price they chose to put upon their merchandise, without fear of the oppressive measures of the police. The inhabitants were forced to walk out for distances varying all the way from half a mile to five miles and to carry the cash so as to secure the indispensable vegetables, fruits, fuel.

The contrast between this picture and present conditions is indescribable. The markets are overburdened with vegetables and fruit; donkeys have begun to reappear by the score; camels seem to filter in by fives and tens; every day sees some new carriage make its debut at the Jaffa Gate, where not one was seen for months; young men who had been in hiding for months—some of them for one, two, and three years—suddenly appear as if risen from the dead.

their fathers ever enjoyed. One illustration will amply demonstrate this: The military authorities, out of solicitude for the farmers, announced that on a certain day there would be a sale of captured enemy animals, so that farm work might not be delayed. That day realized thousands of pounds for the authorities, for the people seemed at once to bid over one another, so that these puny mules and horses reached unheard of prices apiece—one single purchaser paying over 750 pounds. "When to the above we add that we are using half as much wheat this month as we did last year at this time, you will be able to see what quantities of foodstuffs there are which so reduce the bread consumption. Instead of living on conscription and requisition, as for three and one-half years we had been driven to, we are now under a government whose sole aim is to provide for the population and mitigate their hard lot. Never was the state of public health better. Since the time of the Romans never have there been so many roads in all directions, and at no time in history have they been kept in such repair.

"A PART from the care shown by the new authorities for the health, comfort and life of the people, their solicitude for the reconstruction of their lives, fortunes and future is beyond all praise and gratitude. Experts of all kinds are here studying how to devise means for sanitation, how to improve the streets and the city, what the needs of the future are, what technical and industrial schools are necessary for the development of the population, and for enabling them to shake off the curse and incubus of ages.

"You will be interested to learn that this year we commenced the Fourth of July celebration, which since had been discontinued. When the Red Cross party arrived, we informed them that we should have a reception on the national anniversary and asked them all to come, so that they might make the acquaintance of the people; they arranged to have their opening the same day, to which they invited the commander and the governor and staff, and their invitation as well as ours was accepted. Hence there was nothing to do but to co-ordinate our plans and have the guests come to our entertainment when theirs was over. There proved to be ample time and we had a most unconventional and hearty gathering. "Some of our people are helping the Red Cross commission and investigators, and we are gradually working back into a normal state of living."

WHEN the victorious British troops solemnly passed by on the 9th of December, the inhabitants were as eager to find employment as they were hungering for food. Tens of thousands of old men and young, Mohammedan and every other kind, of women and children, have found ready and lucrative employment, so that never have there been so few beggars seen in Jerusalem as today.

"These various transformations have so altered conditions that over eighty per cent. of the population find themselves in better circumstances than they or might make the acquaintance of the people; they arranged to have their opening the same day, to which they invited the commander and the governor and staff, and their invitation as well as ours was accepted. Hence there was nothing to do but to co-ordinate our plans and have the guests come to our entertainment when theirs was over. There proved to be ample time and we had a most unconventional and hearty gathering. The Great German Retreat

In Palestine, General Allenby's troops, on Oct. 1, having practically surrounded Damascus, received the surrender of the city with its garrison of 7000 Turks. The Arab army of King Hussein participated in the occupation of Damascus. Following the capture of this ancient and prosperous city—160 miles from Jerusalem, and 90 miles from the scene of the first attack—on Sept. 14, the British and French cavalry pressed on toward Aleppo, 180 miles further north. French cavalry was reported, on Oct. 3, to be approaching Beirut.

In Macedonia, on Oct. 3, the Bulgarian troops were withdrawing to their own country and the Serbians were taking over the territory. Greek troops were also occupying Greek Macedonia, entering Seres on Oct. 4. There was as yet no evidence of any reorganization of the main battleline by Germany and Austria.

ON Oct. 3 General Gouraud forced his way to Challerange, on the western side of the Grandpré Gap, thus cutting the German line of retreat from the Argonne Forest and bringing the western end of their Kriemhilde line under French gunfire.

General Berthelot forced back the retreating enemy north and northwest of Rheims, crossing the Aisne Canal and taking 2800 prisoners. On the north, between St. Quentin and La Fère, General Debeney pressed eastward, approaching the line of retreat of the Germans about Laon. North of St. Quentin and south of Le Catelet, along the front of over 8 miles, where the British had nearly broken through on Oct. 2, General Haig launched a new attack with hundreds of tanks. The German line was penetrated to a depth of more than 5 miles, 5000 prisoners were taken and the positions south of Cambrai, on the heights east of the Scheldt Canal, were outflanked. Later reports indicated that the line had been broken and that cavalry was in action far to the east. North of Arras, the Germans continued their retreat along a 22-mile front. Lens and Armentières were occupied by British forces, which pressed forward for 2 to 3 miles beyond them. The Germans were apparently falling back on the line of Menin, Lille and Douai, although there was no evidence that they intended to stop at this line. They were desperately withdrawing stores, loot and civilians from Lille. The Belgians and British meanwhile pressed on in Belgium, approaching nearer to Courtrai, Roulers and Thourout.

In the Macedonian field the Austrian forces, on Oct. 3, began a wide retreat out of Albania, being followed closely by the Italians, who took many prisoners. The Allied naval forces assisted the forces on shore by attacking the Austrian naval base at Durazzo, completely wiping out the Austrian fleet assembled there. American submarine chasers, protecting the Allied cruiser squadron, sank two Austrian submarines.

Australian mounted troops, operating northwest of Damascus on Oct. 2, captured another column of Turkish troops, securing 1500 prisoners and 2 guns. It was reported that the Turks were withdrawing their forces from Persia, and that the British were about to reoccupy the great oil port of Baku.

Turkey is reported to have notified Germany of her intention to propose peace to the Allies. The German reply is said to have been part menace and part plea for patience but with no promise of help.

From Sept. 10 to 30 the allied armies in Belgium and France captured 2844 officers, 120,192 men, 1600 cannon, and 6000 machine guns.

The American troops facing the German Kriemhilde line at Brioules, and east and west of this point, drove forward on Oct. 4 for a distance of over a mile and a half, penetrating the Kriemhilde line and shattering two divisions of the Prussian Guard. At the same time American troops, fighting with the army of General Gouraud in a new drive northward

God's Oath the Ground of Confidence

TEXT—Ps. 20:7. "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses; but we will remember the name of the Lord our God."

THESE words are from a stirring national anthem used at Israel's liberty sings. It was a war-time song, designed to sustain public morale and establish confidence. It was sung antiphonally, the vast congregation uniting in one stanza and the priests responding with another. The anthem never failed to impart to the Hebrews that religious fervor and determination so essential to the success of any enterprise undertaken by idealists against strongly entrenched wrong.

"Some trust in chariots." The war chariot of King David's day was a formidable engine of destruction. It was armed with long sharp scythes extending far out from the wheels. Before these chariots, driven furiously into the ranks of foot soldiery, men were as helpless as standing grain before the reaper.

"Some trust in horses." Cavalry has ever been a valued arm of the service. Not being permitted to keep horses, Israel was at great disadvantage whenever she attempted to throw back the military nations continually invading her borders and her liberties.

"But we will remember the name of the Lord our God." This is clearly an allusion to the eventful moment when God staked his good Name on the inviolability of his promise to Abraham.

Throughout the intervening centuries, that oath has never been out of mind. It is the bedrock upon which rests the whole superstructure of Hebrew political and religious faith. It is the one shining memory running like a golden thread through their literature and songs. The thought of God's oath imparted intrepidity in the hour of conflict, sustained their hearts during periods of national eclipse and the weary years of captivity. Happy the people that has such a sure foundation for national confidence!

IT is important that we should be reminded at this time of our own interest in this ancient covenant, since it is the best possible ground for confidence in the gigantic task America has undertaken. Many there be who stand aghast that our time-honored Monroe Doctrine has broken down. But it could not have been otherwise. The covenant made with Abraham, renewed with Jacob and passed on to Joseph was inherited by Ephraim and Manasseh, through whose descendants it was to be redeemed.

Now, we are told by some of the most painstaking students of prophecy that Britishers and Americans are the lineal descendants of those two honored sons of Joseph. This opinion is regarded by many as supported by excellent authority. Nor is this a phase of war-time psychology—an example of the type of mind that reads prophecy in the light of current events, rather than events in the light of prophecy. It has been claimed that the Bible gives nineteen or more distinct and definite marks of identification by which the descendants of Ephraim and Manasseh might be recognized, all of which appear in the history and characteristics of the two great Allied nations, and in none other.

Assuming this to be true, we need seek no further for a satisfying explanation for our being drawn into the whirlpool of a world cataclysm. America was predestined to a place beside Britain before a German spy was apprehended, before a proud ship was torpedoed. It was writ in the stars that these nations should forget the past, compose their differences and unite in one supreme effort to liberate mankind and restore to the Jews the country for which they hold God's deed of conveyance.

AN inspiring interpretation of the signs of the time, is it not? Could surer ground be found for confidence in our cause and ultimate victory? In the presence of such a privilege as this, to be the channel through which countless blessings will come to mankind, is any inconvenience too annoying, any task too heavy, any sacrifice too great? Who would not gladly take up his crosses if the end of the Calvary Cross may thereby in some measure be attained?

Even though this interpretation of prophecy should prove merely an intellectual mirage, the indubitable fact remains that God is counting upon every one of us, Christian and Jew alike, to help him redeem his oath. God is waiting to be gracious, and humanity is waiting to enter the promised land. I repeat, God is counting upon us. If we be faithful, improving our opportunity, we shall hear of many such scenes as those enacted during the recent Château Thierry drive, scenes so affecting as to bring unashamed tears to the eyes of grizzled warriors as French women and children from bended knee kissed the hands of Secretary Baker and others in grateful acknowledgment of the blessed deliverance America has brought them.

Again, God's oath is the best possible ground for our confidence in the coming era of reconstruction. The future of the world is secure, yea, bright with promise; not that man is sufficient for this hour of destiny, but because God has said, "I will do this thing for my name's sake." The world has been disillusioned by the war. We had come to think ourselves above believing in the fall of Adam, and the possibility of a twentieth-century fall never occurred to us. The ascent of man had continued so satisfactorily and with so little hitch, that almost any achievement seemed possible through purely natural processes. God was in banishment. We no longer reckoned on him in our calculations. There appeared to be no further need for the supernatural in a world of supermen. And then, in a trice, the tower of Babel fell, and with it everything we held dear—ideals, dreams, faith!

YOU and I must look the facts squarely in the face and ask: Why this costly failure? Manifestly and primarily, because we left God out of the program. Because humanism had become our religion. Our eyes were blinded to revelation. Taking no stock in God's plans, we set about building a kingdom wherein dwelleth righteousness upon statutes, and by political authority, governmental control, revolution and evolution.

But the nightmare is passing. At last we are awake, although it is yet the dark of the morning. The world is groping about at this moment for a secure foundation; something permanent, authoritative, fixed, upon which to reconstruct humanity's visions and dreams. And, if I mistake not, we are finding it in a new sense of God, not an intellectual sense but a reverent sense. God was an idea in the head, but he is now a personal Presence—"the Invisible King."

Those of you who keep pace with the noble souls who walk the pages of current literature must often have noted the large place given to this subject. The quest for the seat of ultimate authority is on in real earnest. Is it the Bible? Is the Book inspired in a different manner than other books? Is it the only book to which God has literally entrusted his mind and heart? Is it the Church? Is the Church a divine institution? Does her mission differ essentially from that of other institutions? Is it the State? Are the walls of the Kingdom to rest upon the shoulders of a socio-political Atlas? Is it to be the individual? Will the future stand secure upon the philosophy, "I must live my own life and be true to myself"? In a word, is certainty to rest upon freedom, or freedom upon certainty?

UNMISTAKABLE signs of approaching disillusionment appeared even before the war. Quite generally, there was uneasiness concerning the security of the social edifice. The multiplication of so-called "foundations" was one of many symptoms of this fear of the gathering storm. The Rockefeller Foundation for Medical Research, the Sage Foundation for Social Betterment, the Carnegie Foundation for World Peace, embodied a very earnest desire to secure the services of the ablest minds in an unremitting search for something with which to shore up a cracking age.

This was all well and good, and I would be the last to disparage any of these efforts to ameliorate the world's sufferings. But permit me to say very earnestly that such endeavors are no more than "horses" and "chariots," unless we get down to bedrock for a footing. We think ours a wonderful civilization, and it is, in a way, notwithstanding the shadows that rest upon its soul. But there have been civilizations almost if not quite as splendid as our own. And they are gone—indeed, so dead that not a tombstone remains to mark the grave.

THERE was Babylon, for example. Thanks to recent finds, Babylonia is almost as well known to us as the Athens of Pericles. We may now trace the daily life of the people and know their innermost thoughts. We possess their Social Register, Blue Book, Who's Who and innumerable personal letters, many of them highly illuminating. From these we gather that the much-vaunted Victorian era was nothing new; they had it in Babylon and it was already immensely old. The heyday of Babylonian culture lay two thousand years behind the skyscraper walls of Belshazzar's day. This was a really wonderful civilization, with all the modern attributes, including righteousness, justice and a league of nations. It had even penetrated China with a sphere of influence. Hammurabi, that pioneer lawgiver, having learned through messengers, dispatched throughout the world, the best and most humane practices of all the nations, codified and proclaimed them the law of the empire. Upon these laws were built the best thought and hope of humanity into an edifice so beautiful and satisfying that we do not wonder at Nebuchadnezzar's proud boast, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built?" There had been, however, one fatal oversight—the foundation. Their edifice of righteousness and justice was built upon expediency and precedents, without heavenly authority. It was the house on the sand of our Saviour's parable.

At this very juncture of history, God called Abraham to be a master builder and supplied him with the much needed heavenly authority. He chose him, not because he was so much better than others, but because he could be entrusted with an undertaking requiring endurance and patience. "I know Abraham, that he will command his children after him." God's oath, the home, fidelity, loyalty to a vision, such are the pillars of Abraham's "city that hath foundation," and "the Kingdom" of Christian dreams.

IN conclusion, may I ask a very personal question? Can God count upon us in this "age on ages telling"? Do we wish a share in the privilege and opportunity of the hour? If we are so minded there must be the most earnest heart-searching. First, we must seek the quickening of our own religious life. Second, we must get together. Each denomination must bury the hatchet. Discord must give place to concord. We must merge our endeavors under the leadership of the living Christ, that he may be to the allied forces of religion what General Foch is to the Allies. We must purge our lips of uncharitable words with the pure and single passion of apostolic days. Third, we must gain a broader world horizon. Possibly before the war we did not believe in missions. We must repent and take the spent and broken world to our breast, with a transfiguring "Whosoever will."

Great Author and Finisher of the faith, grant that through the message many may be brought into harmony with the exalted spirit of this Psalm, the soul passion of a great people and the maturing plans of a loving God. Amen.

AUTUMN

By

LILLIAN BENNET-THOMPSON

DARK massed against the far horizon's cloudy rim,
Burnt browns and greens and yellows, vaguely crowned with dim
Low-hanging mist, the mighty purple hills lift up
Their summits to the sky. And in their hollow cup
The lake lies, brooding, silent. Through the towering pines
The wistful wind, chill-winged, moans fitfully. It whines
Among the flame-licked maples, whirls the leaves on high
For one brief moment. Then they swiftly fall and lie
Like weary little boats; upon the water's breast
They dream of other days. The slim-stemmed rushes rest
Their drooping heads among the heavy, tangled sedge;
The lily pads are withered. All along the edge
Of moss-banked pools, the rocks loom, grim and bleak and bare;
The tang of burning wood is in the frosty air. . . .

Autumn has stooped to kiss the warm, reluctant lips
Of Summer. And now all the golden gladness slips
Away from earth and rests within the sunset glow,
There to be winter-prisoned, like a shining bow
Of promise that the singing spring shall come again
With sweet pale blossoms, sunshine, birds, and gentle rain.

Austria and Germany Seek Peace

WITH the Bohemians practically ready to declare their independence, with the defection of Bulgaria threatening her rear and a great Italian army before her along the Piave ready to attack, Austria-Hungary is in desperate need of peace. On October 4 dispatches from Amsterdam declared that Austria-Hungary had requested Holland to invite the belligerents to take part in peace negotiations. The Hungarian premier was quoted as declaring in Vienna: "We are again laboring untiringly in the interests of peace, and we are already negotiating."

The report of a move by Austria through Holland was probably premature. But on October 5 Austria did initiate another move for peace, approaching the enemy governments through the Swedish Government. Austria, in her note, all but surrendered, the note reading as follows:

"The Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, which has made only defensive warfare and has borne witness several times to its desire to put an end to the bloodshed and conclude an honorable peace, proposes by presentation to President Wilson to conclude immediately with him and his Allies a general armistice on land, on sea, and in the air, and start without delay negotiations for peace."

These negotiations will be based on the fourteen points in President Wilson's message of January 8 and the four points of his speech of February 12 (February, 11, 1918), and those equally of September 27, 1918."

This note from Austria was followed, on October 6, by a note from Germany addressed to President Wilson through the Swiss Government, as follows:

"The German Government requests the President of the United States to take in hand the restoration of peace, acquaint all the belligerent states of this request, and invite them to send plenipotentiaries for the purpose of opening negotiations."

It accepts the program set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress on January 8 and in his later pronouncements, especially his speech of September 27, as a basis for peace negotiations."

With a view to avoiding further bloodshed, the German Government requests the immediate conclusion of an armistice on land and water and in the air."

It was expected that Turkey would send a similar note.

On the same day the Kaiser sent a message to his army and navy in which he commended the army for its defense against "a numerically far superior enemy" and for "heroically defending the fatherland on foreign soil," and praised the navy for "holding its own against the united enemy." He mentioned the collapse of the Macedonian front and declared that "we owe it to the heroes who have laid down their lives for the fatherland, and we make it a duty to our children," to make an honorable peace.

Nor was this all. Addressing a specially called meeting of the German Reichstag on October 6 the new Chancellor, Maximilian of Baden, declared himself unable to carry the load of responsibility inherent in his office except he was sure of the support of the people. He called attention to the inclusion in his ministry of members of the various Reichstag parties and expressed his conviction that it was the beginning of responsible government in Germany. He also expressly affirmed his allegiance to the Reichstag resolution of July 19, 1916, declaring for "no annexations or indemnities," affirmed his conviction that Belgium should be completely rehabilitated, "particularly of its independence and territorial integrity," and declared that in the Baltic provinces, Lithuania and Poland "popular representative bodies shall be formed without delay," and that "all these lands shall regulate their constitutions and their relations with neighboring peoples without external interference."

Prince Max announced to the Reichstag the fact of the sending of the note to President Wilson, which he said had for Germany), and ready, as was Bulgaria, to accept defeat and to surrender. It was generally recognized that an armistice just now would be of inestimable military advantage to Germany.

RECONSTRUCTION AFTER THE WAR. Senator Overman on October 3 introduced into the Senate a bill authorizing the President to appoint a Federal Commission on Reconstruction to handle social, economic and industrial projects after the war. The Senate had already before it a resolution by work and ran, and while they were seeking to get away buildings blew up on all sides. The explosions continued during the night and well into the following day, and a magazine of 80,000 pounds of T. N. T. being endangered the whole metropolitan district was held in terror, the bridges over the East river and the subways being closed until an airplane observer flying over the scene reported the danger ended. The money value of the plant was some $18,000,000, but its strategic value, was almost unlimited. Ninety-four persons including 12 government inspectors were killed and several hundred were wounded.

GUARD CUTTER TORPEDOED. The coast guard cutter Tampa, in convoy service between Britain and Gibraltar was torpedoed on September 26 in the Bristol Channel. She had gone ahead of her convoy and no details of the disaster were obtainable. Ten officers, 102 enlisted men and British army officers and five civilian employees were lost.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Eighteen sailors lost their lives in the capsizing of a small boat from the cruiser Salen while returning from Key West to the ship on the night of September 29. . . . The Shipping Board has asked for an additional appropriation of $484,000,000 for the construction of 454 vessels in addition to the present program; 216 will be of steel, 240 of wood. . . . been sent with "the consent of all duly authorized persons in the empire and by consent of all our allies," and he expressed the hope that "for the sake of all mankind, the President of the United States will receive our offer as we mean it. Then the door would be opened to a speedy, honorable peace of justice and reconciliation for us, as well as for our opponents."

On October 7 both notes in their official form had been delivered at the White House, but no official hint of probable action had been given. The press of the country and those statesmen who were willing to be quoted, were a unit in considering it only a new step in the endeavor to achieve by diplomatic indirection the victory denied by force of arms. The move was considered evidence that the Central Empires knew they were whipped; but the call from every quarter, from the press, the capitols and the army was for rejection and for the continuance of the present victorious offensives until the Boche was back in "Bochia" (the Allied army's new name

Senator Weeks, providing for the creation of a joint Congressional Committee on Reconstruction. Senator Overman's bill provides that the committee shall investigate and report on all questions referred to it by the Senate, the House, or the President, but shall give its attention more particularly to the development of the merchant marine; the direction of foreign trade, the reconstruction of industries now engaged in war work and the reconverting of them to normal production.

GREAT AMMUNITION PLANT BLOWS UP. At 7.40 P. M. on October 4 the shell-loading plant of T. A. Gillespie & Co., near South Amboy, N. J., was shattered by an explosion of T. N. T. The plant covered several hundred acres and was the largest shell-loading plant in the world, loading over 30,000 shells a day. It consisted of a large number of separate one-story wooden buildings in which the loading operations were conducted. More than 2,000 men were at work when a comparatively light explosion occurred. The men dropped

The influenza epidemic in the East seriously affected the work on ship construction in the yards north of Baltimore. In the Fall River district ten percent of the workers were sick and at the great Hog Island yard eight per cent. . . . On October 3, with 20,000 cases in Philadelphia and the disease spreading through the state, the Pennsylvania authorities ordered all schools, churches, saloons and places of assembly closed. The epidemic had reached 43 states on October 4. . . . The Allied troops advancing southward from Archangel had progressed along the Dvina about 370 miles on September 30, reaching a point 125 miles north of Kotlas on the railway to Vologda. The province of Karelia on October 2 was practically cleared of Bolshevik troops, those remaining in the province being surrounded. . . . It was announced on October 2 that Liberty motors had now reached quantity production and that American airplanes were being shipped overseas in train-load lots. . . . Rich coal and oil deposits are being operated in Spitzbergen. British, Swedish and Norwegian companies have been operating in this far north land. The British on October 2 seized all the German interests.

GERMANY MUST PAY. The French Government on October 4 issued a solemn warning to Germany and her allies that the devastation of territory from which they retreated would be punished inexorably, and that those who ordered the devastation would be held

Who Said This?

"IN my judgment, the Protestant Churches may find before long a condition confronting them which will compel the submergence of differences and a policy of concerted action."

"If Christ's disciples will only love one another enough to work together there are no problems too difficult to solve."

"Let the preachers wipe the slate clean of all 'isms' and 'cisms' and ethical culture stuff and prepare to preach Christ and him crucified when the boys come home."

Whose opinions are these? They are by men you know and love, leaders of the church who have responded to the editor's request for light on the problems of the Church after the War. The complete letters will be published two weeks hence, in the Christian Herald of October 30.

Mary Ellis will run her course and complete her triumph next week. In the following issue we will make the acquaintance of Richard Ward, whom we will call "Dick," and who will live before us under the skillful hand of Dr. Sheldon.

Next week a message for the humble from Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, more "Adventures in Neighboring," more Helps for the House-mother, and an unusual array of pictures in Rotogravure.

Victory Loan Presses on to Victory

IGNORING all talk of peace by negotiation and zealously intent upon a peace only through decisive victory, the American people continue uninterruptedly to buy bonds of the "Fighting Fourth" Liberty Loan.

Everywhere is united, determined effort to put the subscriptions as far "over the top" as possible. Definite figures are not being officially announced, but the press reports from all sections show that the Loan is steadily sweeping to assured success.

A striking incident of the democratic character of the campaign was a house-to-house canvass in Washington by W. G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury. He turned up his coat collar and trudged through the rain to sell bonds, and he sold them. After three hours of solicitation he showed a total of $1,800,000. His smallest sale was $50 to a colored cook and his largest was $1,000,000 to Bernard Baruch, chairman of the War Industries Board.

In the meantime he had sold $20,000 to President Wilson, who already had taken $10,000 and had to take his additional subscription on the instalment plan.

Reports from all parts of the country indicate that there is no failure on the part of persons who bought bonds in the Third Loan to buy again, but some of them are forgetting that they must not only buy again but must buy more heavily than ever before. An enormous army of new subscribers is being obtained. When the rolls are written up the band of 17,000,000 patriots who put the Third Liberty Loan over the top will have become millions stronger and every man from mechanic to master of millions will have lent as they fight.

IOWA was the first State to notify the Treasury that it had oversubscribed its quota for the Fourth Liberty Loan. The amount of subscriptions reported from the entire State, as early as October 1, was $148,920,500. The State's allotment was $147,100,000.

The speed indicated in reports from the Minneapolis district affords some basis for expecting that Minnesota may prove to have matched Iowa's record. In a town in South Dakota a farmer called upon the local committee and asked the amount of the town's allotment. When he was advised that it was $12,000 he said: "I have a boy in France and I wish to subscribe my town's entire allotment in order to prove to my boy that I am backing him up to the limit." Of course, the town will sell its allotment in addition to this.

Great difficulty is being experienced in obtaining official figures on sales from the different Federal Reserve districts.

mind as to his individual responsibility. Two hundred and fifty members of the New York Stock Exchange volunteered for the work. The loan committee has drawn up a list of 7,000 well-to-do New Yorkers who have not been buying bonds, and each is being personally interviewed by the canvassers.

Admonition to the American people not to let the news of Allied victories reflects a military situation which warrants a slackening of our efforts here at home. Nothing could be further from the truth and no more insidious propaganda than this could be circulated by the enemy."

PRESIDENT WILSON and other officials feel that the American people must exercise caution lest the good news from the battlefronts cause a relaxation of effort. Thus far no such tendency has been noticeable and the campaign has been going on with an enthusiasm comparable to that with which the battle reports have been received.

It is pointed out that now that victory is definitely being brought to the side of the Allied armies, funds and more funds are needed to enable the fighting men to press home their hard won advantage and hurl the German hordes beyond the Rhine.

In connection with the efforts to prevent a slackening of campaign morale it was cited by Treasury officials that practically all

Many committees are finding it impossible to induce their sub-committees to stop selling to make reports.

Much credit for the speed with which sales are being made is given to the twenty-four war exhibit trains that are moving through the country.

In many sections of the country the epidemic of Spanish influenza is having a deterrent effect. Boston has had to stop practically all house-to-house canvassing; Philadelphia has put a ban on all meetings, and in Washington the precautions are such that working for the loan has been brought to a minimum.

IN New York City an unusual procedure was adopted by the Liberty Loan Committee because an analysis of subscriptions to past loans had convinced them that there is a large number of prosperous people in this city who have not taken as many bonds as they ought. The magnitude of this Fourth Loan has changed "ought" to "must." Individual reasons that may have had some relation to past loans must be disregarded now. Because of these facts the Committee decided that the duty in this Fourth Loan of every prosperous citizen in New York City should be brought home to him in a way that would leave no doubt in his cause a slackening of efforts in the campaign for the Loan was expressed by Secretary McAdoo in pointing out that subscriptions are being received at only about half the necessary rate.

"Germany is not yet crushed," the Secretary said. "She has millions of strong fighting men still on the battle lines and, with invasion of their own territory facing them, they will fight even more desperately than heretofore."

"While I am confident that the American people will complete the enormous task before them, I desire to urge every one not only to subscribe to the utmost of his ability, but subscribe at the earliest possible moment in order that his subscription may serve as an inspiration to others."

"The campaign is handicapped by two factors, the first being the unfortunate spread of influenza throughout many of the Eastern States, necessitating the cancellation of public meetings, parades and other demonstrations in behalf of the Loan. This condition makes it necessary for the people to come forward with their subscriptions without waiting to be called upon. The second unfavorable factor, and by far the more serious, is the feeling prevalent in some communities that the glorious news from the battlefronts of the $6,000,000,000 to be raised will have been spent by the time it is received at the Treasury.

The Government already is paying out money at the daily rate of $50,000,000, which is substantially the money to be raised in the Fourth Loan.

Nearly $4,500,000,000 has been received in the last two months from sales of certificates of indebtedness, but these securities are only temporary expedients, to be paid out of receipts from Liberty bonds. Consequently the Government is already spending its Fourth Liberty Loan money.

THE total cost of eighteen months of war to October 1, was shown to be $18,896,945,000, or three times as much as will be raised by the Fourth Loan. For this nation's war activities $12,263,582,000 was spent and for loans to Allies $6,527,914,000. Taxes have brought in $5,183,268,000, and Liberty Loans or certificates of indebtedness, about $13,000,000,000. The harvest from War Savings and Thrift Stamps has been $745,169,000.

These figures are placed at the disposal of public speakers for the loan as a means of showing the tremendous sums of money needed for the great war.

THE SENATE REJECTS SUFFRAGE. In spite of President Wilson's plea of war necessity, the Senate, on October 1, voting 53 to 31, rejected the Susan B. Anthony Woman Suffrage amendment to the Constitution. Twenty-one Democrats and ten Republicans voted against the measure, twenty-six Democrats and twenty-seven Republicans in favor of it. On October 3, a motion to reconsider put the amendment back on the Senate calendar.

REFORM PRUSSIAN SUFFRAGE. Yielding at last to the crown, the Prussian upper house, on October 2, passed the bill to amend the constitution of Prus-in the Champagne, captured Mont Blanc, north of Somme-Py, which had been heavily fortified and was held in great strength. Three thousand prisoners were taken and advances were made over the entire front between the Argonne and Mont Blanc. The British troops, which drove through south of Le Catelet between Cambrai and St. Quentin, faced six determined counterattacks on Oct. 4, but continued to make progress toward Fresnoy-le-Grand; 4,000 prisoners were taken in this sector.

The fighting on the western front on October 5 and 6 continued to result in Allied gains against fierce German resistance. The American troops fighting before the Kriemhilde positions west of the Meuse fought throughout the two days a furious battle in which they faced machine guns every five yards, and fought against concentrated artillery massed in a zone two and a half miles deep behind the German lines. Against this concentration of German defense and desperation, the doughboys won their way slowly forward. Farther west in the Champagne the American and French advances of October 3 and 4 forced the Germans to make a retreat on a 28-mile front north of Rheims, relinquishing to the French all the fortifications on the heights from which for four years they have bombarded the cathedral city. On October 7 Rheims was free from the threat of enemy shells.

North of St. Quentin the British swept over the Scheldt Canal from Le Catelet northward, clearing the Huns from the heights south of Cambrai. Between Cambrai and Douai they advanced somewhat, and the Germans fired Douai. From Douai north to Lille and all the way along the line to the sea, the Germans were hurrying homeward, pressed inexorably by the victorious armies of the Allies. On October 6 the docks at Bruges were reported burning and airmen reported hangars and anti-aircraft batteries gone from the terrain guarding Zeebrugge. The Allies held the supremacy in the air, as they have held it for over three months.

Meanwhile, as Foch's legions continued to smash the iron wall of Bochia, and the governments of the thoroughly frightened Teutonic alliance were frantically seeking peace, the state of things was grimly evidenced by the complete failure of Germany's new war loan and by a state of furious panic on the Berlin bourse.

Our Help to Victory

THE glorious heroism and victories of our boys at the battlefield supply us at home with virile inspiration to back them up all the way to Berlin, all the way to a world democracy, all the way to a righteous and abiding peace.

Theirs is no half-doing, nor can ours be, if we are their worthy backers. They are giving all, absolutely all. What are we giving? Let each honestly search his own heart.

We may invest in Liberty Bonds, sound as gold, all the surplus money we conveniently can spare; but this is not sacrifice but good business. Secure profit is one thing, earnest patriotism quite another.

The brave boys at the front "give until it hurts," and they then are only beginning to give. It is the vast surplussage beyond that makes them victorious. And only what we at home give beyond the hurting point can entitle us to rank as their loyal supporters, worthy of the blessings their blood is buying.

We may thrill and cheer over their victories, we may weep over the lists of dead and wounded, we may join the patriotic organizations, salute the flag, pray for victory, and observe every one of the conventions of patriotic conduct; but unless we are giving all the money that we can to the utmost limit, now that every dollar is a bulwark of world liberty, we fall far short in the true essence of patriotism.

"Money talks," and just now it talks patriotism more eloquently and effectively than all other modes of speech.

The nation's response to the Fourth Liberty Loan is liberal and noble, but it must go far "over the top" just as the boys over there go over the top to victories glorious beyond expectation.

Church Unity

WE cannot confess to surprise, as some are doing, at the spread of the Christian unity idea. It has long been our view that the whole plan had within itself not only the possibilities of unexampled growth; it had much more than this. It would open up to all the churches a much broader and more practical field of service for the spiritual and social betterment of the world, and it is gratifying, yet hardly surprising, to find that it is at the present moment absorbing the attention of many of the ablest minds in the Christian Church.

When church unity was first discussed, there were many criticisms raised as to its practicability. It was held that its accomplishment would involve the sacrifice of ancient associations that were hallowed by many glorious memories. These are unquestionably dear to a very large proportion of God's people, who have followed, generation after generation, in the paths of denominational tradition. It seemed to them that a severance of those revered ties would be a needless sacrifice. Now clearer light has come on this and other points. It is shown that church unity need not involve the sacrifices at which they would hesitate. John Brooks Leavitt, D. D., deals very ably with this phase of the question in the Chronicle for September:

A large, universal, ecclesiastical organization, existing in all lands, an imperium in imperio, is about the last thing any patriotic man in any enlightened country would wish to see. Let there be unity in action against the forces of evil, with the utmost freedom for individual opinion in matters of theology and organization. If one set of Christian men desires to worship God with an ornate ritual, and another set with simple rites, and still another in silence, why should they not be allowed to do so? If one group prefers an ecclesiastical organization headed by a Pope; a second one headed by bishops; a third, one headed by ministers, and a fourth wants one without any ordained clergy, why thwart them? In our Father's house are many mansions. If all the faithful hold their—not the, but their—faith in the unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life, then will the Christian Church as a whole go forth conquering and to conquer. Jesus Christ taught a religion of conduct, not of opinion. Christian men should follow him. When our boys come back from the front, after facing realities, they will have little stomach for disputes. The motto of our Christian men should be, "Diversity in opinion, unity in action."

The war has brought us all together. We have forgotten differences of opinion, and are working in harmony in the cause of Jesus Christ and his Kingdom. We have neither time nor inclination to dispute as to forms of church government or over theological opinions. Why should we resume such warfare in the Church after peace in the state comes, as come it will with the overthrow of the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs?

This, we believe, is the view taken also by that admirable Christian churchman, the Bishop of Oxford, and doubtless by many others who have given the matter consideration. It is clear, therefore, that while the army of the Lord may act unitedly in carrying out the vital duties imposed upon it by its great Commander, its various branches would still be preserved, just as these different detachments of an army are individualized, although all are united in a common purpose. There is, of course, enough for all the churches under the Unity plan; coöperation on the vital principles of Christianity and in the larger duties imposed upon the Church would in themselves constitute a sufficient bond for the unity desired. What may come in the future, time itself will disclose; but in all the relations that make for unity in carrying forward the Gospel, in the universal campaign against sin and vice in every form, in the war on unbelief, in the fight against intemperance, and in all the essentials of the Christian faith, there can be absolute unity. The invitation of the blessed Gospel opens the door of heaven to all alike, and on the same terms: "Whosoever will."

Deceiving a Nation

IT is difficult to conceive of a nation so completely and systematically deceived by its rulers as has proved to be the case with Germany. If we may accept the statements of the German newspapers cabled to us by way of Amsterdam, the Kaiser's government has until now purposely misinterpreted, distorted and camouflaged the war situation. This has been done with such amazing success that the German people, with very few exceptions, were kept in ignorance of the swift succession of crushing reverses that have befallen the Kaiser's armies on all the fronts.

With the sudden collapse and surrender of Bulgaria, and the imminent peril of Turkey following its example, the awakening has come. All Germany now knows that the last stage of the war has been entered upon and that it points to the final overthrow of the Teutonic powers. Panic has seized press and people at the eleventh-hour revelation. Fear of an invasion of "the sacred soil of the fatherland" has driven the newspapers—which only a few days before were still boastfully confident of German success—into a condition akin to hysteria. The cables from Holland report them as changing their mocking attitude against the Allies in general and America in particular, and as now calling for measures of defense on the frontier—summoning "everybody and everything" to unite for the purpose of stemming back the advancing tide of war—that war which was made in Germany and which now seems fated to roll back to the Rhine, and even across it. They know now that their "invincible troops" are fighting defensively, and that Governor Falkenhausem has begun the evacuation of the Belgian coast. They know that a great retreat is under way, leaving devastated Belgium behind, not because they have any less desire to hold it, but because they can do so no longer.

It was the boldly outspoken Vorwärts that led the journals in sounding the alarm of a probable invasion of Germany by the Allies and a growing danger of final German defeat. The Zeitung am Mittag echoed the Vorwärts' warning, and charged the government with rank misrepresentation of the war situation to its own people. The Rheinische Westfälische Gazette, the organ of the Krupp, sharply assailed Bulgaria's ingratitude in deserting the Kaiser, while the Frankfurter Zeitung, forgetting all that it had said heretofore in the days of its slavery to Junkerdom, reproached the government for failing to impress upon the nations of Europe the "truth" that Germany "did not enter the war from lust for power." The whole war situation among press and people is a pitiful revelation of the growing conviction in the German mind that the war is already lost—that the Kaiser's dream of world-empire is vitally shattered, and that the Hohenzollerns, who have ruled Germany to its ruin, have put the fatherland itself in peril.

Little wonder is there that panic conditions should exist in Germany. The knowledge that her hold on Belgium is loosening, her armies everywhere retreating, leaving behind them crushed strongholds, cities evacuated and burning, crumbling defenses which were the pride of her generals, and leaving also hundreds of thousands of prisoners in the hands of her enemies—and that all that led up to present conditions was hidden in subterfuge and lies, must convince her that as the "stars in their course fought against Sisera," so the crimes of Germany are being punished today.

But the war is not yet over; the final struggle is ahead, and it will be a hard one. Our President's warning against overconfidence is wise and timely, and will doubtless be heeded by all the forces that are now at work for the saving of the world.

Ex-Imperial Chancellor von Hertling, who resigned a few weeks ago, is said to be ready, under powerful pressure, to urge that a new peace offer be made by the government, taking advantage of Bulgaria's surrender. Admiral von Hintze, ex-Foreign Minister, is also an advocate of this course. There is little doubt that the near future will see a last despairing peace drive by Germany.

"Peace Talk" at the Front

"PEACE TALK" is the name of a long-range cannon on the American front at St. Mihiel. "Peace Talk" was christened by American doughboys, after Austria proposed a secret conference of nations for making peace that would glorify the German Kaiser. The big gun fully interprets the American soldier's opinion of Austrian diplomacy.

Recent dispatches report that "Peace Talk" has been conversing fluently lately. His remarks are addressed to the German-fortified city of Metz. For obvious reasons, the censor does not permit war correspondents to describe "Peace Talk" in detail. But judging the size of the weapon by the range, it is safe to say that each one of "Peace Talk's" sharp answers to German trickery costs America five hundred dollars.

There are bonds of the Fourth Liberty Loan issued in five-hundred-dollar denominations. How many Americans feel about Berlin diplomacy as American soldiers feel? If there are many, there will be plenty among them who can afford to contribute a few words to "Peace Talk's" forceful vocabulary. Five hundred dollars a word may seem a high rate to pay for conversation, but when it is the sort of conversation our artillerymen are hurling at Metz—conversation that is going to put a stop to Prussian pretensions in less time than many of us think—no price is too high for it.

Make it your business to see that "Peace Talk" does not lack ammunition!

Chance for the Older Man

AT the Boardman Trade School in New Haven a painter aged sixty learned quickly to be an adept machinist. A shirt-ironer past forty-five years of age in a laundry at Bridgeport, Conn., ran a screw machine after three days' practice and produced 25 per cent. more rapidly than the estimate made by the maker of the machine; at the end of a week he was taking the machine to pieces, and now he is earning 60 cents an hour in regular production. An enameleer of the same age, who was working on a machine in the same training-room, stayed a month to qualify as foreman in a screw-machine room. A farmer of sixty-eight, who had had mechanical training in his youth entered the training-room of a munition factory and quickly qualified for skilled production.

The war has proved that age is not a bar to the attainment of efficiency in a new trade. The man past fifty has come back to renewed usefulness in lines of work never previously tried.

Able-bodied men over draft age can be made skilled workers in the training schools now maintained in the large factories, and thus enabled to earn good wages while they are rendering aid to the nation.

Strict Food Saving

FOR failing to take reasonable precautions against rats, mice, rooks and jackdaws, whereby twelve stacks of oats and barley were partially rendered unfit for human food, a Black Isle farmer was recently fined $100. This item, appearing in a list of prosecutions recently conducted by the British Ministry of Food, illustrates the determined effort which the country is now making to stop waste of food.

With food ranking in importance with munitions of war, the British Ministry of Food is not hesitating to punish those who are guilty of carelessness in this respect. Notwithstanding the serious labor shortage farmers in the remote hilly regions are carting their harvests to convenient central points where the grain can be threshed promptly instead of waiting as in the past for threshing machines to come to each farm.

In calling attention to these British conservation efforts, the United States Food Administration emphasizes the importance of more serious attention to the rat menace by American farmers. Passively to permit farm waste of food and food products may more than overbalance the splendid results which patriotic housewives are securing in the home.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Conducted By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

Passing of Family Prayers

ONE of the saddest and most dangerous signs of the times is the passing of family prayers from the Christian homes of the world. Sir Joseph Maclay has recently expressed a wish that Englishmen should return to the habit of having family prayers. Various reasons for their abandonment are given, largely economical. The difficulty is more than skin deep; we fear it is in the heart. When those who are gray now were young the family prayers were counted of first importance, and the breakfast next. Father took down the old family Bible and read from it. Sometimes the wife and the children took a hand in reading each a single verse. Sometimes there was singing and then a prayer by the father. How God honored that family and service in the character of its members and in his special providence! By what mental folly or spiritual stupidity or indifference was such a cornerstone of the family, the church, and the state allowed to be taken out from under the home? Some cling to the old custom of family prayers and get the blessed benefit of it. In these times of peril and sorrow and destiny it would seem that the Christians of our land would instinctively rush into the refuge, the Holy of Holies of family prayer. The true religion began with the family religion of the patriarch, who was priest. Family religion was thus commended by Moses in the law: "And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house. . . . And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." (Deut. 6: 7, 9.)

Daddy Cook's First Trip

"DADDY" COOK of Detroit, an old man of seventy-three, who works in an automobile factory, it is said had never been out of his native city. He said to his fellow workmen that he had never been away from home, but he had for a long time cherished the notion that he would like to get out and run down to New York to see the Statue of Liberty. He did not say it as a hint to pass around the hat, but the men concluded to give the old man and his wife an outing and raised a little purse for the purpose and sent them off with flying colors. The other day the aged couple came to New York, went to a place of entertainment at night, put up at a first-class hotel, took a sail down the bay, beheld with pride and affection the Statue of Liberty, the gift of France to the United States, took in the sights, and made a break for home again feeling happy and refreshed with their vacation. "Daddy" Cook made a mistake in not going away from his home town, beautiful as it is. Schools and books are not all the sources of a complete education. A business life is a university in itself, and the veteran no doubt brightened his wits very much in sticking to his daily employment and doing it well. But ravel, which widens a man and adds to his information, he missed altogether as a source of education. His mistake of staying too close at home is not so great as that of the one who stays too little at home. The other extreme to Mr. Cook is the tramp who takes the road and travels all the time, away from home always. The advantage of knowledge, gained by spiritual vision, is thus referred to: "Also that the soul be without knowledge, it is not good." (Prov. 19: 2.)

Return to Primitive Bricks

THE high price of bricks and other building material has driven contractors in different parts of the country

Some of the contractors of California have sent down into Mexico and got men to come up and make these bricks of antiquity. They dig a pit and run a big iron wheel to cut and mix the mud and straw with enough water added to make the right consistency. And then the bricks are cut, put into molds and instrument like our farm hoe, molded it in troughs and baked it in the sun. This was the employment of the children of Israel in Egypt. And it was because the taskmasters would not let them have fresh straw, but compelled them to go out into the field and gather the stubble of last year's crop to mix with the mud, and still required the men to make the same number of bricks each day as before, that there was the revolt and the exodus. This is the complaint: "There is no straw given unto thy servants, and they say to us, Make brick; and, behold, thy servants are beaten; but the fault is in thine own people." (Ex. 5: 16.)

33,000,000 Gallons of Sorghum

A GOVERNMENT bulletin announces that before long 33,000,000 gallons of sorghum will be available for the market. This syrup is not a sugar-house by-product, but is made directly from the sorghum cane. Its use therefore does not affect the sugar supply. It must be canned and cooled to prevent fermentation, but properly handled it is a good substitute for sugar in cooking and for table uses. During the Civil War, when the sugar from the South was shut off, the people of the North took to raising the sorghum plant, and the syrup from it was widely used to sweeten tea and coffee, and it was in many families the staple sweetening for cooking. The sorghum, besides yielding a sweet juice, also bears fine seeds from which food can be made. This plant, whose real name is Durra, is raised in many parts of the world. It thrives abundantly in India and other parts of Asia, and is one of the principal bread corns of Africa. It was cultivated in olden times. It is doubtless the sorghum to which the prophet referred when he wrote: "Thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money." (Isa. 43: 24.)

Snaring Snakes in Australia

THERE is an occupation in the wilds of Australia which is as dangerous as it is profitable. It is that of catching live snakes and extracting their poison for chemical purposes. Only three species of snakes are sought for the purpose—the death adder, the brown adder and the tiger-snake. Among heathen peoples poisonous snakes are often regarded with veneration and are worshiped as gods. In our Scriptures the snake gets pretty rough treatment, being counted as the symbol of everything that is evil, and marked to be crushed with man's heel. It is thus referred to: "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adders' poison is under their lips." (Ps. 140: 3.)

New Jersey Will Ratify

THE late primaries indicate that National Prohibition will be ratified. The next legislature of New Jersey will ratify it. Among the wettest of all the wet states, New Jersey never had any local option until last winter, since which fifty-nine townships have gone dry. The temperance forces are united under the leadership of Dr. Shields of the Anti-Saloon League and his staff of workers in the wonderful overthrow of rum rule. Ratification will help answer this prayer: "Thy kingdom come." (Matt. 6: 10.)

Notable National Anthem Celebration

NATIONAL ANTHEM DAY, the 104th anniversary of the writing of "The Star Spangled Banner," was celebrated in New York City with one of the most inspiring demonstrations of patriotism witnessed in many years. In all parts of the city thousands of men and women assembled in public parks and held patriotic ceremonies in which the singing of Francis Scott Key's poem over and over again to the accompaniment of bands formed the principal event. Not only were the people brought together to hear patriotic speeches and sing "The Star Spangled Banner," but they were assembled to learn the anthem by heart in all its five verses, including the one added to the original four after the Civil War by Oliver Wendell Holmes. The most impressive rehearsal took place in front of the City Hall under the auspices of the Mayor's Committee on National Defense, where more than 15,000 men and women sang the anthem. The band from the naval station at Pelham Bay started the program. The memorable feature of the occasion was the presence and speech of Judge F. K. Pendleton, grandson of the author of the national anthem, who said, among other things: "At perhaps the darkest crisis in the country's history, when the young Republic, scarcely out of its swaddling-clothes, found itself engaged in a mighty conflict with one of the greatest powers on the earth, its capitol burned, its armies in retreat, a mighty fleet approaching one of the largest seaports, Mr. Key was sent by President Madison under a flag of truce to treat for the surrender of certain prisoners on hostile ships. His mission was completed only as the fleet prepared to open its night attack on Fort Mifflin at the entrance to the harbor of Baltimore. His anxiety to know the result, his joy at the enemy's defeat, were all voiced in the immortal poem." These "sings" that are conducted in all parts of the country are the spontaneous expression of the patriotism of the people; they are the fires in the melting-pot that fuse the hearts of all nationalities into one superb Americanism and become a mighty inspiration to our soldiers and citizens as well. When Napoleon's ammunition wagons were stalled in the mountains he ordered his hands to come to the scene, and their playing soon started the wheels to moving. Lincoln took special pains to get the finest musicians in the country into his military bands. The Almighty recognized the value of music to the heart in its highest and holiest impulses in the elaborate provision of songs and instrumental music for the temple service. On the deliverance of the children of Israel through the Red Sea Moses wrote a national anthem which was sung by all the people: "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." (Ex. 15: 1.)

to go back to the primitive bricks made of mud mixed with straw, the selfsame kind of bricks of which the tower of Babel was made, and the kind the Egyptians used 5,000 years ago in erecting about all of their buildings except the monuments and the temples of the gods. The ox and the cart with two solid wooden wheels, used thousands of years ago, can be found in Mexico today, and the old sun-dried bricks, used in that far-off time, can be seen in many of the buildings constructed there.

dried in the sun. As these bricks are durable and economical, men of small means, and those better off as well, are likely to resort to them in building their houses. Egypt was noted for its brick-making industries. The mud of the River Nile made excellent bricks. It was carried from the river in baskets on the heads of the captives and slaves, who added more water and tramped it with their bare feet until they had gotten the clay and straw into the proper temper, then cut it with an

God's Enjoyment of His Children

SUNDAY, October 20. Heb. 11:5. "He pleased God." We are in the habit of thinking, perhaps not unduly but with a certain lack of proportion, on the joy which our Father gives to his children. There is a complementary relationship which we are apt to forget and which reveals our power to give pleasure to God. It seems incredible that we can do anything to God Almighty, and more especially that we can enrich the treasures of his joys. A false or imperfect reverence makes us subdue the presumptuous thought, and we put it under most vigilant suspicion. But if the relationship of father and child is anything more than a name, if it is something more than a verbal and formal expression, if it is really vital and intimate, it must be like a highway of spiritual commerce, and the precious merchandise must pass in both directions. There must be the carriage from father to child, and there must be a corresponding transport of wealth from child to father. On this mystic ladder there are ascending and descending angels and both are laden with their respective bounty. God's good grace can cover us with favor and we can be well pleasing to God. If any one is in Christ Jesus our Father will joyfully say to his child, "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased."

Well, now, God wants us to be so great that he can enjoy us. He wants us to be companions in whom he can delight. He wants to find a large hospitality in the cheery openness of our characters. Has he given us any hints as to what kind of greatness makes us pleasing in his presence? I think he has, and it may be helpful to look at one or two. There was one day when our Lord seemed to be momentarily restraining the outpouring of his grace. A Syro-Phoenician woman was pleading for help and the answer was delayed. But the woman's heart seemed to grow larger in entreaty, and she marshaled all her powers of love in the urgency of her siege upon the heart of the Lord. And then the unwillingly hindered Fountain burst forth in streams of grace! "O woman, great is thy faith!" That is one form of greatness which makes the children of men most pleasing companions to the Lord. Shall we dare to say that a great faith always gives the Lord the delight of surprise? "When Jesus saw his faith, he marveled." That man was a fit companion for the enjoyment of God.

A Promise for the Homesick

MONDAY, October 21. Isa. 35:10. "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads." This incomparable poetry is a product of the Exile. God's people were in a foreign land, under alien skies. Their eyes beheld the outlines of strange hills, and their ears were greeted with the murmur of unknown waters. They longed for the hills and streams of the land of their fathers. God answered their longing. In time they did return—the faithful remnant of the people. This promise was to homesick souls, "Ye shall return—your longing shall be satisfied."

Heaven is the Christian's home. "Here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come." As said the Hoosier poet, "Heaven holds all for which you sigh." Another singer puts it thus—that "each hath back at last the thing he stayed to weep."

What foundation is there for such abundant comfort? The foundation of God's own Word. Every glimpse God gives us of the life to come speaks of satisfaction, life unshadowed by death, joy untouched by sorrow, fellowship unbroken by misunderstanding, limitless activity without weariness.

If then life in the world to come be so perfect, why do we not know more about it? Why is not more revealed? For a very excellent reason: If we knew the things God hath prepared for them that love him, no one of us were willing to stay on earth even to finish his day's work. "Tis blessed not to know," but this we know: beyond the mists of death lie the Delectable Mountains. "We shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." C. C. A.

The Essence of Faith

TUESDAY, October 22. John 4:50. "The man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way." Here we have the essence of true faith: faith is nothing else than taking God at his word. Faith accords God this honor to believe that God literally means everything he says, and will perform every iota of a promise which he makes.

Where there is no word of God on which to rest our confidence we can exercise no faith. We can only surmise, wish, hope. But whenever we have before us a plain statement from God, the import of which cannot be mistaken, we must not say, "I think it is so," or "I suppose it is so," or "I hope it will be so," but, fastening our eyes upon the text, we must say: "It is so; it is surely and really so; it cannot be otherwise; it must be so; for God has said so." In every case where there is some clear and unmistakable word of God commanding us to believe and directing us what to believe, we must be willing to sacrifice everything, our so-called better judgment, our common sense, our reason, our feelings. Upon the conviction that God cannot misdirect us we must be ready to risk honor, reputation, wealth, station, ease, social influence, life. Consider the odds against which Abraham had to believe when told that God demanded of him the sacrifice of his only heir, on whose life the fulfillment of a previous promise of the Lord depended. He might have argued that to kill Isaac meant the extinction of the chosen race; therefore the words which he had heard could not mean what he understood them to mean, but he must find a more convenient meaning for them. We all know that Abraham did not dicker about the meaning of God's word, did not defeat its literal meaning by some shrewd interpretation. He went to carry out the order of God to the letter, leaving the consequences entirely to God. Scripture points to this incident and says: "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that received the promise offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called: accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence he also received him in a figure."

Giving of Him

WEDNESDAY, October 23. Luke 6:38. "Give, and it shall be given unto you." Nature does not bear fruit for herself but for man. The branch does not bear the rich clusters for its own selfish appetite. Our fruitage, like that borne of the tree of Calvary, must be for mankind. Your aim is a mistaken one if you are seeking spiritual comfort, quiet satisfaction, joy here and hereafter, just for your own little self. The purple fruit of Jesus' tree of life is for cleansing, saving and redeeming. The true wine of joy comes from self-sacrifice, giving the cup of salvation to other thirsty souls. The vine of the heavenly kingdom is rooted in Paradise gardens, with its branches hanging over the walls in reach of earth's perishing millions. They have taken new root in our soil, that all the world may eat and live. Our happiness consists in the joy of fellowship with God and with those we feed, the pleasure of being channels of blessing to other immortals. Therefore we should not seek to stop the flow of this vital communication to other hearts. Pass it on to a waiting world. Then, they who hunger and thirst after righteousness will be filled, and your own soul flooded with the reflowing tide. First, abide in the vine; then serve the fruit. Don't try to serve education, culture, moral reform, without first abiding in him. He furnishes the only elixir of life; let his great loving being sweep through your soul so you can exclaim, "Of his fulness have ye received," which we let overflow to our neighbors. We must help save the people he died to rescue. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit, and bring many sons into his kingdom of glory. What an abundant harvest for all the ages of eternity!

Those Who Do More

THURSDAY, October 24. Philemon 21. "Having confidence in thy obedience . . . knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say." It has been said that there are three classes of people: those who don't do their duty, those who do their duty, and those who do their duty and something more. Near a great city school is a shop known to the children who patronize it as the "Bit More Shop." The proprietor caters to the boys and girls in little things that children like, and he always gives good measure—an extra apple or a "bit more" of candy.

Some people have such poor health that they are just able to keep on their feet; others are able to run and leap; they have abundant vigor. There is such a thing as abundant life. Jesus speaks of it as the gift he came to bring. Surely one who has abundant life is not content merely to do his duty; surely he will do more than the law requires.

God has many kinds of servants. Some of us serve by law, others by love. Did any mother ever "strike" for an eight-hour law? Paul knew Philemon, knew his sincere affection for the man who brought him to Christ, and so the confidence, "Knowing that thou wilt do more than I say." We who love our Lord with full hearts can never be satisfied with simply obeying the commandments. We run the Master's errands with eager feet. We seek to anticipate the King's requests. "Love so amazing" demands that we do more than the letter of the Word requires.

The Need of Faith

FRIDAY, October 25. Heb. 11:6. "Without faith it is impossible to please Him." Enoch's translation to heaven is explained by his faith. God was a present reality in his life: he sought him diligently and walked in communion with him. He held to the promises which God has made to those who seek him: he embraced, in particular, the promise of the Redeemer, and his faith was rewarded by his early removal to glory. Enoch's translation is an incentive to others. It is not enough to admit that there is a God, or to admire God and his works. Historians without any personal faith in Christ have admired the victorious course of the Gospel through the world, and have written splendid accounts of episodes in the history of the Church. Poets who were not Christians have chosen the beautiful and pure language and the noble thoughts of the Scriptures as their model. Philosophers who were outside of the fold of Christ have acknowledged that Christian teaching is full of the profoundest wisdom and represents the highest moral perfection. Unbelieving painters and sculptors have chosen the subjects for their famous representations from the stories of Holy Writ. In every community there are found people who freely profess that the Christian churches are a power for good, although they never enter them. Not infrequently we hear of instances in our day like that of King Agrippa, who after listening to the preaching of Paul declared: "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." All these people derive no benefit from their admiration of Christ and his teaching, or from their benevolent disposition toward his Church. The Lord still finds people like the scribe, who can return good answers to his questions, and to whom he can say: "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." But even religious knowledge is unprofitable, if it is not mixed with faith in them that possess it. What God desires to see in those whom he receives as his own is faith in the Word and promise he has issued to them in the Gospel of Christ, in whom we are made the beloved of the Father.

The Spreading Vine

SATURDAY, October 26. Num. 14:21. "But as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." The divine Being proclaimed this prophecy unto Moses. In that day of final victory the Branch of the Lord shall be full of fruitage everywhere; "for I will make the place of my feet glorious." When Almighty God brought a Vine out of Egypt and planted it in Canaan, it was not only to fill all that land, but all the world, all the hills and valleys of Palestine and of every other country. In every century men have repeated the words of the Psalmist when he exclaimed, "O Lord, visit this vine this vineyard of thy planting; make it strong for thyself." The church of Christ is therefore like a vine growing among all peoples. The branches are entwining heathen lands, the Gentiles are coming to his glory, the fruit is abundant.

Near Santa Barbara, California, there is a single grapevine more than a century old. It covers twelve thousand square feet and bears about ten tons of grapes every year. It is not one solid trunk at the base, but several great limbs rise from the roots, so that it takes the arms of two persons to encircle it. It will take the whole world to encompass the Christ vine, for it is filling all spaces, all hearts among mankind. Every true church has this spreading power. Like the heaven, we must leave those next to us till the whole is leavened. The fruits of the Spirit, love and joy and peace, are to be given to all the race.

How sad when the little foxes spoil the vines and prevent the spreading power! Just your breath on the lens of the telescope will keep you from seeing the stars. So little sins keep the branches from full development. We should pray for spreading power in every church vine, for cleansing, for greater benevolence in giving, that multitudes may be led to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. Then the glory of the Lord will fill the whole earth.

By C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

WHERE are you going?" one of the men asked sharply. As before she mumbled that she was going to see her man," and again came the curse and the mention of the fact that she was one of those Bavarian women.

"How do you know she's a Bavarian?" came the clear crisp words of the third man, and he rode his horse over before her. "What's the idea of just dismissing every one who mumbles as being harmless? Hey, there! What's your name?" His voice was very fresh, and there was none of the weariness that Mary Ellis had noted in the voices of the others. Evidently he was young, and his conflict had not passed the stage where it was the greatest game of all.

"Mary," she answered him. "Come on!" The first speaker started on his horse, "They're all named Mary, and she'll die of fright if you don't let her alone. Thank fortune the German army isn't made up of Bavarians."

"She—she might—" the man started. "Yes, and she might not," and he touched his horse and cantered away. The other two followed him, one of them reluctantly. Mary Ellis went on. She had not gone more than a half-mile, however, when she heard the crunch of galloping hoofs behind her. A vague fear filled her, but she did not turn to look back. The man on horseback passed her, wheeled his horse suddenly, and stopped.

"What's the rest of your name? Mary hat?" It was the young officer who had wished to question her a short distance back.

"Schmitt," she mumbled. "Yes; well, I want to see what you look like in the light. Perhaps you're right, perhaps not. If you're all right you know better than to be around this time of night. Here, walk alongside here!" and he wheeled his horse so that she had to walk by his stirrup. He did not know where she was being taken; for some reason or other she was not at all afraid. Once she slackened her pace. This was met by a quick touch across the shoulders from the man's hip. "Keep going!" he ordered quickly, and she obeyed.

HE judged that they must have traveled for ten minutes before he turned aside from the main road and went toward a small house. The young officer dismounted, threw a blanket across his horse, and, after placing the reins about a rude hitching-post, pushed open the door.

"Stand still till I get a light. If you won't shoot you." He fumbled about, struck a match and cursed an orderly who had moved the lamp. Finally he held the object of his search, and a yellow glow sent the darkness into the corners.

"First take off your hat," He dropped a big chair and drew it about so that he could look into Mary Ellis's face.

The girl did as she was ordered, meanwhile casting furtive glances about the room. It was comfortably furnished with three cots in various corners. The headquarters of some junior officers, she decided—and permanent ones to judge from the pictures, the magazines, and the open box of cigarettes from which the young bullet-headed Prussian was helping himself.

"Hm! Rather well cared-for hair for a Bavarian. I didn't know you women were so pretty. How long have you been down here?"

"About a week—two weeks," she said with no show of emotion.

"Bad business, letting women come and a battle front, though it's been peaceful enough down here. Where's your man stationed?"

"Down there." She pointed in the direction of the firing-line.

"Hope he gets killed, don't you?" "Oh no—not killed!" she cried with as much terror as she could get into her voice.

For what seemed a long period of time she stood there, while her captor watched her with half-shut eyes. Mary Ellis decided that in spite of his youth he was the most repulsive being she had ever seen. He could not have been more than twenty-one or two, yet his face was heavily sensuous; thick lips, heavy, puffy eyelids. Her gaze traveled from his face to his great shoulders, his large hands. So this was a German—a man of war. She did not know why, but instinctively she felt that he must be a real Prussian.

"Take off your mits," the man said suddenly, jumping to his feet and towering over her, "Take off your mits."

Startled, she did as he told her. He picked up one of her hands, and laughed loud and long. "Ach!" he rocked with mirth. "Ach! a Bavarian woman with those hands! You—s-s-spy!" He hissed the last words, changing his language suddenly to French.

Mary Ellis did not move. It is true that in moments of greatest danger many are most calm; and so it was with this girl, who seemed to look along the path that she must go and see only a German firing squad.

PRESENTLY the man went back to his chair. His whole demeanor was changed, however; he even went so far as to draw one of his pistols and place it on the low table near his hand.

"You are the person that arrived by way of a parachute which was found by the roadside this morning?" He spoke in French now, perfect French, that was not at all of the schoolboy variety.

"It is nothing to you how I arrived, or why," she said calmly. "If I were to tell you the truth you would not believe me."

"Then tell it. You are the first spy I have ever seen. I wish something to write home to my father. Capturing you will bring me an Iron Cross,—also a captaincy. I can leave these two trusting swine for better quarters. They would have let you go. I knew better."

Mary laughed. She had suddenly decided on the part that she would play,—and had keyed her nerves to carry her through the ordeal.

"You are smart, and already you are counting your gains."

"Yes, already. Tell me who you are—your story—quickly—or I shall beat you." He touched the pistol menacingly.

"I am a newspaper woman. I dropped from an airplane to get into Germany and write an article about the country. The American papers promised me a fortune if I could get material for an article and then come out alive. It was a chance—but I took it. Newspaper women are fearless, you know."

He jumped to his feet.

"American papers—always American. Can't you leave them out of this war? Why not your own Paris papers, or for London? Why this American, American?"

"I am an American," she said slowly. "I am from New York."

The man stared, almost as if he did not comprehend.

"You—you are an American?" he asked.

"Yes. Isn't it splendid that I have this chance to talk with you? It will be a great help to my article."

"Your article! Your article! How dare you talk about your article? To-morrow morning I shall have the pleasure of seeing you shot." Then, with a trace of admiration he could not conceal, "You are much more brave than they told us in Berlin."

"Do you, too, believe what they tell you in Berlin?" she asked quickly.

"The time is fast coming when even you Prussians must think for yourselves. They told you we could not send an army over here, and they are in the trenches, only a few miles away. Don't you know," and she moved daringly close to him, "don't you know that they have lied to you, that you are losing the war?"

"It is not so," he cried angrily. "Wait—wait till a regiment or two of Prussians try the mettle of your soldiers—then you will find them to be men of paper. They have been fighting these Bavarians, who do not know how to fight. When the Prussians get here you will see real fighting—real fighting. The Prussians are coming," he stormed. "My regiment, my own regiment, that knows how to obey. Some day those men who laughed at the poor aim of the Bavarians will find they are laughing for the last time. We will fool them. Those of your men who live will turn and run."

Mary Ellis laughed—almost gayly. "Don't think for a minute that we will run. You are beaten—beaten," and again she moved very close to him. "Ask them the next time you are in Berlin—ask them to tell you the truth." And again she laughed, and moved nearer.

WITH a snort of rage the young officer backed away, and as he did so Mary Ellis found the chance for which she had waited. A light chair was by her hand, and with a swift free movement she swung it upward, the seat catching the man on the chest and momentarily winding him. The chair went swiftly upward, over Mary Ellis's head, and before the man could more than grunt it was descending with all the force the strong young woman could muster. As he tried to cry out, as he reached for his pistol, the back crashed against his forehead, and with a grunt that was almost laughable he dropped heavily to the floor.

Mary Ellis put the chair down and looked toward the door. There was silence.

"I have heard you were an excitable race," she spoke in her nervousness aloud. "Even when you are talking with a woman captive you forget to be cautious. You are young—you will learn." Her words were almost hysteria now. "When you get better you will tell them all I said—and they may hang you for treason." Her swift fingers were pulling on her woolen cap and the heavy mittens. Deliberately she looked down on the fallen man, and a shudder passed over her at the thin stream of blood that crossed his temple.

"You will be better presently," she said, half pityingly, and then she turned out the light and groped her way toward the door.

A minute later she had unfastened the bridle of the horse, patted his flanks and sent the animal free across the fields.

Then she continued her interrupted journey toward the French lines and safety.

CHAPTER XI.

LOOKING backward over the adventure which crowned all the achievements of a lifetime, Mary Ellis was always awed by the fact that of her dream-like flight into the enemy's country she could not definitely remember the two portions that interested her most—how she got into German territory and how she got out.

She always had a definite recollection of climbing into the big plane, but could never bring back to mind a single detail of her leaving. In a similar manner she knew that when she left the house where she had been questioned by the young officer she was able to think in sufficient detail to send the man's horse galloping away and so hinder possible pursuit. Yet it was the muddy slime of No Man's Land that awakened her deadened memory and told her that she was close to safety.

What had actually happened was that she plunged swiftly down the road—each step bringing her nearer to the firing-line. Inbedded in her subconscious mind were the instructions that Jean had given her—and she followed them, not knowing why or how. At the top of the long hill that led down through the woods and brought the wayfarer to the scene of the encamped Bavarians she turned aside and went stealthily through the underbrush. Here she dropped her skirt,—so that she could get into the sparsely filled trenches without betraying her sex. She was less than five miles from the actual front lines now, and had her senses been more acutely attuned to what was happening about her she would have been conscious of occasional rifle fire, for the Prussian officers in charge had abandoned the military tactics of the Bavarian soldiers they hated, and had ordered that light firing be kept up at fairly regular intervals.

It was kindness on the part of fate that Mary Ellis did not know of this firing—did not know that she might have to crawl for some minutes with the bullets singing overhead.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE cared for Mary Ellis that night—the same Providence that every day brings men and women back from death's door when they are "almost run over" by a passing automobile in front of their peaceful homes, or when they are ill and the doctor says "death." In answer to prayers of her heart Mary Ellis went down through the fields at the foot of the hill, skirted villages of men in uniform, through districts that must have been guarded with armed men who would never hesitate to shoot. Perhaps the fog helped her; perhaps she was halted and managed to give some satisfactory explanation; but the first dawning memory of her trip came to her when she became conscious that she was crawling on her stomach, inch by inch, over slimy land. She was in that ghastly strip of earth called No Man's Land, where the ground is torn with shells, where nothing lives, and the stench of dead men rises with the sun. The first-line trenches of the Huns were a hundred yards in the rear; ahead lay safety. Had all of her journey been as easy as her snake-like crawl between the front trenches of that Lorraine sector she would have suffered little inconvenience. Only a few weeks later American fighting blood was to make this sector one that Germany feared. Now the Bavarians evaded war, and the American boys still acting under their French instructors, were not strong enough to carry on the active warfare they craved, and were soon to undertake. Only once the crackling of a gun broke the stillness of the night; no star-shell burst to strike terror into her heart and make her lie trembling and hoping that she would not be seen. Hand over hand she went through the mud and filth. Her face was spattered, she could even feel the mud fastening onto stray wisps of her hair. And then from out of the darkness she heard a movement, and almost in front of her a man spoke in an undertone, and his words were in French.

It was a patrol—and she was safe.

With a half-smothered cry of joy she drew herself to her feet.

"Poilu! Poilu!" she called softly; "come, take me through the line—come quickly."

There were two men, she made out,—and she saw one of them cross himself quickly as they moved cautiously near her.

"Poilu, don't be afraid!" she cried.

"Take me to your commander." And she moved close to him. "It is no trick; I have just crawled through the German lines, I am French—American."

"French! American!" one of the men cried, suddenly finding his tongue. "What d'yer mean American?" And hot tears rushed to Mary Ellis's eyes, for in his excitement one of the men on parole had reverted to his native tongue.

IT was less than a half-hour later that Mary Ellis stood, a very bedraggled creature, in the presence of three young American officers. Quickly she told her story—not all, but that she had carried a message of great importance to some one back of the German lines, and had in turn received information of much importance that she must get to Paris at once; for Mary Ellis knew enough of warfare to know that such news as she had learned of the Prussian attack on the Americans must go only to those in the highest command.

"If you will be so good as to call up the Bureau in Paris and tell them that Mary Ellis has returned, I think that you will receive instructions. Quickly, please; it is important and I am uncomfortable."

The three young men were skeptical. They were Americans, unused to the intrigues of war. They conferred together for a brief minute. Then one of them called headquarters on the phone.

"Captain Purcell, please?" he asked; and he told the captain that a woman who called herself an American had been taken in No Man's Land.

"A woman!" Mary could hear the Captain's exclamation.

"Yes; and she's asking us to call up the Bureau in Paris and say that Mary Ellis has arrived from the German lines. So you—"

But the phone was hung up with a snap.

"Did,—did you say Captain Purcell? Is his first name by any chance Robert—Robert Purcell?" she asked.

"Do you know him?" the man asked incredulously.

"Yes, thank God. May I sit down?"

Ten minutes later Captain Purcell—the same man who had lifted her from the slough of Westport—rushed into the room, with a bustling French officer at his heels.

"Mary Ellis!" he cried. "Mother wrote me that she had been able to send you to France; but not—not as this. Can you tell me about it? But no I mustn't ask. When Major Tourée—pardon me, Major, my excitement is overwhelming. May I present Major Tourée, Miss Ellis?" he sped on without hesitation. "And when the major called the Bureau they said you were to have every courtesy—warned us to take special care of you, asked most solicitously for your health. Great guns, Miss Ellis, it's a long way from Orchard Street to this."

She laughed.

"And now, Mademoiselle, if I may be permitted," the Major interrupted, "a car will be ready to take you to Paris at once. These young men and myself regret that you have been detained this long. Perhaps you wish a little coffee—something to stimulate mademoiselle." Mary Ellis thanked him, and told him that the coffee would be most acceptable. He sent one of the young officers away with a sharp command, and then, as if he could not trust any one but himself, he followed him.

"Well, I'm crazy to know all about it!" Purcell cried.

"Yes, and I'm glad I'm an American," one of the two men left behind came across the room and offered his hand. "And you're not sore at us for treating you like this?"

"Sore?" Mary Ellis laughed. "No; I know military life well enough to know duty. I'll cry quits and say friends if you'll find me a basin of water and some soap, also a towel." And she laughed so good-naturedly that they joined.

Half an hour later, when she left for Paris in a great gray car she heard them call "good-by" above the whirr of the machine.

To be concluded

A PRAYER

O GOD, we do not ask to understand; We do not ask that thy stern, chastening hand Be lightened; that our burden be made less, Or that our journey through this wilderness Of war and devastation shortened be. We are content to place our trust in thee, Knowing thy wisdom, thy omniscient power, Will guide and shield us in this darkest hour, We only ask that we may bear our cross In patience; that the bitterness of loss Be lessened by thy love. We only pray That thou wilt give us strength to tread this way Of thorns and searing agony. To thee, Whose Son was crucified on Calvary That we might live, we kneel and say: "Thy will Be done, O God of Hosts!" And though we still Must give and give, we only pray that we Through suffering, be closer drawn to thee!

The Power of the Cross in Latin America

Christian Endeavor Topic, Luke 15:1-10

FOR more than two hundred years the power of the Cross in Latin America was the power of a vicious and immoral priesthood, exerted by an ignorant and superstitious people, to hold them in ignorance and superstition, in order that the priests might sit secure in the places of power in the state. Education was forbidden to the poor and discouraged for all, and the Bible was a closed book; yet the civilizations of Latin America developed under this incubus, and men sought all won freedom in varying degrees. Those who secured an education broke with the priests, and the Cross lost its power in their lives. Latin American civilization was fast becoming atheistic, immoral and immoral.

Into this situation entered the Protestant missionary. Some of the bravest battles of the Cross have been fought by these men and women in the cities and towns of Latin America. They fought for the right to read the Bible, for the right to teach school, and with the Bible omitted, and longed desperately for the right to preach. Now, in every republic south of Panama, teaching, Bible-reading and preaching are unhindered by law, and the people who once saw in the Cross a symbol of oppression are finding in its true light, the symbol of a new and wider liberty. South America is not yet moral; it is not yet educated; it is not yet freed from superstition; but the power of the Cross of Christ, lifted in truth, is building, upon the foundation of creeds recited but never believed, a new structure of civil, active, evangelistic Christian life.

B. Y. P. U. Topic, Zech. 14:20

Religion and Democracy in the Modern City: Chapter Four of League Home Mission Study Book, "Christian Democracy for America."

Epworth League Topic, Acts 6:1-7

BECAUSE of the likeness of these two topics we will discuss them as one. Christianity is democratic. Democracy to be safe must be Christian. The early Church had all things in common. Though this practice was soon discontinued, it nevertheless threw a strong light on the inner thought of the Church. Christians are a band of brothers; each must seek the other's good; each must be ready to rejoice in the good fortune of the other and to minister quickly to the misfortune of any who sorrow. The true Christian can be neither self-seeking nor selfish. He may be ambitious in a proper way. He may exert a considerable leadership. His ambition, if it is a truly Christian ambition, will be to excel in the things of Christ, and his leadership must lead toward him. A democracy is a government which exists for the good of the people who are its citizens. Self-seeking, grasping self-interest, untruth, deceit, all these are fatal to democracy even as they are to the house of faith. It is essential, therefore, that our American democracy should be Christian.

The modern city has presented to the Church a great opportunity to serve both her Master and the state by making the ideals of Christ and democracy real to those who have come seeking liberty, yet knowing only her name. Before the war hundreds of city churches, through social service work and night schools, were gathering in the many-languaged foreigners about them, teaching them English, American history and the common branches that would fit them for successful work, and leading them to see through the teaching work of the Church, the Spirit of her Lord and the essence of democracy. With many of these former students of the Church now in the Army, Uncle Sam has to some degree taken over the work of making citizens from naturalized material; but there is still work for any city church to do and it is work which will make democracy safe because it makes citizens who approach its problems with ideals of service to the state instead of ideas of personal self.

For a Chinese Y. W. C. A.

LAST August the Y. W. C. A. held a conference of and for the foreign women in New York City and vicinity. Among the more than 200 delegates were three Chinese women. After these three had returned to Chinatown and reported what they had seen and heard, a petition was signed by thirty-nine progressive Chinese women, some of whom signed their names in Chinese characters, setting forth that as "many of the women in that locality were conservative toward modern movements, did not speak English, and were ignorant of the highest conception of women's responsibility," the petitioners, realizing their responsibility and opportunity, turned to the Y. W. C. A. to help them in their crusade of social uplift. These Chinese women, in order to establish a Y. W. C. A., have already raised funds "which show only a part of the public welcome awaiting such an organization."

How the Pulpit Urged the Loan

THE clergy have stood behind the Fourth Liberty Loan very staunchly. Guy Emerson, director of publicity for the Liberty Loan Committee, sent letters to all the clergymen of the Second Federal Reserve District, asking them to help in every way possible to make the loan a great success. He received thousands of replies assuring him of full support.

Rev. C. A. Roth of Trinity Church, Syracuse, N. Y., wrote: "We are fighting for a spiritual principle." He helped the Fourth Liberty Loan in every way possible.

Rev. J. H. Keeling, Watertown, N. Y., wrote: "I am always at the bidding of my country, for whatever I can do."

Rev. J. A. Dillon, Christian Church, Rush, N. Y., wrote that he would give all of his service to the government for the loan work.

Rev. M. Clune, Church of St. John the Evangelist, Syracuse, N. Y., wrote: "All our achievements of the past have never equaled what we may achieve today."

Rev. H. R. MacMillan, of the First Baptist Church, Norwich, N. Y., wrote: "To the last notch in my power or ability I am willing to assist in this loan." One-third of Mr. MacMillan's salary this year has been given to war work and charities.

Rev. K. Husko, Great Neck, L. I., wrote: "Never has the country been more united than at this moment. We are now ready to go on until the German Empire is dismembered and the world menace forever removed, so that universal peace may belong to the nations in perpetuity."

Rev. W. G. Adams, Winfield, N. Y., Reformed Church, wrote that he was "hammering away at the cause and its great import" from the pulpit. He was a member of the local Liberty Loan Committee, and, as he expressed it, "in it with both feet."

ATALK with the Bishop of Oxford is an experience. One who has only heard of the bishop and never seen him hardly knows what to expect. Christians and non-Christians the world over know of him as a great teacher and a great ecclesiastic. They have heard of or read the books that brought him power and fame—books written for the most part when Dr. Charles Gore was known simply as Canon Gore. They know that he was chaplain of the royal court in the time of Queen Victoria and King Edward. They know that he holds now one of the highest positions attainable in the Church of England, and that he sits in the House of Lords.

As I sat in the lobby of the Yale Club on Vanderbilt Avenue, watching military and naval men, business men, professors, Y. M. C. A. workers, casual travelers come and go, I heard a gentle voice speaking my name. Looking up, I saw a sweet-faced, snowy-bearded, slender man, with soft blue eyes, who stood in half retiring, half apologetic manner, asking if I wished to see him.

"Is this Bishop Gore?"

The outstretched hand and kindly voice said it was.

"Where can we find a seat?" said the bishop, and we wandered about till we came upon a stiff, plain settle, near the south wall of the lobby. We sat down on the hard wooden seat, the bishop leaning forward thoughtfully, waiting for me to begin my questioning.

I asked him to tell me something about the part he thought the Church might and ought to have in the reconstruction of the world that must follow the fury of war. And this is what the great prelate of the Church of England said in answer to that question, for the readers of the Christian Herald:

HE spoke leaning forward, his hands resting on his knees. His words came straight and unaffected from a simple heart, and even his accent was the accent of the plain gentfolk all over the world who use the English speech.

"My own opinion is that through historical circumstances the Church has been very largely linked with the interests of the wealthier classes and has been too content with what has been called charity to the poor. It has been picking up the wounded and seeking to heal those that have been wounded in the social strife, when it should have been demanding a basis of justice and fellowship. And the great vocation of the Church in the days that are coming will be to bear effective witness to the Gospel of the equal worth, in the sight of God and in the sight of man, of every single human soul, of whatever class, race, or color, and to see to it that its ministry is supplied not from any class privileged by wealth but from the best men of all classes and kinds. And its business is to see that all its arrangements and organizations are so reconstituted as to harmonize with the real and fundamental principles of democracy. In doing this it will only be working upon the fundamental principles of Christianity."

Strange words, these, to be coming from a member of the House of Lords! One knew that one was talking to a man whose "gentleness had made him great."

But the bishop, while he has advanced views on questions of sociology, still clings to the ancient creeds of the Church, for he went on:

"I am not one of those who believe that any merely social gospel will accomplish the ends of Christianity. Jesus Christ always gave first place to the doctrine of God, and it is by fidelity to this doctrine of God, as expressed in the fundamental creed, that the Church can fulfil its social mission."

ASSOCIATING the war and the hopes for peace with the future of the Church, the bishop said:

"As regards the war, I am wholeheartedly with the common sentiment which sees the present necessity of a real victory over German militarism and the German military autocracy. I do not believe in any parleys for peace prior to a substantial real victory. But I am most anxious that, while we fight the war through, we shall keep the moral aims of the war foremost in our minds; that even now we should be preparing such a League of Nations, a League of Free Peoples, so that it shall be an instrument ready to our hands, well thought out and prepared, with which to carry forward the work of making peace. And I am most anxious that we should keep it clearly before the mind of the German people that we never underestimate the gifts of the German people, however sadly they may have been recently misused; and that, when they have learned to behave in accordance with the principles of justice and liberty, we shall be ready to welcome them into the arms of free peoples. We are not fighting to crush Germany, but to free it."

"I am, moreover, extremely anxious that the churches shall see their opportunity, in the name of the Prince of Peace, in cooperating frankly and vigorously with the cause of the League of Free Peoples."

Referring to America's part and place in the present crisis, the bishop continued:

"I need not say how much I feel that the fate of the world depends on the cooperation of the great American democracy, not only in fighting to end the war victoriously, but also in maintaining the great aims of liberty and justice for all human beings of whatever race, as the only solid basis on which peace can be made and can be permanent."

AS is already known to Christian Herald readers, the bishop is in America on a twofold mission—one to forward the plan of the League of Nations which he has so much on his heart, the other to bear a message from the churches of Great Britain to the churches of America, and to help forward the work of bringing into closer unity the divided spiritual forces of Christendom. Speaking of these divisions and his hope for unity, the bishop said:

"All parts of the Church at the present moment are becoming ashamed of our unhappy divisions. To heal those divisions will be a long business. It is very likely that only a humiliation which will come upon the Church as a just judgment from God will be the instrument for drawing together the elements of a divided Christendom. Meanwhile, it is our business to advance in mutual understanding, and I think the greatest and best means of getting to understand one another is to work together as if we were one Church in all the great causes of spiritual morality and social reform and reconstruction. That can be done today without any sacrifice of principles; and it is seeing us work together for the great causes of humanity that must constitute our appeal to the man on the street. Thus shall we all grow to trust one another and show ourselves deserving of the confidence of the world."

Knowing that the bishop had taken an active interest in the cause of labor in England, I asked him to say something about the relation of the Church and labor. He replied:

"It is both lamentable and marvelous in the history of labor for a considerable period to read how good and liberal men, under the dogma of the old political economy, acquiesced in a situation in which masses of men, women, and children were manifestly treated as instruments for the gain of others. But now not only has labor become consolidated and therefore powerful, but the whole mind of the country has become inspired by ideas of justice. And in particular the Church and the churches have become ashamed of their old acquiescence in unjust conditions, and are out for a new Gospel of the equal value of every human soul.

"I have been a member recently a commission appointed by the bishops for the consideration of industrial problems. The commission was composed of bishops, clergy, labor men and employers. It is just about to publish its report, and it is not too much to say that this practically unanimous report will be found almost to coincide in all its main points both industrial and educational, with the program of the British Labor Party."

THE bishop talked about Jesus and war, saying that though Jesus was so deep a lover of peace, he believed in a would sanction force for the sake of protecting others. But the sorrow of the war are pictured on the bishop's tender and beautiful face. Love for mankind is in his heart, his eye in his mind, on his tongue, in the clasp of his hand.

Since talking with him I have read more carefully the things he has been saying elsewhere in the city, in churches, at gatherings, formal and informal, and hearing from others how his words have impressed them. A friend came in to hear his sermon the other Sunday at Trinity. He preached from the text: "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted, and he that exalteth himself shall be abased." Expressing his belief that the German government was receiving the punishment for its exaltation, he warned the nations against her that if they attempt to return to their own former methods of statecraft and aggression, they too will be humbled; that it is only by humility and helpfulness that permanent goodness can come.

The bishop's visit will be a benediction to America, not only to the Church, but to the people; to the churches who need his exhortations to true democracy and justice; to the poor and workers who, with their struggle for justice, need to keep in mind the deeper concerns of the soul and the all-embracing demands of love and brotherhood.

Is a New Reformation at Hand?

ONE of the features of the Christian Herald in the coming months will be the discussion in an Open Forum of the great movement now under way or the reorganization of the Christian Church, not only in America, but in the civilized lands. The war has quickened the national spirit in our own land and is working a remarkable change in our social life.

The Christian Herald has taken note of the great changes that are being brought about by the war in the social, moral and religious life of our own and other nations. Recently this journal sent to sixty leading Americans—an eminent in the pulpit, the press, the university and the wide field of religious literature—inviting from them a free expression of views relative to the religious transformation which the war is producing, not only among the people in the trenches but in the training camps—a transformation that is being reflected in the minds of our people everywhere. The replies received to this questionnaire are of tremendous interest. One might naturally expect a clash of conflicting opinions from representatives of widely separated denominations; yet in these letters we find an almost universal agreement as to the immediate duty of the Christian Church in America to be prepared for the coming change, the new era, of which many have already begun to terrify the impending Reformation.

This series of remarkable letters will be read around the world. The next instalment will appear in the Christian Herald issue of October 30.

Poetry

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT'S the velvet haze of the autumn days,
And the blue of the autumn sky;
It's the purple sheen on the grasses green,
And the wing of a butterfly.
It's the gleaming gold that the sunsets hold,
And the rose at the dawn of day;
And the spray that's bright where the waves are white
And the newborn seagulls play.

It's the light that lies in a woman's eyes,
And the warmth of a friendly hand;
And the voice of home to the ones that roam
Through many a weary land.
It's the hint of prayer on the Sabbath air,
And the dew on the new-turned sod;
And the plant that grows through a winter's snows,
Toward the wonderful face of God.

POETRY—no, I hardly ever read poetry," said the Business Man shortly.

"But why not?" I questioned.

"Surely—"
The Business Man interrupted. "It's such a waste of time," he told me. "There's so much else to read that's more worth while than poetry. Look at all the newspapers, and the scientific articles, and the talked-of books that the average reader never even gets a moment to glance at! Look at all the necessary material that the average reader has to pass by! Poetry isn't necessary. It's nice to fill up small spaces with, and it's musical, and appealing. But that's all that I can say for it."

"I think," I disagreed (for when making rhymes is one's business in life, one is bound to stand up for that business!), "that poetry is beautiful, and restful, and inspiring. It's the wonderful way of expressing wonderful thoughts. Surely that's enough excuse for it!"

The Business Man is in the habit of living his own way. I fancy that his force bow down to his slightest opinion. He rather glared at me.

"I hate to argue with a woman," he told me, "because it's so hard to make a woman see a man's viewpoint! But he said what I think about poetry, and nothing that anybody else can say will change me. It's unnecessary, pleasant, perhaps, it is. But unnecessary!"

"Well," I answered respectfully, "if you feel that way we'll talk about something else. . . . Something that you're interested in," I added.

And we did.

THE girls of a certain Sunday school class were making up a party to visit an Old Ladies' Home and give an entertainment there.

"We can't all go," said the leader of the class, "because the superintendent of the Home told me that too many of us would create a confusion that would be had for the old ladies. She said that six of us would be enough. Ruth," she added to a dark, serious girl, "you must come to play the piano. And Mary can bring her violin. And Ellen recites very well indeed," she smiled at a short girl with spectacles. "And we'll take Ethel and Grace to give their dialogue. And as for the sixth"—she glanced around the circle—"can any of the rest of you do anything special? No? Then," she paused, "then, Dorothy," she said, speaking to an extremely pretty girl with fluffy yellow hair, "we'll take you to make up the number."

The six girls, in due time, went to the Old Ladies' Home. And Ruth played to piano, and Mary drew tenderly sweet music from the soul of her violin, and Ellen recited with splendid effect, and Ethel and Grace gave a dialogue that was brilliant and clever and sparkling. But Dorothy, who hadn't any special talent, sat quietly in the sunlight and smiled at the old ladies, who smiled back at her, and applauded her classmates when the old ladies applauded. And, though she felt rather useless, she really had a very nice time!

After the entertainment the superintendent of the home served chocolate and tiny cakes. And while the girls were enjoying their party the leader of the class circulated about through the room talking to the old ladies. And over in one corner she came upon a little smiling woman with snow-white hair. And she spoke to her. But the little smiling woman didn't answer—she only went on smiling.

"She's as deaf as a post," volunteered the superintendent, who had followed the leader of the class. "If you've got anything to say to her, you'd better write it. For she can't hear a word!"

And so the class leader borrowed a bit of paper and wrote on it.

"Did you enjoy the entertainment?" she wrote.

The little smiling woman read the tiny note. And then she smiled more sweetly than ever.

"Yes," she answered in the soft, curiously toneless voice of the deaf, "I certainly did enjoy it. Although, of course, I couldn't hear the music or the speaking."

The class leader looked at her with dim eyes before she wrote again on the pad. "I'm so sorry!" she wrote, "but how, if you couldn't hear the singing or the speeches, could you enjoy the entertainment?"

The little smiling woman laughed as she read the second written message.

"Why," she answered, "I just enjoyed watching that little girl—the one with the yellow hair who sat in the sunlight. The sunlight made her hair look like spun gold. And when she smiled she was like an angel with a halo. She was so pretty that she was a whole entertainment in herself!"

And so it was that the class leader realized that Dorothy, who had no talent—Dorothy, who had only her natural sweetness and beauty to give—had probably done more to brighten a very dull life than any of the rest.

POETRY—no, it really isn't necessary! But neither, I suppose, are flowers, or bird songs, or blue sky. And yet the flowers and the bird songs and the blue sky are the things that go to make life worth the living.

Dorothy, the little girl with the yellow curls, was, perhaps, the poetry of the entertainment that a certain Sunday school class gave at an Old Ladies' Home. The other girls who took part in the entertainment were the prose—the really necessary part. Dorothy was just taken along to fill up a blank space. But, in filling that blank space, she made a bright spot in a drab life.

Oh, friends of mine, do not despise the words that are song words—the words that are rhythm and melody. Don't despise poetry because it isn't essential—turn, instead, to the Bible, and you'll find plenty of poetry there!

Springtime wouldn't be springtime without its violets—autumn wouldn't be autumn without its vivid foliage. And the book of life wouldn't be complete without its poetry.

To Protect Religious Liberty

THE Joint Committee on War Production Communities, representing the Home Missions Councils and the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, met in New York on September 11 and reported on fifty-five war-production centers, including shipyards, ordnance reservations and many other centers of war industry. It recommended the erection of a Liberty Church, representing all the Protestant bodies, at Nitro, W. Va., and reported a probable need for like churches in other similar communities. The recommendations of the committee emphasize the American principle of opposition to a state-supported church. The government is prepared to build the churches on the reservations, but the conference unanimously resolved to request that they be allowed to pay for their own buildings. This was partly due to the patriotic desire to help the government, but more especially to preserve the American principle of separation of church and state.

Burning Up Bread

We've Been Doing It for Years!

Let's stop it. Last winter when our allies needed millions of bushels of grain to help them avert famine, millions of bushels were being destroyed by fire in America because not safeguarded by concrete. In one fire alone in Brooklyn, nearly 1,000,000 bushels of grain were destroyed.

Foodstuffs will be scarce during and after the war. Everyone's interest demands that further waste be prevented by storing them in fire-proof structures.

When you use concrete, transportation, skilled labor and steel, of which there are none to spare, are released for urgent war needs.

Whether you are going to build a Coal Pocket or Silo, Factory or Warehouse, Dam or Power Plant, Railroad or Marine Terminal, Water or Sewer System, Oil Storage Tank or Watering Trough

Genesis 24

An Ancient Lesson on Marriage

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

SO thoroughly Oriental is the setting of this pastoral idyl of an ancient betrothal that careless Bible readers are apt to miss the timeless wisdom of its ideals concerning marriage. In those patriarchal days it was a father's duty not only to discipline his son, and to be his teacher, but also to see him safely and happily married as well. They tell us indeed that in the land of our ally, France, the mothers are the match-makers, and wise and successful about the task, too. But in Anglo-Saxon society courting by proxy has never been popular. See how Miles Standish fared when he sent John Alden to bespeak Priscilla!

Consider how fine a character we have in Eliezer, the trusted servant of Abraham,—absolutely trustworthy and both wise and prayerful in the carrying out of his stewardship! In a day when the ancients despised and distrusted most of their servile class, the relation of the Hebrew founders to their very slaves stands out with many an inspiring foregleam of the Christian way.

Abraham's Advice on Choosing a Wife

Finding it necessary to entrust Eliezer with the choice of a wife for his beloved son, Abraham gives him wise instruction concerning the principles involved, instruction that has not lost its point in four thousand years.

(1) First requirement of all, the sought-for bride of Isaac, the heir of Hebrew ideals, must not be a Canaanite. Blood will tell, and Abraham knew the heathen people of his neighborhood to be an inferior stock. He realized instinctively that for his boy to marry one of this lower race would bring inevitable misery. Besides, he was building up a chosen nation, and he evidently knew something of heredity and eugenics. In our own times he has been vindicated by the careful study of some of the fine family stocks in America and of some of the depraved demoralized stocks in contrast. Good family does count.

(2) She must be of like moral and religious ideals. When one finds out about the horrible immoralities and superstitions of the neighboring tribes around Israel one can understand still further Abraham's vehement adjuration, "Thou shalt not take a wife for my son of the daughters of the Canaanites." In Moses and in Nehemiah we read again of the prohibition of mixed marriages and foreign wives, based undoubtedly on a realization that they would endanger the pure worship of Jehovah. Abraham himself had had a bitter experience in his own life with Hagar the Egyptian.

How many of our young people realize that a common faith in Christ is essential to the happiest marriage? How many know that even today mixed marriages with people of widely divergent faith result in frequent discord and divorce? The views of strict Catholics and earnest Protestants are so diverse that only the most remarkable devotion and wisdom can avoid future trouble.

(3) She must be willing to cast her lot utterly with her husband and with all his enterprises and affairs. Abraham seems to have had a dread of Isaac, the gentle and easy-going, returning to the old lands and associations and giving up his father's great pioneering venture. He wanted no wife for his son who would draw him aside from his purposes and plans. She must be a true and unselfish helper, not a drag nor a damper upon his future.

Thus Abraham planned, not bartering his children's birthright for an alliance with the wealthy and corrupt aristocracy of Canaan, not seeking to use Isaac to buttress his own safety or position, but insisting upon securing for him a mate of good family and high ideals, of unselfish character and religious training. Are Christian parents succeeding in our harder tasks of instilling these principles into the minds and hearts of our boys and girls, who make their matrimonial ventures for themselves?

Eliezer's Wisdom and Shrewdness

Eliezer realized the importance of his journey into Mesopotamia. The earnestness of his master's words found response in his own heart. He decided that the marriage of his master's son was important enough to pray about. He besought God's guidance. Since marriage is one of the two most important steps in life, do our young Christians make of their choices and decisions a matter of earnest prayer? If not, why not, since marriage makes or mars the life of most?

Then came Eliezer's prudent method of choice. He did not get the Aramean girls on parade and choose the most beautiful, either in raiment or features. Neither did he secretly inquire for the richest or even the most talented. He waited outside the city at the well, to catch the maidens under the most natural circumstances of every-day life with a view to choosing the most helpful, the most hospitable, the most courteous! He would choose the one who would not only give the stranger to drink but would also water his camels unasked! Not beauty, not wealth, but helpfulness and kindness were his tests. He wanted a helpmate for his master's son.

It is indeed unfortunate that many a modern marriage is based on acquaintance under the more artificial circumstances of social life, at the dance and at the theatre and at the vacation resort, rather than in the home, on the farm or in the shop. Worse still are those worldly unions that are based on financial or social standards without regard to character and congeniality. On the other hand, no truly religious mind would ask of God arbitrary signs or guidance in a matter where the common sense of Eliezer was sufficient to guide him even in choosing for another, and that one of supreme importance.

The Romance of a Helpful Girl

We are apt to exaggerate the passive quality of the Hebrew girl's part in this matter. If she went to an unknown bridegroom, why, for that matter he received an unknown bride. Here, however, we see her engaged in free conversation with the messenger, and manifesting both hospitality and initiative in the matter of his errand. Eliezer believed himself to have been providentially led, and so stated clearly in his proposition to Rebekah's family. Every true lover believes that providence brought him and his beloved together, no matter what may have been the outward agencies in their first meeting.

Rebekah was fully informed and consulted by her family. She was asked if she was willing to make this great adventure, to follow the stranger into the new land. The brave girl instantly decided to go. What an all-important answer it is that every young woman who is sought in marriage must make! Happy is she if she believes that God's leading is in the matter, and can go upon the new pathway in joyous hope and romantic expectation. How tender and beautiful is the close of our story when Isaac claimed his God-sent bride in the tender glow of an Oriental sunset on the plains. "And she became his wife, and he loved her."

We need the primitive faith that God is with us in all life's choices and affairs. There was no church in Rebekah's day, but an abounding sense of God's presence and care. That spirited girl was blessed as she went about the common tasks of drawing water and tending camels. The same God watched over her in the romance of her youth and guided her in the great decision of her marriage. In him we live and move and have our being. Blessed are they that put their trust in him.

This Rim-Klinch Patch Beats Blowout Troubles

There are times when a man would gladly give $50 to get a Miller Rim-Klinch Patch—that is when he's miles from nowhere, or when service stations are closed as they are so much of the time nowadays. Anyone can insert this patch easily and quickly between the tube and casing where a blowout occurs. It enables a car to continue its trip without further injury to casing, tube or rim.

So take precaution today against being stranded by blow-outs by putting the Miller Rim-Klinch Patch in your tool kit.

The wide fabric wings on the sides Miller Rim-Klinch are firmly held between the rim and tire. The bead holds the patch securely. And will answer in almost any emergency.

It is also a good idea to carry the Miller Hook-Hold Tire Boot to use with the Rim-Klinch Patch in case of large blow-outs cuts in your tire casings.

Standard type Stake Body on the same Reo chassis

The Famous Reo "Speed Wagon"—express with canopy top.

Chassis with Cab and Sills—ready to receive any type of body.

From A Hearse To A Hurry-Up Wagon

THIS REO "SPEED WAGON" chassis is adaptable to that wide range of usefulness.

THOUSANDS are already in use in high class funeral equipments while tens of thousands are serving in hundreds of different lines of commercial activity.

THE PREFERENCE FOR REOS among funeral directors is significant too—for in no other class of business is a silent, smooth-running motor and an absolutely dependable chassis so essential.

OF COURSE the greatest demand, by far, is for the two standard types of "Speed Wagons"—the familiar Stake Body and the popular Canopy Covered Express.

THESE TWO TYPES are adaptable to about seventy-five per cent of normal delivering and trucking.

FOR CITY, SUBURBAN and rural use, these types are ideal.

BUT WE DO SELL a large number of chassis equipped as shown below, with driver's cab and heavy wood sills only.

ON THESE SILLS you can mount any special type of body you may need or prefer for your own special service.

AND YOU CAN SECURE, from your Reo distributor, dimensions and full data so that your special body may be made and ready to mount in the hour that your Reo is delivered to you.

IN MANY CASES—in most cases in fact—the old body can be taken from your now obsolete horse-drawn truck and, with slight modifications, mounted on this Reo chassis.

WHEN THAT IS DONE you can feel confident that you have the sturdiest, most consistent, most dependable motor truck it is possible to procure.

FOR THE VERY WORDS Reo and Reliability are synonyms—and Reos have long been famous for their Low Upkeep.

THE ONLY CONCERN you need have is—can you get a Reo?

ONLY WAY is to see your Reo distributor at once, place your order and be in line for an early delivery.

TODAY won't be a minute too soon.

"X" Liquid will repair over 24,000 Radiator Leaks in 10 minutes

CAN you imagine 24,000 leaks in one radiator? It is entirely possible. The average radiator has more than 24,000 corners—each one liable to leak.

Suppose all the corners did leak at once—would you throw the radiator away and buy a new one? Or would you use "X" Liquid to repair every single leak and make the radiator as good as new—without taking it down?

What would a thrifty car owner do?

MOTORISTS often ask, "How can I repair my leaky radiator better and cheaper than by soldering it—and without choking the cooling system with cements, flaxseed meals or other 'dopes'?"

Investigation proves that "X" Liquid is the only scientific way to repair leaks without solder or welding—and without injury to the cooling system.

"X" is simply poured into the radiator. It mixes with the water—circulates freely throughout the cooling system—and finds every leak or crack. Then it flows through and turns to a solid right in the hole.

Whether you have one leak or twenty-four thousand—"X" Liquid will repair them all in 10 minutes. Whether these leaks are in the radiator, pump, motor head gaskets, connections or elsewhere—"X" Liquid makes a permanent repair.

The surest way to prevent future leaks from bothering you is to keep "X" Liquid constantly in the water.

"X" Prevents Rust and Scale

The easiest and most scientific method of keeping the cooling system free from Rust and Scale is to use "X" Liquid. The same "X" that repairs and prevents leaks also loosens Rust and Scale. And with "X" in the water no new Rust or Scale can form.

The result is a RUSTPROOF, SCALEPROOF cooling system—a cooler, better-working engine—plus a saving of oil, gas and a reduction in upkeep costs.

Questions and Answers

J. W. B. There are many good people who hold that a tenth of one's income should be set aside for the Lord's work. Under the ancient Jewish economy, tithing was regulated by a code of laws which were amplified and made still more complex by the rabbis; but under Christianity the supreme law of love has been substituted, and is applicable to the tithing problem quite as well as to others. We are to give as God has prospered us, and from a generous and loving heart. An offering we do not feel, and which is simply of our surplus, is a gift of comparatively little worth, no matter how large the sum, while one that involves self-denial and even sacrifice, given with a cheerful heart, is rewarded with blessing. The spirit in which we give is what counts. Contributions to the Red Cross and Armenian relief certainly come within the category of gifts for the Lord's work. To succor the poor, heal the sick and help the helpless is not only a Christian's duty, but his blessed privilege. There is nothing more sorely needed just now than that sort of charity, and we should do all of it we can.

A. S., Washington, D. C. "I notice the articles in the Christian Herald on the subject of the union of the various Protestant denominations, which induce me to submit the following observations on the subject. If all the members of the several denominations could be induced to unite under one name, it would be something to rejoice over, indeed. And yet I fail to see just how Christ's Kingdom could be advanced any more rapidly, for all who truly believe in Christ now are in one and the same spiritual church. If all denominations were merged into one there would necessarily have to be many separate church buildings or meeting places in all large cities to accommodate the people, and each one would have some sort of independent management or government, very much as now exists. Each one, I believe, would feel disposed to control its own affairs; and in this way there might be as great a diversity of government as is found among churches today. Men, so long as they are mortal, will differ in matters of religion as they now differ on questions political, and people will do better work when they are permitted to work in their own way. I am not sure that friendship would be stronger among men in a united church than it is now among real Christians in the several denominations. In some places the pastors of all Protestant churches meet together and confer as to the best methods to be adopted to reach the people and get them interested in vital Christianity. This is all they could do were the churches merged under one name."

A. R., S. D. The figures of speech employed in Ecclesiastes 12 are Oriental in their nature. "The keepers of the house" are the limbs that protect the body; the "grinders" are the teeth, which decay in age; "those that look out of the window" are the eyes; the lips are "the doors"; the vocal cords are the "daughters of music"; the almond tree refers to the whitening of the hair, which has a likeness to the almond tree with its white blossoms; the "grasshopper" is a type of the dried up, shriveled human form in age; "desire shall fail" is the cessation of appetite, and the "long home" and the mourners typify the end of life.

S. M. H., Baltimore, Md. The passage, "hope against hope," is found in a poem by Montgomery, entitled "The World Before the Flood." The precise language has no parallel, but there are many expressions that convey the same meaning. Pope wrote: "Hope springs eternal in the human breast," and Psalm 146: 5 conveys the same idea when it says that when all other expectations fail, one's hope is still in God. Paul, in Rom. 5: 4 and I Cor. 13: 13, makes hope one of the chief Christian virtues.

Mrs. S. B. B., Benton Harbor, Mich. The distinction drawn in I John 5: 16-17 is that while intercession in prayer for one who is a sinner but "not unto death" is in harmony with God's will, it is presumptuous to intercede for one who has sinned against the Holy Ghost (Mark 3: 29).

Mrs. C. C., Jersey City, N. J. Elijah or Elias, according to Jewish tradition, was the son of Eleazar, a priest. He was a Gileadite. He was one of the three who appeared at the transfiguration, and many Jews believed he was reincarnate in John the Baptist. Bible authorities differ on this point, however. John was of priestly race by both parents, and in force of character and fearlessness in rebuking sin he was another Elijah, but he declared emphatically that he was not Elijah (John 1: 21).

J. B., Milwaukee, Wis. The "book of the generation" is a purely Jewish expression. Every Jewish household kept a careful chronological table. The genealogy in Matthew 1 is that of Joseph only, and not of Mary, and it is there stated that Joseph was only the legal and not the natural father of the Saviour. Matthew traces the descent of the legal father from David. If you will contrast this with the genealogy of Mary, as found in Luke, you will see that both genealogies trace the descent of Jesus through his legal father and his actual mother from David, thus establishing the line upon which all the Jewish hopes of the Messiah centered.

S. D., Chicago, Ill. Daniel, second son of King David, born of Abigail, lived about 1051 B.C. The priest Daniel of the tribe of Ithamar (Ezra 8: 2) lived about 459 B.C., and is probably identical with the Daniel who joined in the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. 10: 6). He was called a "son of Ithamar" in the sense of being a priest of that family. Ithamar was the youngest son of Aaron, and was consecrated to the priesthood, as were his descendants for many generations.

F. G. M., Corvallis, Ore., and I. A. H., Topeka, Ind. The time to discuss a Christian's duty as to the war has long passed. The Bible is true, and the Bible is to be followed. How do you think Joshua, Gideon, David and other Old Testament saints felt about it? Do you suppose they did not know of the commandment "Thou shalt not kill"? They do not appear to have found any difficulty in reconciling their duty with it, neither did Samuel nor Elijah. Men like Washington, Havelock and Chinese Gordon were conscientious men and eminent Christians, yet they went to war without compunction. War is the outcome of evil, but it is capable of being transformed into an agency for good. The Lord can make even "the wrath of man to praise Him"—that is, to bring the divine purposes to pass.

Viola H., Elizabeth, N. J. We have answered the same question you ask several times lately in the Mail-Bag.

Emily Paret Atwater sends us the following witty and patriotic "weekly calendar":
On Monday I knit; and on Tuesday I flit
To a lecture on Food Conservation.
On Wednesday I sew on pajamas to go
To the men who must fight for the nation.
On Thursday, alas! is my Surgical Class.
And although 'tis the servant's day out,
Home duties and food should never obtrude
On a labor so truly devout.
On Friday I go to a Benefit Show
For our soldiers at home and afar.
On Saturday, tired, yet thrilled and inspired,
I sit through a talk on the War.
On Sunday, in bed (ice-bag to my head),
With a household morose and chaotic,
Though the children need tending, and stockings need mending,
Thank the Lord I am still patriotic!

Mr. W. J. Richardson sends a contribution of ten dollars ($10) for the Bowery Mission as a memorial gift to show his regard for the late publisher of the Christian Herald, Mr. Otto Koenig, who was one of the trustees of the Mission and most actively interested in its work.

Mrs. G. E. B., Tallulah, La. Any large dealer of junk in the city near you would, no doubt, buy waste paper from you. Write to Mr. A. D. Naylor, secretary of the American Paper and Pulp Association, 18 East Forty-first Street, New York City, and to the Waste Trade Journal, 150 Lafayette Street, New York City, asking for a list of dealers in your locality.

Mrs. J. M., Baltimore, Md. There has been a regulation made by army officials that no packages can be sent to soldiers abroad, unless accompanied by an order of their commanding officer, or an official of no less than major in rank.

Mrs. M. V., Ohio. There is no provision made by the government for the burial of the widows of soldiers. Some states, however, make an allowance for such a purpose. Definite information can be obtained from your Secretary of State at the state capital.

Miss M. E., Reddick, Fla. There is no reason why mail should not reach the boys "over there," especially if the full name, company and regiment, and American Expeditionary Forces are given on the letters sent abroad. However, there is a great congestion of mail for the soldiers abroad, and we have been informed that the War Department, General Pershing, and the Post Office Department are doing their very best to relieve this congestion as speedily as possible.

What Your Liberty Bond Will Do

IF you buy a $100 bond of the Fourth Liberty Loan you are lending the United States Government enough money to feed a soldier in France a little more than seven months. Or you have furnished enough money to give him a complete outfit of winter and summer clothing, including shoes and stockings, and slicker, and overcoat and blankets, with enough left over to arm him with a good revolver. You have done that much to beat back the Hun.

It takes $35 more to arm him with a rifle with a bayonet on it, and if you buy a second $100 bond you furnish him this rifle and 1,000 cartridges for it; and there will still be enough of your money left to purchase a good-sized bomb to throw in a dugout, or demolish a machine-gun together with the Huns operating it.

Marion Harland's Corner

Dip Into Our Letter-Box

It stands invitingly open at my elbow. Some gaps are left by letters to which answers have gone by mail. The larger number shall be shared with constituents, as is but just and fair to those who help make the Corner what it is long to offer to those we would serve. A community of interests, an exchange of benefits. It is a continual satisfaction to myself to note the steady growth of this spirit among active members—those who tell of what has been useful to themselves, of experiments in new lines of housewifery, their successes and their failures. Many are communications from those who seek comfort, advice and sympathy under the pressure of failure and ignorance. The Corner is the common meeting-ground for both classes.

THE first letter that comes to hand today is not yet out of season, although the subject brought forward was treated exhaustively months ago. It is good reading at any time:

Years ago, when I lived in the city, I put my garbage in an old pan, dried it in the oven, and used it to help build my fire. The rinds of oranges and grapefruit are fine to kindle with when dried. Now, I find a new use for the orange. On a farm one would suppose that such as you would put in a flowerbed, is pitiful. So it is, but when you are not the owner, you learn that dirt is valuable. Last summer I put all my waste, which isn't much, in a family of one, in an old galvanized tub, set it out a bottom, set it in a corner of the yard under an old bush, put everything in it—eggshells, coffee grounds, etc.—and, once a while, sprinkled a shovelful of wood ashes over it. When it was full I placed a slab of food over it, and when I made my flower bed this was my compost, and my flowers look as they had grown in the tropics.

One Way to Cook Cold Potatoes

Cut them in slices, then hash them fine; add a little nice sweet dripping in a frying-pan when it is very hot put in potatoes, add them level, season, sprinkle with a little chopped parsley, and when nicely brown fold over and serve on a platter.

Other way: Put some milk in a pan; a piece of butter, salt and pepper; crumble a little stale bread; let it come to a boil; add hashed potatoes; cook thoroughly. When they are not too dry, an egg may be stirred in when they are nearly done.—ALEXANDER.

YOUR next letter is from one of the second class alluded to a while ago. Colored orators used to describe you as "seekers." I am glad to be able to meet her wishes by a recipe of my own. If there be a better in the hands of any member, will she oblige us by sending it in?

Will you please inquire of the members of the Corner for a recipe for making a pickling vinegar for sweet pickles? The cucumber pickle is not yet quite over, and I find it best to pack the cucumbers directly into a jar, having soaked them for three days previously in salt water, pouring over them a new supply, each morning, and at last covering with the cold vinegar.—ALICE M. R. (Co.).

Vinegar for Sweet Pickles

Each quart of vinegar allow a cupful of brown sugar; eight whole cloves; eight whole black peppercorns; six allspice (whole) and six blades of mace. If you fancy the flavor very (as is probable), add a tablespoonful of fennel seed to two quarts of the vinegar. Allow a minced onion of medium size to two quarts of the vinegar. Consult your own taste with regard to these last-named ingredients. Bring the seasoned vinegar to a boil in a closed pot, and cook slowly for an hour. Put while hot, into heated glass jars or wide-mouthed bottles, and keep closely covered until you are ready to put up your pickles.

CORNERITE sends from California a recipe for old-fashioned Scotch broth:

Never before have I ventured to write to you but recently I read with interest the (S. call sent out by John's Wife, asking for recipe for Scotch Broth, wherewith to better "guldman," who was doubtless longing for the "kind mother used to make" in the old Scotland.

Here is my recipe. It has helped to raise my own children and seventeen grandchildren who are all alive and hearty: one and one-half pounds of shin-beef, one cup of peas, one or fresh, one-half cup of rice, one-half cup barley, soup vegetables: carrot, turnip, leek, celery and parsley. Salt and pepper to taste.

This makes a pot of broth sufficient for six people. If dried peas are used, soak over night in cold water; doubtless John remembers seeing the peas steeping in winter for the Scotch broth.

Perhaps it might help beginners if I were to give the mode of cooking this. Wash meat well; put in a large pot and cover with cold water; add barley, rice, and peas (if dried previously soaked over night); bring slowly to the boiling point and simmer slowly for two hours. Cut up soup-vegetables in small pieces, add and simmer for another hour, add salt and pepper to taste.

The late Queen Victoria was very fond of Scotch broth, and always had it on the table at Balmoral.—MARTHA S. (California).

In your enumeration of the fruits, etc., which we ought to bestir ourselves to put up now against winter and scarcity of material for preserves, you omitted apple butter. As comparatively indifferent fruit may be saved for future use in this way—and later in the season—will you be so kind as to give us a recipe for making it? I recollect eating it in West Virginia when I was a child, and how good it was when spread upon my bread-and-butter!—ELEANOR N. C. (Maryland).

I THANK you for calling my attention to the omission, and cheerfully bring forth a recipe:

Apple Butter

Boil cider down to two-thirds of the original quantity. Into this, when it is lukewarm, turn as many peeled and sliced apples as the liquid will cover, and simmer, stirring often from the bottom and beating with a wooden spoon or ladle until the apples are very tender. When the first supply of apples is soft and broken to pieces, strain them out into a bowl and return the cider to the fire. Into this put more pared and sliced apples, and cook in like fashion, relay after relay, until the cider is all absorbed. Stir all together in a great jar and set aside for twelve hours. Then return to the fire and cook slowly until you have a soft brown mass of equal consistency throughout. It keeps best if put up in airtight, self-sealing cans while hot.

The cooks of a half-century ago kept their apple butter all winter, packed away in stone jars when cold, laying muslin, cut to fit the jar, over the surface of the "soft brown mass," and pouring melted (not hot) lard half an inch thick upon the cloth.

Some time ago I asked you to give names of all substitutes for good butter. Please let this be the price of my perfect method of cooking rice—even the hardest—with no waste. Always use exactly three times as much water as rice. Look over carefully and wash in one water, only, over night. Drain off and spread on a granite plate to dry. Cook in a double boiler, just as you would breakfast food. When the rice has absorbed all the water, take it off; remove the cover, and set on the back of the range a few minutes to dry. Dish it hot. It is good with brown gravy or butter! I no longer have to use Japan rice as softest for a weak stomach. Try this recipe!—HARRIET L. K. (Illinois).

A list of "butter substitutes" was not given in the Corner because it is against rules to advertise here proprietary (i.e., patented) articles. Keep your eyes and ears open and select one from the many advertised substitutes—or such as are recommended by friends who have used and found satisfactory certain of the number.

WE accept your rice recipe, then, as a free gift, and gratefully. Others are in our letter-box, which will appear as soon as we can make room for them. I slip in one now that may interest you:

To Boil Rice

Put the rice in a vessel, and cover about half an inch deep with cold water. Have about equal quantities of rice and water. When the water has boiled out, set the vessel at the back of the range and steam dry. Never stir while cooking it. The grains should fall apart. The colored cooks like an iron pot, and let the outer portion of the rice form a hard cake. They are very fond of it, but it is a wasteful way of cooking rice. I am so sorry for cooks who are struggling with rice problems that, although far from well, I must write this!—MARIA H. P. (North Carolina).

Locality and experience should have qualified you to advise us with regard to the aforesaid problem. The hard outer crust is a novelty to me, and, I fancy, to other Cornerites.

We are your debtors!

Salt Mackerel

Direct from the Fishing Boats to You

Old Gloucester

Your pail is ready—fat, meaty, juicy mackerel—send no money—try the fish first.

Frank E. Davis PRESIDENT

It's thirty-four years, come next September, since I began supplying the choicest of Gloucester's famous mackerel direct to the homes of families throughout the country.

Our Own Home Kind

People here in Gloucester, the leading fish port of America, laughed at me when I began to sell mackerel by mail. They didn't realize how hard it is for other people to get good fish. But I did. So I decided to make it easy for everybody, everywhere, to have full-flavored, wholesome fish, the kind we pick for our own eating here at Gloucester. 85,000 families are buying from us today.

Fishmen for Generations

You see, I know fish. My folks, way back, have always been fishermen. They helped found Gloucester in 1623. My boyhood days were spent aboard fishing boats. Catching fish, knowing the choicest and picking 'em out, cleaning and curing them the right way, has been my life's job.

Thirty Years' Development

Today our business is housed in a modern, four-story, concrete building, with 20,000 square feet of floor space; fitted with the most improved and sanitary equipment for cleaning and packing fish. Standing at the water's edge, the fishermen's catches are brought right into the building. They go to your table with "the tang of the sea" in them.

Such a Good Breakfast!

A fat, tender, juicy Davis' Mackerel broiled to a sizzling brown; some butter, a sprinkling of pepper, a touch of lemon, if you wish—how good it smells, how tempting it looks, how it tickles the palate, and, oh, how it satisfies!—the favorite breakfast dish of thousands.

Fall Mackerel, Fat and Tender

Most of the fish your dealer can buy are Spring fish, thin, dry, and tasteless. What I've selected for you are Fall fish, juicy and fat with the true salty-sea mackerel flavor. We clean and wash them before weighing. You pay only for net weight. No heads and no tails. Just the white, thick, meaty portions—the parts that make the most delicious meal imaginable. You probably have never tasted salt mackerel as good as mine.

Send No Cash—Try the Mackerel First

I want you to know before you pay that my fish will please you. If there is any possibility of a risk, I want it to be at my expense. Just mail the coupon today, and I'll ship at once a pail of my mackerel containing 10 fish, each fish sufficient for 3 or 4 people, all charges prepaid, so that your family can have a real Gloucester treat Sunday morning. Then—if my mackerel are not better than any you have ever tasted, send back the rest at my expense. If you are pleased with them—and I'm sure you will be—send me $4.90, and at the same time ask for "Descriptive List of Davis' Fish," sold only direct, never to dealers.

Remember: Meat, flour, potatoes, everything has gone way up in price. In comparison, Davis' mackerel is low. An economical food—so good to eat, so nutritious! The "Sea Food Cook Book" that goes with the fish will tell you just how to prepare them.

Mail the coupon now with your business card, letterhead or reference.

DEGRADED TO THE RANKS

The True Story of a Man's Redemption

He was a captain in the British Army. Before his fellow officers, his shoulder straps were torn away. Many a man who had gone that black road before him, had gone steadily down to oblivion and despair.

But he was a man of sterner metal and in the burning cauldron of this great conflict he found a way to climb back from despair—until now he is back again in his high place.

What he did and how he did it is just one of the

OVER 200 TRUE STORIES OF THE GREAT WAR

Real experiences of real people—written to the music of guns. From out of the holocaust of nations, the high, unbreakable spirit of man leaps forth in story after story.

For these 200 stories all the smoking, shrieking battle-fronts of the war have been ransacked. In these volumes, the theories, the practice, the prophecies of war have no place.

Here you will find the story of a man and his courage—a woman and her sacrifice—a courtesan and her treachery—a spy and his intrigue—a little child and his inspiration—and on and on for 200 stories—2000 pages—of life and death.

The Wine of Eager Life

For most of us duty lies here, far from the places where men live whole lives in a day. But in these volumes is your chance to get away from bread and butter every day and drink the wine of eager life that these men and women pour forth before you.

For in these pages the doers, the fighters, the workers of this war take you by the hand and lead you through trench and hospital, under the sea and through the air to some thrilling story of a human heart and soul. These 200 tales of valor, daring and beauty promise that the human race today is climbing through suffering and despair to new heights.

Why This Edition is Given Away

We feel that volumes like these, with so important a message, should not be sold, but should be given away, as far as possible. Therefore, as long as we can, we will give these sets free to those who read the Christian Herald and the Review of Reviews. We should like to make this a permanent offer, but the price of paper is going so high that we do not know what another edition will cost us. As long as this first lasts you can have your set free.

This nation has stepped out of its swaddling clothes. It has, in a day, towered above the rest of the world. Today we have our hands on the money—the trade of the world. And the American citizen must grow tall with his nation. You must touch the ends of the world with the fingers of your mind.

You should have the Review of Reviews—that daily, hourly feels the pulse of all the world. Now, as never before, you need Frank H. Simonds' crystal-clear, month-by-month articles on military operations of the war. You need, more than ever, Dr. Shaw's world-wide understanding of affairs.

YOURS FREE You have only to sign the order blank below, if you are prompt, to get the six volumes to examine, without obligation or expense, except a stamp. Do not let this chance go by without seeing what it is.

For besides thrilling you beyond any reading you have had before, 15 minutes spent each day with these stories will soon make your newspaper reading, your magazine reading and your conversation vastly more interesting and profitable—will bring you face to face with the greatest historical episode in human annals.

REVIEW OF REVIEWS

For 25 Years the Greatest Monthly Newspaper. $3.00 a Year.

THE Review of Reviews is the world's greatest monthly newspaper. Its editor, Dr. Albert Shaw, has for 25 years been foremost in interpreting lucidly and authoritatively the month's history and personalities to the American public.

In the present year particularly, Mr. Frank H. Simonds has given the magazine a new distinction as a reporter of the war's current history.

Mr. Simonds is nothing less than a genius in giving his brilliant yet simply drawn word pictures of the movements of the greatest war in history. Do not miss the Review of Reviews this year.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A METHODIST missionary in India told a few months ago in the Missionary News of a room set apart at the mission for intercessory prayer. Into this room the workers went by ones and twos and groups to intercede for those whom they were seeking to lead to Christ and to seek for their own heart a deeper work of grace. After some weeks of this intercession a single Sunday evening saw almost 300 men and women crowding the altar rail, seeking salvation through Christ.

A few years ago we knew a sweet-faced, soft-voiced woman whose home seemed a safe haven from every care. Her own children cared little to spend the evening away, and their friends loved to crowd the house. Everybody had such a good time there. It wasn't so much what was done or said as the spirit of love and good fellowship which brooded there. Upstairs was a chamber which the family called the prayer room. If a son were willful, mother would suggest a few minutes there; if a daughter were rebellious, or if either son or daughter came home with heart torn over some rough contact with the world, the prayer room was the remedy. Mother sought it often and father made many quiet trips up the stairs. And from that quiet sanctuary in the home with its open Bible and its moments of communion with Him whose love is unmeasured, came a power and a spirit which glorified that home and made it a beacon of light in the lives of scores of young people, many of whom perhaps, never knew its secret.

Miss L. A. P. sends a letter from a prisoner and requests the prayers of the League in his behalf. He professes belief in Christ and declares his intention to engage in prison reform work after his release.

Mrs. T. A. N. requests prayers for her dear boy, who, though unsaved, has joined the host that has gone forth to fight the battle for the liberty of the world.

S. R. writes: "I had prayed to our Lord for a worry to be lifted from me, and promised him I would publish it in the Christian Herald, and he has almost completely taken it away. I am still praying, and feel that in a short time it will all be gone."

Mrs. W. S. G. asks the prayers of God's children for her dear son, thirty-seven years old, who has been afflicted with epilepsy for many years. He is a Christian man, and his mother begs the prayers of the League in his behalf.

A Reader, who praises God for answered prayer for another, now asks the intercession of the Prayer League for a dear son who is suffering under an undeserved calumny, and who asks, "Does it pay to be good?"

A. K. asks prayers for the salvation of her aged father, who is without God.

Mrs. G. asks the prayers of the League that God may manifest his power in the bodily healing of her only daughter.

Mrs. A. T. M. and her invalid husband ask the prayers of God's people for a dear son, who is disobedient and untruthful, besides being a slave to the tobacco habit.

Mrs. L. H. H. acknowledges that a special prayer has been answered by her heavenly Father.

M. L. D. earnestly prays for bodily healing and more physical strength; also that her mother may recover fully from the effects of a surgical operation.

C. M. D. B. writes of an answer to prayer concerning one of the seemingly trivial things of life, rightly believing that while our heavenly Father guides the destinies of nations, there is nothing too small for his loving care.

A. H. finds the many direct answers to her many prayers "too wonderful for words," and she praises God for the "help from above for our army in France."

F. H., inclosing a thank offering tells of the great help he has always received when he asked in faith for anything which accorded with the divine will. He asks the prayers of the League that he may be successful in his college courses and in his plans to enter the navy in the service of his country.

The requests for prayer for personal blessing take many different forms; and them M. M. M. asks that she may have assurance of sins forgiven; six that faith may be strengthened; Mrs. T. R. K., that she may have the peace which passeth all understanding; Mrs. E. L., for comfort in her hour of sorrow; Mrs. M. R. T., that she may receive God's richest spiritual and temporal blessing and be a devoted mother to my eight children; Mrs. T., that God will fill me with his Holy Spirit and give me joy and peace in his love; H. I. M. and S. A. H. ask help to overcome terrible conflicts with temptations; J. B., that I and mine may be drawn closer together each day; Miss G. H., that I may be spiritually blessed and strengthened.

In the seventeen requests for blessings others there are eight asking prayers for boys in camp or those already "Over There" that they may be kept from temptation, become Christians and be returned to their homes after the war; Special prayer is asked by a Mother who has received a telegram from the government saying her son is missing. She fears he is fallen into German hands, and she asks for spiritual help in her hour of sorrow; M. W. G., that a son who lately entered the ministry may be wonderfully blessed in his work; M. M., that children may be blessed and not yield to surrounding temptations; Vernon, Texas, that God will relieve, help and bless the people of this town and speedily send rain to the drought-stricken land; also pray for Mrs. whose daughter-in-law is trying to rob a Miss S. B. asks prayers for two children: a paralyzed woman; also for herself, as has much to do in this world; A Mother, that God may be with my two sons in their undertakings, bless them spiritually; temporarily, keep them in peace and let I dwell in their hearts.

Seventeen ask for financial aid, among them Mrs. M. C., that a dear one may find a better home; J. A. S. asks for this aid so that she may help promote the Lord's work; that she may grow more like him; Mrs. H. that she may get her share of the farm, that is all she can depend upon with which to educate her children; G. T., that God open a way financially, or otherwise make possible to visit friends in Indiana this year.

A Reader asks that a minister may be sent to her town this coming year, and that may be fully consecrated to his work; J. C. that a church recently organized may be led by God toward the uplift of the fall; Mrs. W. A. T., that a fallen church may be uplifted and that the people may wake; N. J. C., that a church which has just been organized may succeed; F. R., that God bless our church and send it a dear pastor; Mrs. I. K., that the community may be interested in the church and that we may be able to secure a resident pastor, who will be useful and influential, so that he will do great and much-needed work.

Revivals and reforms are asked for in following places: Hamlin, Texas; Baptist Church, Russellville, Pa.; Pine Grove, B. C., Canada; in the Church at Van Horn, Iowa; Friendship, N. Y.; Rosedale, W. Va.; all over the world; Hubbard, Minn.; Waco, Texas; C. J. H., that all Scholastic County, N. Y., may remain dry.

A few of the fifty-seven miscellaneous requests are as follows:

Eight ask that the desire of their hearts may be granted; three that trouble of various kinds may be removed; for an evangelist and his wife who are trying hard to win souls for Christ; John E. S., to keep true to my Creator, that I may have strength to stand for what is right and true, and also that I may be able to serve my country; that my older son at college may see his way clear to a profession, and that his country needs him for the service he is to be kept in the Spirit; several ask for relief from mental burdens, especially a Reader that she may be delivered from a heavy mental stress which she can neither explain nor understand; that a young man about to enter college may retain his lovely character, be kept from all evil; for word from a loved one who is away but not located; that a daughter may control her temper; for peace of the world (God grant it may come soon!); that Texas may have rain; A Subscriber, that people who are at enmity with my father may return and be friends again; forgiving all wrongs that may have been done; for a speedy victory for the Allies for the success of a friend in business; that stolen property may be returned; A Reader asks "that God may make clear to me what I am saved, also for the salvation of my nephew"; "Believer" asks for bodily healing; and that a young man who was not accepted for the army may find a position where he can be a help to his mother and to his country.

I Want You To Know Me

I'm Del Dane, "The Old Stove Master"

I Am Smashing Prices, Cutting New Paths, Solving Heating Problems. Write and Get My New Catalog. I'll Save You Big Money

I guess I know the heating problem. It isn't for nothing they call me "the old master of stove builders." I began as a boy in a stove foundry—grew up—put on long pants—went on the road to sell stoves.

As a young man I got an idea. Pretty near the whole of America knows the story of "A Kalamazoo Direct to You." Three million people warm their toes in winter by stoves made in my big factories or in houses heated by my furnaces.

Three hundred thousand people have bought right direct from my factory at wholesale prices. I've saved them lots of money. I'll save money for you.

You aren't interested in my history. I know that. Maybe you don't care to hear how I worked out my big plan. How I went from door to door talking to women and men about their heating problem.

How I got capital interested, built big factories and built up also the most complete organization of brainy men to handle heating problems the world ever knew. Perhaps you aren't interested in all this. Here is something you are interested in:

I'm Making a Country-Wide Price Drive on Kalamazoo Stoves and Furnaces. Let Me Have Your Name and Address That's All I Want. I Want to Show You. Here's My Big Free Book. Let Me Send It to You and Give You My

Germany's Peace Plea Denied

President Wilson's Reply to Chancellor Prince Maximilian's Note—Rumors of the Kaiser's Abdication—The Great Retreat Continues

GERMANY is fighting a double battle; one, the hopeless struggle against the Allies, who are driving her routed legions on all the fronts; the other at home, where she is facing the sternest of all judgments that can befall a government which has wilfully led a nation to its ruin.

Toward the close of the second week in October, the situation, both on the western front and in the Netherlands, was ominous for the Kaiser. His armies, thrown back at all points, continued the great retreat, leaving many thousands in dead, wounded and prisoner. Cambrai, one of the strongest fortified cities on which the integrity of the German defense depended, was taken by assault, with 8000 prisoners and many guns, by General Haig's forces, on the very day when Prince Maximilian, the German Chancellor, submitted his peace note through the Swiss ambassador in Washington to our government, which note was promptly answered by President Wilson. The President's reply to the German bid for peace is printed on this page.

On October 9 and 10, rumors of the Kaiser's abdication were current in several European capitals, indicating his fourth son, August Wilhelm, as his probable successor. These rumors were circulated in the Rhine cities several days before they were printed in Stockholm and London. It was added that the Kaiser was suffering from neurasthenia at Potsdam, and that General von Ludendorff was virtually administrator of the empire in the emergency. Up to the time of this issue going to press, the rumors had received no official confirmation.

Germany's condition in the field indicates the near approach of a military debacle. The mere remnants of thirty full Hun divisions (420,000 men), the Hindenburg line and all in their roar, are fleeing in panic on a 40-mile front on the Scarpe River and the Meuse, from south of St. Quentin to north of Cambrai. Their wild retreat is being followed closely by the Allies in force, with cavalry, armored motor cars and whippet tanks. Between Monday, October 7, and October 10, over 20,000 German prisoners had been captured by the Allies, and more than 250 guns and immense quantities of supplies. British, French and Americans are all taking part in the pursuit, smashing their way through the old Kriemhilde line and passing through many towns and villages now evacuated and left in smoking ruins by the defeated Huns.

PRINCE MAXIMILIAN, the new German Chancellor, in his speech to the Reichstag, in which he told of the sending of his note to President Wilson, implied quite strongly that if the Allies refused the proffered hand of peace, responsibility for the continued warfare would rest on their shoulders, and Germany would be unitedly resigned to fight on. The Kaiser also seemed to be preparing to appear before the world as having made a sincere offer which was rejected.

The German press did not receive the note with much kindness, looking upon it as a sign of weakness and apparently standing upon the former utterance of the Kaiser in which he had intimated that Germany would not make a humiliating peace. Germany, although she had humiliated Belgium, Serbia, Montenegro, Russia and Rumania, must herself not be humiliated! Keen students of diplomacy saw in the Chancellor's note to President Wilson a very skilful attempt to put the Allies in the apparent position of having refused a sincere offer of peace. President Wilson, in no way less acute than the most far-sighted, has in his note completely punctured the balloon of German intrigue, and has turned the hole which Germany had dug for the Allies around, with its mouth facing Deutschland. He is not willing to receive Germany's declaration of acceptance of America's terms as "a basis for discussion." He wants to be clear that Germany accepts the whole fourteen points with all their later elaborations absolutely, and in good faith, and that no negotiation is intended except that necessary to the application of the principles involved.

If the Chancellor should reply that Germany wished to discuss these principles but could not accept them as stated, the President, judging by the temper of the American and Allied press, public men and army leaders, could but reply that the Allied terms are unconditional surrender. If the Chancellor replies that Germany accepts the terms as stated, that amounts to unconditional surrender and involves the humiliation which German public opinion appears as yet unwilling to accept.

VIEWED in London as a desperate effort to escape disaster, the Chancellor's plea appears to have opened the door, not to escape, but to a short cut to the threatened debacle. One London correspondent transmitted the interesting suggestion that the most pungent

Text of President's Note to Germany

Department of State, WASHINGTON, D. C.
Oct. 8, 1918.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge, on behalf of the President, your note of Oct. 6, enclosing a communication from the German Government to the President, and I am instructed by the President to request you to make the following communication to the Imperial German Chancellor:

"Before making reply to the request of the Imperial German Government, and in order that that reply shall be as candid and straightforward as the momentous interests involved require, the President of the United States deems it necessary to assure himself of the exact meaning of the note of the Imperial Chancellor. Does the Imperial Chancellor mean that the Imperial German Government accepts the terms laid down by the President in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January last and in subsequent addresses, and that its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon the practical details of their application?"

"The President feels bound to say with regard to the suggestion of an armistice that he would not feel at liberty to propose a cessation of arms to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated against the Central Powers so long as the armies of those Powers are upon their soil. The good faith of any discussion would manifestly depend upon the consent of the Central Powers immediately to withdraw their forces everywhere from invaded territory."

"The President also feels that he is justified in asking whether the Imperial Chancellor is speaking merely for the constituted authorities of the Empire who have so far conducted the war. He deems the answer to these questions vital from every point of view."

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

reply that President Wilson might make to the Austro-German note would be merely to acknowledge its receipt, with the intimation that he had passed the communication on to Foch as the proper person to deal with the matter of an armistice. On the other hand, a correspondent writing from The Hague quoted the Kaiser as having stated that it could never be said that Germany had failed; that she had always wanted peace, but the Allies had refused it. This time, however, he felt that the Allies would find it hard to refuse. God would answer his prayers and the Allies would never dictate the terms of peace.

Among members of Congress the President's answer to Berlin was received with two distinct impressions. Senator Lodge, ranking Republican member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, was greatly disappointed that the President should enter into any discussion with the Imperial German Government "until they were ready and compelled to accept the terms we think it right to impose." He stood behind the President in his expressions in Baltimore when he said: "There is, therefore, but one response possible from us; force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world and cast every selfish dominion down in the dust."

Senator Hitchcock, of Nebraska, chairman of this committee, considered the President's preliminary answer well calculated to develop the situation, since it would prevent Germany from disguising the real issue. These two expressions represented the attitude of most of the members of Congress. Some were inexorably for a demand for unconditional surrender, while others saw the wisdom of the President directed like a rapier thrust straight at the fabric of German pretense.

Among the leading journals of the country the same marked division of views appeared.

THE President's third question, in which he asked the German Chancellor for whom he was speaking, was held by many of the papers to be the kernel of the whole communication, since the President had repeatedly declared, as late as September 27, in New York, that he could not deal with the present leaders of Germany. Speaking at that time he declared:

We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the Governments of the Central Empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other Governments that were parties to this struggle at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest. They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We cannot come to terms with them. They have made it impossible. The German people must by this time be fully aware that we cannot accept the word of those who have forced this war upon us. We do not think the same thoughts or speak the same language of agreement.

GERMANY, pressed from all sides, with her Allies dropping from her, her armies beaten and her population on the verge of revolt, made haste to answer the three questions of President Wilson. The Kaiser was reported to have called a council of the rulers of all the German States. The text of her reply was received by wireless on October 12, ahead of the official cabled version, and was as follows:

In reply to the questions of the President of the United States of America the German Government hereby declares: The German Government has accepted the terms laid down by President Wilson in his address of January the eighth and in his subsequent addresses on the foundation of a permanent peace of justice. Consequently its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon practical details of the application of these terms. The German Government believes that the governments of the Powers associated with the Government of the United States also take the position taken by President Wilson in his address.

The German Government, in accordance with the Austro-Hungarian Government, for the purpose of bringing about an armistice, declares itself ready to comply with the propositions of the President in regard to evacuation. The German Government suggests that the President may occasion the meeting of a mixed commission for making the necessary arrangements concerning the evacuation. The present German Government, which has undertaken the responsibility for this step toward peace, has been formed by conferences and in agreement with the great majority of the Reichstag. The Chancellor, supported in all his actions by the will of this majority, speaks in the name of the German Government and of the German people.

President Wilson was attending a benefit for blind French soldiers at the Metropolitan Opera House in consultation with the heads of the other Allied nations and with Secretary Lansing, Secretary Baer, just home from France, and Colonel House, but there was no intimation as to the nature of his probable action until the afternoon of the fourteenth when his reply to Germany was made public.

President Wilson Speaks for Democracy

GERMANY asked for an armistice and for peace and it has its answer. Two days after the German note of October 12, the reply of President Wilson was transmitted to that government. It is, in the highest sense, a remarkable document, probably without a parallel in the whole history of diplomatic intercourse. It tells the German government in language that has no possibility of being understood till there can be peace until Kaiserism has come to an end, and that an armistice will be granted until many ceases to use every law and usage of civilization by wantonly destroying defenseless towns and villages, deporting their helpless inhabitants and plundering, spoiling and despoiling all within reach, as she is now doing. Especially does it let Germany understand that her proposals of peace in not be entertained while her submarines are still sinking unarmed passenger ships and destroying the lifeboats in which their passengers and crews seek to save themselves.

Most important of all does he make it clear that America and the Allies will not treat the Kaiserism, and at the German nation itself, as a precedent to peace, as it in its power to render impotent its malignant despotism, which has till now controlled the destinies of Germany and overriden the people's will. The President also repeats what he has said in former declarations regarding the indispensability of definite and satisfactory factory guarantees by Germany for the future. He declares, not only to be indispensable but the right of all the governments who are now fighting against Germany and her allies in the war.

These, in substance, are the essential features of this truly remarkable message which is the most momentous ever issued by any American President. It has the true note of victory and justice throughout, and expresses the righteous determination of the American people in regard to the war and its issues. We shall fight until German imperialism is compelled to yield, until German outrages and brutalities cease, and until Germany comes in unconditionally to lay down her arms, and, in the name of the German people, to pledge obedience to the laws of civilization and the conditions which the Allies may impose. This is an ultimatum which should hearten the whole country, and it will elicit unanimous approval. It sounds the downfall of Kaiserism, an event which we believe would be welcomed by the German people.

With regard to the armistice, the President makes it clear that the whole question of the process of evacuation and the conditions of an armistice must be left to "the judgment and advice of the military advisers of the United States and all the Allies"; and that an armistice can come until the other conditions outlined in the message are satisfactorily complied with.

It is a royal message—asserting the claims of right and justice, and freedom and liberty as opposed to the domination of tyranny, terrorism and brutality in the plainest terms. That this is the solemn determination of the United States is further made evident by the announcement by the President, the same evening, that our Government will continue to send 250,000 men to the front every month, and that there will be no relaxation of our efforts to make the final victory a conclusive one.

Department of State, Washington, Oct. 14, 1918.

Sir:

In reply to the communication of the German Government dated the 12th inst., which you handed me today, I have the honor to request you to transmit the following answer:

The unqualified acceptance by the present German Government and by a large majority of the German Reichstag of the terms laid down by the President of the United States of America in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January, 1918, and in his subsequent addresses justifies the President in making a frank and direct statement of his decision with regard to the communications of the German Government of the 8th and 12th of October, 1918.

It must be clearly understood that the process of evacuation and the conditions of an armistice are matters which must be left to the judgment and advice of the military advisers of the Government of the United States and the Allied Governments, and the President feels it his duty to say that no arrangement can be accepted by the Government of the United States which does not provide absolutely satisfactory safeguards and guarantees of the maintenance of the present military supremacy of the armies of the United States and of the Allies in the field. He feels confident that he can safely assume that this will also be the judgment and decision of the allied Governments.

The President feels that it is also his duty to add that neither the Government of the United States nor, he is quite sure, the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent will consent to consider an armistice so long as the armed forces of Germany continue the illegal and inhumane practices which they persist in.

At the very time that the German Government approaches the Government of the United States with proposals of peace, the submarines are engaged in sinking passenger ships at sea, and not the ships alone, but the very boats in which their passengers and crews seek to make their way to safety; and in their present enforced withdrawal from Flanders and France the German armies are pursuing a course of wanton destruction which has always been regarded as in direct violation of the rules and practices of civilized warfare. Cities and villages, if not destroyed, are being stripped of all they contain not only, but often of their very inhabitants. The nations associated against Germany cannot be expected to agree to a cessation of arms while acts of inhumanity, spoliation, and desolation are being continued which they justly look upon with horror and with burning hearts.

It is necessary, also, in order that there may be no possibility of misunderstanding, that the President should very solemnly call the attention of the Government of Germany to the language and plain intent of one of the terms of peace which the German Government has now accepted. It is contained in the address of the President delivered at Mount Vernon on the Fourth of July last. It is as follows:

The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or, if it cannot be presently destroyed, at least its reduction to virtual impotency.

The power which has hitherto controlled the German nation is of the sort here described. It is within the choice of the German nation to alter it. The President's words, just quoted, naturally constitute a condition precedent to peace, if peace is to come by the action of the German people themselves. The President feels bound to say that the whole process of peace will, in his judgment, depend upon the definiteness and the satisfactory character of the guarantees which can be given in this fundamental matter. It is indispensable that the Governments associated against Germany should know beyond a peradventure with whom they are dealing.

The President will make a separate reply to the Royal and Imperial Government of Austria-Hungary.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

(Signed)

ROBERT LANSING.

Mr. Frederick Oederlin, Charge d'Affaires of Switzerland, ad interim in charge of German interests in the United States.

New York City when the Associated Press received the text of the German reply. A draft of the reply was placed in his hands at once, but he made no comment upon it for publication.

OFFICIALS in Washington were reported as warning the country not to expect that peace would immediately ensue upon the consideration of this reply. In Germany the inspired press was reported as demanding, as a collateral move to Germany's evacuation of occupied territory, the evacuation of Germany's colonies by Allied forces. There also appeared in the German press a persistent refusal to consider the ceding of Alsace-Lorraine to France.

Several military writers in Entente Allied papers expressed the fear that Germany, by means of an armistice, would be able to get her army safely back of her frontier reorganized and refitted, and would then defy the Allies to go ahead with their peace program. The military men were all for giving Marshal Foch his head, and not tying him with any armistice, declaring that in the two or three weeks of fighting weather still remaining Foch might succeed in delivering the knockout blow which would make the imposition of peace on Allied terms much easier.

The press of all the Allied countries, on October 13, was practically a unit in demanding that Germany be given peace only on the basis of unconditional surrender, but if an armistice were to be arranged, the editors and military writers agreed that it must be granted only on the surrender by Germany of all military material and arms west of the Rhine and the occupation of Metz, Strassburg and the Rhine cities by Allied troops as a guarantee of German good faith.

President Wilson, on October 13 and 14, was in

The Training of a Soldier

By
ROBERT H. MOULTON

An interesting experiment, which, it is intimated, will have a large bearing upon the government's future policy toward high schools and the general question of universal military training, is now being carried on at Camp Steever, Lake Geneva, Wisconsin. At this camp high-school boys are being given real war instruction under the direction of military experts. The camp has this distinction: while it is maintained by the Military Training Camps Association, a civilian body, it has been authorized by all is working under the section of the War Department, and is the only camp of high-school boys in the United States which has been so authorized. For this reason the work is being closely watched by the department. The boys, who go to the camps in contingents of several hundreds every two weeks, are being trained under the command of Captain F. L. Fels, United States Army. French instruction has just been inaugurated at the camp and is under the supervision of Major C. R. Yates of the British army, now on the invalid list from a gas attack. He also has charge of the machine-gun and bayonet instruction. Captain reports that he never had more tractable and apt pupils in the rather grim courses of his curriculum.

Going into the trenches at night, which occurs about once a week, is looked forward to with especial delight by these embryo soldiers. On the day scheduled for this event, you may witness the spectacle of 100 boys leaping from their cots almost as one man at the sound of reveille, dressing in their tents swiftly and streaming toward the mess hall for breakfast with a telltale glow of anticipation on their faces. It is not altogether the thought of breakfast, however, that accounts for their enthusiasm. They know that, unless it rains cats and dogs, the evening will see them going into the trenches for nocturnal work. Creeping in after friendly darkness screens them from the shrapnel of the Hun creates among these boys the same sort of feeling that the regular soldier experiences when ordered "over the top."

THROUGH the night they stand sentry and go on patrol and listening post detail, varied with a sortie or two against the enemy. The troops in after their competitive company drills, the boys march around the head of the lake to the observatory, and listen to lectures by the director and assistants. Then they usually proceed to the Y. M. C. A. camp and end a strenuous day with a game of baseball.

The "Y" has a tent at Camp Steever and its popularity is attested by the fact that there is seldom a vacant chair. Here the boys read or write or listen to music. The Red Triangle men have charge of games and athletics at the camp, and have organized the most expert swimmers into a life-saving crew. Each day, just after tattoo, a short devotional service is held in the tent and is always well attended.

The moral welfare of the boy is as much a matter of solicitude at Camp Steever as his physical welfare. No leave is granted except under proper escort, either by members of the instruction corps or relatives. The boys are kept fully occupied, with either work or play, and there is no moping or homesickness.

There has been no sickness of any kind in the camp during the entire time it has been open this summer. Drs. Heman Spalding and H. C. Jones of the Chicago health department, who are the physicians in charge, regard the different contingents of boys who go to the camp as exceptional lots of men physically. There are always a score or more in each contingent six feet tall or more, some of them weighing close to 200 pounds. Out of every 100 examined an average of 40 are pronounced physically perfect.

Major Yates is assisted in his trench, hand-grenade and poison-gas instruction by Sergeant R. F. Willis, Canadian Highlander, and twice wounded at Ypres; Lieutenant Roberto De Violini of the Italian army, and Lieutenant J. A. Steinecker and Lieutenant F. Cavender of the American army.

Kit inspection at Boys' Training Camp

the front line are relieved once during the night, and then, as gray dawn steals over the woods in which the trenches lie, the whole command goes over the top, carrying real rifles, fixed with real bayonets.

Camp Steever is on the grounds of the Northwestern Military and Naval plateau, bounded on one side by wooded hills and on the other by the shimmering waters of Lake Geneva, and is regarded as an ideal place for maneuvers. Captain Beals seasons the boys by long hikes over the hills and along the lake shore paths.

Across the lake lies the Y. M. C. A. camp and the great dome of the Yerkes observatory dominates the landscape just beyond. On Saturday afternoons,

The Lutheran Church Merger

In the Lutheran Church of America the merger of the older Lutheran bodies is the all-important event at present. The bodies are the General Council, the General Synod and the United Synod South. Together they represent a communicant membership of about 800,000. The property value of the consolidated church is over $3,000,000, with an annual expenditure for local upkeep and salaries of between six and seven million dollars and an annual expenditure for benevolence and missions of about a million and a half.

The convention which will consummate the merger will be held in New York beginning November 12. The program is all completed. The three bodies will meet separately on Tuesday and Wednesday to wind up their affairs. On Thursday they will enter Holy Trinity Church in procession, and the preliminary steps toward effecting the merger will be taken. In the evening communion will be administered. Dr. H. E. Jacobs, dean of the seminary at Mount Airy, will preach the sermon. The public meeting will be held at the Hippodrome on Sunday afternoon and is planned to be a religious demonstration that will be long remembered in the nation's metropolis.

A prominent American divine has called this merger "the swiftest unification movement on a large scale in the history of the Christian Church." It began in April of last year—to be exact, on the 396th anniversary of the Diet of Worms. The Joint Lutheran Committee on the Quadricentennial met in Philadelphia. Three leading laymen of the church were present—a Philadelphia banker, an Ohio lawyer and a Pennsylvania merchant. Union was in the air. They crystallized it dramatically by asking what is the way of these three bodies getting together. If desirable, there must be some way of attaining it and it is worth making the effort.

The three presidents of the bodies concerned appointed a committee on constitution. The church boards were requested to meet immediately and prepare plans for merging their practical interests. But though the consummation came quickly, the bodies have been drawing closer together for many years past. Many activities were carried on jointly, such as the publication of hymnals, Sunday school literature and certain mission work; but the climax came without previous planning, as dramatically as few mergers of church bodies have been begun.

While the constitution contemplates a gradual merging of interests and activities, it is plain that the union of these three bodies will have far-reaching effects on the Lutheran Church and the religious life of the country. The new body will have supervision of sixteen colleges and eleven theological seminaries. The oldest of these goes back to the days of Washington, while the youngest has been established since Woodrow Wilson has been in the White House. The greater number of these institutions are in the East; two being in Canada, five south of the Mason and Dixon Line, four in the Middle West, and one on the Pacific Coast. Most of these institutions are today the homes of student army training corps. The largest of these schools, that at Gettysburg, rendered service in the Civil War. Taken together, these educational institutions represent a property value of more than $5,250,000. Their combined endowment totals more than three millions. Their libraries contain a third of a million volumes.

A prominent educator in the merging bodies sums up the effect of the merger on the educational work of the united church, thus: "The educational situation calls for means of conservation. Higher standards of efficiency will be required after this war. Our colleges and seminaries can claim no exemption from this law. New administrative methods will be demanded. Piecemeal policies will be out of date. Wasteful competition will be frowned upon. Nothing but Marshal Foch's 'strategy of alliance' will meet the educational needs of the new world that is about to be."

The united body is also looking to do its share in greater measure in the evangelization of America. The home-mission boards of the three bodies are being merged and preparations are being made to push the work as vigorously as possible.

The completion of this merger is simplifying the Lutheran situation materially. It is bringing the so-called English-speaking bodies together. The Scandinavian bodies are also arriving at an understanding. Finally, the so-called German-Lutheran bodies have progressed beyond the point of merely desiring closer fellowship. A committee has already met with promising results. It seems that the divided Lutheran Church of America is rapidly coming together into three large natural groupings, representing and providing for the fundamental racial, linguistic and doctrinal interests of the church. It is a development which a few years ago the most optimistic would have called fanciful and impossible. Today it seems to be sweeping through the church with ever-increasing vigor and speed.

LADDIE

MY little laddie lies so still,
With folded hands and quiet eyes;
The hours go stealing one by one,
The sunrise flares, the sunset dies,
And still so quiet-like he lies.

My little laddie lies asleep,
He does not hear me when I call;
He does not hear the robins sing,
Nor feel the petaled roses fall;
He hears nor answers not at all.

My little laddie sleeps so long!
His couch a low, green, silent bed,
Where summer drifts and winter lowers,
With birds and clouds and winds o'erhead,
Or snow, or clustering roses red.

Oh, little laddie, still and cold!
Your sheeny hair and eyes like May,
Your tripping feet upon the stair,
Your busy hands always at play—
Where have they gone since yesterday?

ELIZABETH BURGESS HUGHES

America Pledges Her Millions to Victory

THE mighty sweep upward into the billions of the Fourth Liberty Loan in the last regularly allotted week of the drive magnificently attested the spirit for victory of the American people. Over-optimism in the peace prospect was the only deterring factor with many people, though with others the possibility of speedy peace was an additional and potent reason for buying more bonds for the upholding of President Wilson's hands and the making of the peace terms more decisive. The official figures are not in at the time this issue is printed; but every section of the country, according to press reports, has responded nobly to the largest demand ever made upon a nation in the history of the world.

The New York district, whose quota was the largest, was one of the slowest in getting started, and at the beginning of the last five days of the drive faced the task of subscribing $1,085,639,000 of its allotted $1,800,000,000. The outcome was a crucial test of this section's patriotic spirit and power of financial organization.

"Liberty Day," October 12, was observed variously throughout the land in special patriotic demonstrations. New York City had a grand parade, in which twenty-one of the twenty-two Allied nations were represented. Great and impressive as was the procession for its own inherent merit, the crowning feature of its success was in the fact that at the head of its most distinctly American militant divisions marched Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. Down through "the Avenue of the Allies," spanned for three and a half miles by rainbows of multicolored bunting, flanked on either side of the broad thoroughfare by myriads of holiday makers, who cheered him rapturously at every step of his progress from Seventy-second Street to the Arch of Washington, strode a smiling, silver-haired man conventionally garbed in black coat and silk hat. His face was radiant with health and with the exaltation of the moment. He stepped out with the spring and vigor of youth. In cheering their President the multitudes were acclaiming him whom destiny has made the embodiment of democracy on the eve of its greatest world triumph against the reactionary forces of autocracy and vandalism. And behind him in those serried ranks marched twenty-five thousand men and women who in their persons embodied or illustrated practically every factor—martial, industrial, agricultural, nautical and even aerial—that goes to make up America mobilized and militant, no longer abjectly unprepared but full panoplied now and eager to battle with the dragon to the death.

Coal-miners were called upon by Fuel Administrator Garfield to observe Liberty Day not as a holiday but as a day of work, and to invest the money earned on that day in Liberty Bonds.

In most of the cities and in all of the rural districts it was a day of thorough personal canvassing.

With the German peace move definitely denied and the country swinging into its winning stride and gathering momentum every minute in the Liberty Loan campaign, the Minneapolis district being first over the top, President Wilson on Oct. 14 issued a short statement as follows:

The reply of the German Government to my note of inquiry dated Oct. 8 gives occasion for me to say to my fellow countrymen that neither that reply nor any other recent events have in any way diminished the vital importance of the Liberty Loan. Relaxation now, hesitation now, would mean defeat when victory seems to be in sight; would mean years of war instead of peace upon our own terms.

I earnestly request every patriotic American to leave to the Governments of the United States and of the Allies the momentous discussions initiated by Germany and to remember that, for each man, his duty is to strengthen the hands of these Governments and to do it in the most important way now immediately presented—by subscribing to the utmost of his ability for bonds of the Fourth Liberty Loan. That loan must be successful. I am sure that the American people will not fail to see their duty and make it successful.

A Week in the World's News

NEW GOVERNMENT IN RUSSIA. According to advice received at Washington on October 7, but considered reliable, a convention of former delegates to the Constituent Convention of the Russian people, was held at Ufa, Russia, in September. This convention drew up a constitution for a new provisional government and chose a directorate of five to organize the government and to direct its defense. The new government was said to be supported by an army of 30,000 officers and 200,000 soldiers, and to be about to restore order and drive out the Reds. The immediate mission of the new government was stated to be the liberation of Russia from the power of the Bolshevik Soviet, the reintegration in Russia of adjoining regions which were detached or separated, annihilation of the treaty of Brestat attention on the decks of the doomed vessel until she struck. So furious was the sea that the ship broke up rapidly and the life rafts and boats were broken up as fast as launched, while many who attempted to swim ashore were dashed to pieces between the rocks and the floating wreckage. Of 699 American soldiers on board, 335 perished.

TURKISH CABINET RESIGNS. The Turkish cabinet, headed by Talaat Bey, was reported on October 8 to have resigned. Enver Pasha, minister of war and Turkey's leading pro-German statesman, resigned with the other ministers. A new cabinet was organized by Ahmed Tewfik Pasha, formerly ambassador to London and known as a pro-Ally.

American bombing expedition went over line in the territory behind the German positions, dropping thirty-two tons of explosives. This was the greatest air fleet yet launched in the war—350 machines; 200 were bombers, 100 were pursuit planes and 50 were triplanes. Twelve enemy machines were destroyed; one Allied machine was injured, the pilot brought it down safely in No Man's Land and made his way to the American line. The squadron was surrounded at all times by bursting shrapnel and German airmen.

SUBMARINES TAKE LIVES. A German submarine early in October torpedoed steamship Ticonderoga of 5,380 tons in American transport service, carrying her to France. Of her complement of 250 men, seventeen were rescued and were brought to an American port by a westbound British vessel. The Ticonderoga had dropped behind her convoy because of bad coal and engine trouble. The submarine discovered her, fired its torpedo from a distance of a mile, following with gun-fire. The Ticonderoga's guns were immediately turned in the direction of the submarine, but both forward and stern guns were put out of action by direct hits from the submarine before they could get the range. After the boats were lowered the submarine continued to shell the open boats, and only escaped destruction, in which were the sixteen who were finally rescued. The submarine attempted to sink this boat by submerging while the boat was tied alongside, the cable broke. The Japanese steamer Hirano of 7,700 tons, was torpedoed and sunk off the Irish coast on October 5 with 320 persons on board. Only 29 were saved, and the American destroyer Sterrett, which went to their rescue, was herself attacked by the submarine. A successful maneuvering of the Sterrett spoiled the submarine's aim, and the destroyer dropped depth bombs, the effect of which was unknown. About the same time an Irish boat, the Leinster, was torpedoed while on a voyage from Dublin to Holyhead, with 10 persons on board. Less than 200 were saved. Germany has been known to have been buying submarines at a feverish rate, and the attacks were looked upon as another outbreak of frightfulness.

FOREST FIRES. Forest fires in northern Minnesota and Wisconsin on October 12 and 13 laid waste several square miles of timber land and destroyed a number of towns. The city of Cloquet with a population of 10,000 people was razed, and in spite of desperate efforts to supply sufficient trains, it was possible to get only 4,700 persons away, the fire still overwhelming the last train. Forest rangers patrolling through the burned district in the wake of the flames found hundreds of bodies along the roads, the fire even having overtaken swiftly moving automobiles. Fires started in both Duluth, Minn., and Superior, Wis. The total loss of life was estimated at about 1,000. The fires were considered the work of enemy agents.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The American bill in the coming year is estimated by the House Appropriation Committee at $38,100,000,000, amounting to about $140 per capita for all the people in the United States. Delmonico's restaurant in New York, famous as a meeting-place of politicians and statesmen, and as a rendezvous for society, went to receivers' hands early in October, but was not closed. . . . Brig. Gen. C. A. Doyen, who commanded the first American marines to go to France, and who had been brought back to America to direct the training of new officers, died at Quantico, Va., of influenza, on October 7. . . . The American shipyards made a high record in September, completed vessels totaling 369,330 tons. British shipyards made a new record, completing 231,635 tons. . . . As soon as the danger from explosions in the Gillespie shell-loading plant ceased, the American Red Cross sent an army of workers to South Amboy, N. J., to repair damaged dwellings and replace broken glass, making the houses livable again. . . . Senator Calder of New York on October 7 introduced a bill into the Senate proposing to continue the daylight-saving schedule indefinitely. . . . The American Federation for Labor and Democracy and the Mexican Federation of Labor have arranged for an international conference to meet at Laredo, Texas, November 13-15. . . . Walter Hines Lacy, who recently resigned as American ambassador to England, reached New York on October 2 as a very sick man. He had been ill in England and insisted on returning home. His illness was myocarditis, and a rough passage greatly intensified it. It was expected, however, that he would rally rapidly and regain his health. . . . Reports which have been spreading more or less throughout the country that there were a large number of drug addicts in the army were denied on October 12 by the War Department. The records of the surgeon general show that out of 990,592 men examined in the national army up to December 1, 1917, only 403 were rejected because they were drug users, and only 76 men had been discharged from the service because of addiction.

Litovsk, the restoration of the treaties with the Allied nations, and the continuation of the war against Germany. Provisions were made for relief of the economic situation. In the meantime the Bolsheviks were finding it impossible to secure necessary grain, and the parts of Russia under their dominion were suffering a famine. In Siberia the Omsk Government and General Horvath united on October 11 and Germany, by withdrawing her troops from Finland, removed the danger to the Allied forces in the country south of Archangel.

TRANSPORT SUNK IN COLLISION. The Transport Otranto, bound to England with American troops, was rammed in a storm on October 6 in the North Channel between Ireland and Scotland, by another of the convoy, the steamer Kashmir. The Otranto was helpless in the gale and was driven before the wind, grounding on a reef about a mile from the Scottish shore at Islay. A British destroyer ran alongside the wounded transport and many of the men jumped or slid down ropes to her decks, but the water was too rough for much rescue work, and the majority of the men stood that every people shall have the right of self-determination in the final settlement of peace. Austria-Hungary is reported to be taking steps for the liberation of her subject peoples. Emperor Karl was reported on October 11 to be about to issue a proclamation providing autonomy for Bohemia. Poland and the southern Slav districts of the polyglot empire. Meantime Hungary was reported to be seeking complete separation from the Austrian state, and to be putting forward a claim to the right to have a separate representative at the peace conference when it comes.

BAYER ASPIRIN NOW AMERICAN. The big $10,000,000 factory of the Bayer Company in Jersey City, where aspirin was first manufactured in this country, has been taken over and is now being operated by the United States government. The property will eventually be sold to American citizens.

When the Boys Come Home

THAT will be a great day when our boys come home. Dick Ward comes home in Dr. Sheldon's new serial which begins next week. He comes home to new ideals, new problems, and an old love, and all work together to build a cracking good story around as fine a hero as any author could desire.

We all welcome Dr. David J. Burrell and his messages. Next week he takes us to the full Storehouse of the Promises of God.

A mother's only regret was that she did not have six more sons and daughters for Uncle Sam's services. Miss Sangster tells the story next week.

What of the Church, of Faith, of Unity, of Practical Christianity when the war is over? Next week the leaders in the various battalions of the armies of God, which we call denominations, will be heard on this great question, through their letters to the editor of the Christian Herald.

And that isn't all, but for the rest—wait and see.

Germans in Wide Retreat

FOUR years ago last August there marched through Brussels—the capital of that Belgium which had refused to stain its hand with treachery—a mighty array of warriors in the full panoply of power and with all the accouterments of warfare. Hour after hour they passed, and the frightened citizens, peering from behind drawn shades, were duly impressed with the hopelessness of resistance, while a watching world wondered and exclaimed at the completeness of Germany's preparation for war.

Today, along the highroads of Flanders and Picardy and Champagne, that mighty army is writhing homeward, its lines colossal, its "will to victory" broken, its courage still good but fighting a continuous rearguard action against the implacable and ever pursuing foe. Harassed by swift tanks and cavalry, bombed and machine-gunned from the air, its days full of terror and its nights vary with forced marches, the great German war machine goes home. Its famed Hindenburg line is no more; the fighting is now in the open, or from shallow trenches as scant time and desperate digging make available. Its gas wearing out, its air-service outclassed, one-fifth of its artillery lost, and huge stores of munitions destroyed or captured, the German army still fights. But day by day the British, French, Italian and American armies press forward, a mile, two miles, three miles, sometimes five miles, and the German rearguards are successively overwhelmed while their machine-gun defense is effectually smothered. From these conditions of disorganization in Germany seeks a way of escape through an armistice. General Foch has answered this request eloquently in his great military advances and by the capture of most important positions. The Allied governments, through President Wilson, have given the only possible diplomatic reply.

During the week, there has been no cessation in the continuous Allied pressure from Ypres to the Meuse. On the 8th, General Haig swung out from La Bassée and Lens and forced his lines nearer to Lille. On the 8th he struck westward along a twenty-mile front south of Cambrai, penetrating the last of the rearward positions of the Hindenburg line. In this attack the French led on the left and the American Wildcat Division, boys from Tennessee and the Carolinas, tore their way through wire, woods and machine-gun posts for a gain of more than three miles, going well beyond their objectives and taking many prisoners and guns. On the 9th Canadian troops entered the northern suburbs of Cambrai and English troops the southern, meeting in the center of the city and taking prisoner 1,000 men of the German garrison. The rest of the former garrison and the German troops which had been resisting the British south of Cambrai along the Scheldt Canal were in full retreat. So rapid was their flight that the British were unable to get in contact with the main body of the enemy during the next three days, although Haig's men pressed forward in those three days over fifteen miles, taking Le Cateau, an important railway center southeast of Cambrai. The Germans had mined Cambrai and series of violent explosions occurred on the 10th, wrecking some of the finest buildings and setting numerous fires. On October 12 General Haig's forces were pressing close to Douai and were within eight miles of Valenciennes and the Germans were working feverishly to construct a new line running south from Valenciennes along the Sensée to the Oise at Guise.

SOUTHWARD from the Cambrai area, General Debeny's French armies forced their way to the Oise east of St. Quentin and crossed that stream at several places. Farther south, Generals Mangin and Berthelot forced the Germans to abandon their strong positions along the Chemin des Dames, General Berthelot's forces taking Berry-au-Bac north of the Aisne and pressing beyond it. The crossing of the Oise north of Laon and of the Aisne east of that city placed the troops of the Crown Prince who were still in Laon and the Forest of St. Gobain in a nasty pocket, from which they found it necessary to withdraw. On October 13, French troops entered Laon and La Fère without opposition and most of the Forest of St. Gobain was in Allied hands.

North of Rheims, Generals Berthelot and Mangin's forces continued to sweep up the north bank of the Aisne. Some American divisions were fighting splendidly here. On the 12th General Mangin's troops took Vouziers, on one of the main supply lines of the German army in the Champagne and westward.

The Americans, fighting north of mand of the German hosts on October 13. In the Champagne they were going back on a wide front before General Gouraud's victorious French Fourth Army and Pershing's invincible American First Army; they had abandoned the line of the Suippe and were hastening to get behind the Aisne. Between St. Quentin and Douai they were hurrying to place the Sensée Canal and the Oise between their shattered armies and the implacable Allies, while between Douai and Lille they were swinging back on the latter city as a pivot to a line running from Lille to Valenciennes. In Belgium their retreat from the coast appeared to have been halted.

A MILITARY writer in the "Tägliche Rundschau," of Berlin, General von Liebert, expressed the opinion on October 11 that the German armies would retire to a line running from Lille to Maubeuge, to Sedan, to Montmedy, to Metz and to Diedenhofen. This line would mean the practical evacuation of French occupied territory, and would be some 150 miles shorter than the battle line of October 12. The English at Le Cateau were 45 miles from the starting-point of their drive east of Amiens on August 8, but still had some distance to go to reach this suggested new line.

Because of his haste to get away from the Cambrai area, the Hun was unable to set fire to all the villages he left behind. Also the retreat became too rapid for the Germans to hold the civilians broken and the Allies were still advancing on October 15.

On the same day the American troops west of the Meuse advanced about a mile on a narrow front, while the French in Champagne pressed after the enemy.

In the fighting in Argonne Forest on Friday, October 4, a battalion of 463 American troops, commanded by Major Whittlesey, advancing faster than their comrades on the right and left got into a valley where they were surrounded by German infantry and machine-guns. For three days the battalion fought and was finally rescued by a determined attack by American and French troops. On Saturday the rescuers failed to reach the battalion, on Sunday three attempts to reach them failed, although the attacks occupied some German troops and relieved the pressure on the trapped Americans. On Sunday fourteen airplanes dropped two tons of food and considerable ammunition in the area held by the battalion, and on Monday a determined attack broke through the German positions on both sides, releasing the battalion, more than three-fourths of whom were saved. The boys could not move in daylight without drawing German machine-gun, trench-mortar and rifle fire, and could only secure water from the brook in the bottom of the valley under cover of night. They dug themselves in and stuck to it, though they were short of food and ammunition. On the third day an American soldier, who had been captured, suddenly appeared at the beleaguered camp.

He had been sent blindfolded from German headquarters with a note, which read, "Americans, you are surrounded on all sides. Surrender in the name of humanity; you will be well treated." Major Whittlesey yelled a defiant negative toward the German lines, and his men cheered until the echoes rang back from the wooded hills. Harried by snipers and their retreat sprayed with machine-gun barrages, the Americans hung on, reserving their fire for such of the enemy as dared to come too near. Several patrols were sent back to restore communications but none returned. When relieved the men had little ammunition left, but were still full of fight and declared they would never have surrendered.

The useless Hindenburg Line at Bullecourt. At the left stretch acres of barbed-wire, behind that an open space for close range fire upon an advancing foe, then the main trench line, back of it individual strong points and back of that support and reserve trenches and artillery positions. Further back this layout was repeated again and again to a depth of from ten to twenty miles Verdun, astride the Meuse and westward to the Argonne, completed the clearing of the forest of Germans and joined the French at Grand Pré on the 11th. The Argonne was one continuous field of barbed-wire and machine-gun nests. The doughboys had to slip forward one at a time, cutting wire in the dark when every snip brought machine-gun and rifle fire, rushing machine-guns at the point of the bayonet, meeting desperate counterattacks, the dense brush making unity of action difficult, permitting the filtering through of the enemy and attacks from behind, and forcing more or less hand to hand fighting. For four years the Germans had considered the forest impregnable. With the Argonne cleared of the enemy, General Pershing's boys fought their way forward across the strong Kriemhilde line, penetrating it in three places by the 12th, although the Germans were resisting with all the artillery and man-power at their command.

"General Retreat" was in full com-they were driving ahead of them, and in three days Haig's men rescued over 15,000. Conservative estimates place the German losses since July 18 at over 600,000, while some experts calculate the number of Boches permanently out of the fight in the same period at 1,000,000.

The Germans, in retreating from Belgium, exceeded their former records in brutality.

The Germans having shown a tendency to delay their evacuation of the Belgian coast, Marshal Foch on October 14 launched a swift blow at the line north and east of Ypres from Handzame Canal to the point where the Allied positions crossed the Roulers-Menin road. Preceded only by a short crash bombardment picked Belgian, French and English divisions rushed to the attack, taking the Boches completely by surprise, capturing over 10,000 of them with many guns, and taking Roulers, Cortemarck, Hoogledede and a large number of villages. The German line was SERBIAN, Italian and French troops pressing the disorganized German and Austrian units back through Albania and Serbia, captured 1,500 prisoners and 12 guns on October 7 and pressed on to the neighborhood of Nish, the ancient capital of Serbia, from which the Serbians were only fifteen miles distant on October 10. The Italians were hard on the trail of the Austrians in Albania, having advanced through Elbasa, and on October 9 stood before Durazzo, while French troops pressing toward Montenegro, had reached the Serbian line and threatened to cut in behind the Austrians. In spite of German and Austrian reinforcements the Serbians on October 13 occupied Nish, thus definitely cutting the line of the Orient railway.

General Allenby's cavalry on October 8 occupied towns on the Damascus-Aleppo railroad over thirty miles north of Damascus. The Turks had on that date evacuated Beirut, which had been occupied by French naval forces.

Our Answer to Germany

PRESIDENT WILSON'S reply to Berlin's bid for peace is a masterful stroke. German diplomacy has proved to be an unfathomable sea of deception. It needed a skilful hand to drop a plumb-line into the depths, when time and tide were opportune for taking soundings.

In the plainest language, the President asks if Prince Maximilian's note means that the German Imperial Government accepts our peace terms as they were announced on January 8, 1918, and repeated subsequently, and that it now desires only to arrange their practical application. He firmly refuses the request for an armistice as one that cannot be entertained as long as the Teuton armies remain on invaded territory; as evidence of good faith, the Central Powers must first withdraw their forces everywhere from invaded soil. Finally, the President inquires whether the Chancellor "is speaking merely for the constituted authorities of the empire who have so far conducted the war." These points must be settled satisfactorily since we regard them as vital. Just how vital they are, is best understood by turning to the President's address to Congress on January 8 last, to which he has referred in the present note, and also to his address of September 27.

There the terms of America and the Allies are clearly set forth. They include the restoration of Alsace and Lorraine to France, the independence of Poland, the evacuation and restoration of Belgium, the restoration of the Italian provinces, also of the territory that has been wrested from Montenegro, Serbia and Rumania; complete autonomy for the peoples who have been forced to yield to the oppressive rule of Austria-Hungary, the evacuation of all Russian territory held by Germany, and all territory invaded and occupied by the Teutonic allies since the war began. To these must now be added the elimination of the German autocracy and the substitution of representative popular government in that empire.

When all of these far-seeing aims, which constitute our true purpose in the war, are considered, the present note takes on the aspect of an ultimatum of tremendous import. Yet these things are precisely what we are fighting for in this war, and what, in the spirit of justice, freedom and righteousness, we have resolved to use "force to the uttermost" to attain.

Germany's answer, when it comes, may bring things to a point—it is not at all improbable that it may come before these lines reach our readers. If it is a message of Hohenzollern dictation pure and simple, it will make no impression on the situation except to intensify the energies of the Allies in carrying forward their military program. Neither America nor the Allies have any desire to entertain any proposition as to cessation of activities while a single foot of French or Belgian soil remains in German hands. Nor can there be any discussion or negotiation with the Junker faction, who do not represent the German people, and whose outrageous record of criminal treachery and inhuman cruelty have made their recognition now altogether impossible.

Thus the note from Washington, with a single swift stroke, has shown convincingly to the world that Kaiserism alone stands in the way of peace and must bear the responsibility for the continuance of the war.

Prayer and Victory

WHEN the President of this nation summoned our people to general observance of a day of prayer for God's blessing on the United States and our Allies in the war, the whole people responded. They had been praying before the summons came, and they are praying still; but on that day, the united petitions of the entire population ascended to the Throne with intensified earnestness.

Many letters have come to us concerning what followed that universal cry from the great heart of America. In one of these letters, from a friend in Butler, Pa., the writer makes a suggestion which doubtless has occurred to many others who have been observant of recent events in Europe and the Near East. He writes: "Following it (the national day of prayer and humiliation) God has blessed the Allies with wonderful victories. Should not this country, then, in recognition of this answer to their prayers, be called upon to return thanks to God and follow it with another day of prayer, that he may hasten the end of this war and bring peace to the world?"

Yes. Trust in God will win the war. He has gloriously answered our prayers, and is answering them still, almost daily and hourly. This nation prayed on May 30 with a single voice. That same day saw the opening of the battle of Château-Thierry, which was quickly won, effectively stopping the German advance on Paris. Then followed in rapid succession the great victory on the Piave, the Allied triumph on the Marne, the series of crushing German defeats on the western front, the brilliant American victory in the St. Mihiel salient, the destruction of the Turkish army in Palestine, the elimination of Bulgaria by surrender, and the beginning of the German retreat all along the line in France and Belgium. These events together mark the turning-point of the war. Truly the Almighty has blessed all our efforts. We have gone ahead doing our full share, sending our best and bravest to the front, where they have put a new spirit into the Allies—the spirit of faith in God, that he would direct the issues in the interest of justice and peace, for he is a God of righteousness.

As we look back over these four months, we cannot fail to be deeply conscious of the goodness of God in leading this nation at every step of the way in the great world-conflict. He has heard our prayers and the confession of our sins and shortcomings as a people. The events that followed are the clearest possible indication that our supplications have been accepted. All the logic in the world cannot interpret otherwise the marvelous happenings of these four months.

Let us by our continuance in prayer, and by living closer to God and in more and more dependence upon him in our daily experience, uphold the hands of those in authority in the nation as Aaron and Hur upheld the praying hands of Moses in the decisive struggle with Amalek. So may we keep the spiritual fires burning to strengthen and encourage not only our own brave men at the front, but their Allies also. Let us pray and work ceaselessly while they fight the good fight, both we and they being actuated solely by the desire for that which is just and righteous and conformable to his will.

And when the nation is again called to a day of united prayer, let us not forget, amid our many causes for thanksgiving, to give the glory to God for all he has so wondrously brought to pass.

Religion in Action

FEW contemporary writers have had better opportunities for observing the religious side of life in the trenches than William Ernest Hoeking, professor of philosophy at Harvard, whose contribution on "Religion in War-Time" is easily the most notable article in the September Atlantic Monthly. He is equally careful neither to overstate nor underestimate the trend in spiritual things, yet we find him in consistent agreement on essential points with the mass of views presented by a great variety of writers.

Without devoting space to his psychological study of the situation, we can here simply give the conclusions he has reached. Of the average soldier he says:

If war itself has not supplied him with revelation in large measure, it may yet have endowed him with a great hunger, and a direct, undeceivable eye, for judging the world of ideas to which he returns. Already one is aware of a keen wind astir, seeming to bring with it a demand for substance in place of husks, for contemporaneous insight instead of mere inheritance, which may well warn all doctors of religion of a time of reckoning at hand.

Agreeing with H. G. Wells, the apostle of speculative philosophy, that we must revise our creeds to meet the new emergency, Professor Hoeking holds that the revision should be one of clarification rather than curtailment. He regards the present as a time when unity is wanted instead of further diversity, and he adds: "Hardly anything, I believe, will be more fateful for the religious history of the next generation than the success of the Church in expressing its own knowledge of religion, or of Christianity in particular, so that the returning soldier and others can recognize it as something of which their own experience had already spoken."

By way of contrast, we have the experience of an army chaplain who found the men at the front glad to listen to straightforward prayers for divine guidance—to something that would strengthen them in their own weakness and their sacrifice. They cared little for entertaining stories, or for movies. Life with them was too serious a problem. What they wanted was religion—"the real things of the soul without camouflage of any kind." That chaplain frankly admits that "his preaching after the war will not be the same."

Among the denominational clergy there is a growing frankness in admitting that they see the beginning of a "new era," which may be met by harmonizing all the agencies of the Church, beginning with the fundamental teachings and motives of Christianity. Very clearly does the situation present itself to a leading religious journal, the Presbyterian, Philadelphia, as a challenge to the whole Church to renew her faith and knowledge of her Lord, and enter upon a new obedience to his new fellowship in his sufferings, and a new sense of the power of his resurrection. . . . When the Church is thus renewed in her faith and knowledge of her Lord, she will be ready to respond to the pressing appeal.

We agree with those who hold that the Church often unduly subjected to criticism by some seem to wholly overlook the fact that present conditions are altogether exceptional and impossible have been foreseen. To be just, therefore, we should rather help than obstruct. To all right-thinking people, the Church is still the divinely instituted organization which stands for the highest human ideal and for the establishment of God's Kingdom on earth, and all true Christians should value it accordingly. They can give their best service for God and religion by helping the Church in the great work of reconstruction with their voice and influence and their heartiest cooperation.

The Army of Harvesters

WHEN Mr. Hoover quieted the hunger fears of Europe with the statement that no one would want for bread, he knew what he was talking about.

America's great "harvest army" has performed a year a feat which is an epic of labor. In its smooth, organized, efficient, and almost military movement across the great Mississippi basin, from Oklahoma to the Canadian line, this great army of workers has saved America's wheat crop, the loss of which might have meant the loss of the war. It's a fact worth thinking about: the world's bread is safe for another year.

Week by week the land army marched northward. By the time the Kansas harvest was ready the first line in Oklahoma, for example, had finished its work; and the men promptly moved on north to enter the next "first-line trenches."

By late summer the army was working in the Dakotas, and the American wheat crop had been saved. Moving across the border about September 1, the Canadian crop was put out of danger. When the Canadian wheat had been harvested the men moved south again for the American corn crop.

Every year the great drive goes on, but this year because of the urgent need and the labor shortage special attention was given the problem and the work was more thoroughly organized than ever.

The Two Flags

WEBSTER defines the word "sacrament" to mean originally the oath of allegiance taken by the Roman soldier, to be loyal to the Empire. It was considered a sacred oath, as we today regard loyalty to our flag the symbol of our liberties and principles. It is a pledge to defend the government, the home and the right. The flag of the Republic stands second only to the Cross, the banner of soul freedom in Christ.

Jacob Riis, while visiting Denmark, his native country, was taken ill. Looking out of his window one day near the sea, he saw a ship passing, flying the American flag. He knew that all his possessions, his influence and his life had been dedicated to the defense and preservation of that flag. To him, its shining stars stood for forty-eight states; its stripes for the thirteen colonies, its red for the blood of patriots, its white for purity and loyal devotion and its blue for the heavens of freedom. He sat up in bed and shouted and laughed and cried by turns, exclaiming, "I knew it was my flag and that I had also become an American!"

What pride every one of our countrymen should have, in this hour of world war, when the countries of our Allies over the seas are waving the American flag beside the emblems of their own nationality, and when we remember that the Stars and Stripes stand for law and order, security and safety, liberty and fraternity. Surely the God of nations must look down upon our emblem as a sacrament to peace and truth, service and self-sacrifice for the promotion of righteousness in the earth.

One other flag only, the Bible banner of freedom—the Cross—waves over a wider realm, a longer future, a higher ideal, meaning fixedness of character for time and eternity, and patriotism to the high and holy God of heaven. May the two flags never become antagonistic, but wave on in harmony, in progress, peace and blessing, standing ever for human rights against inhuman wrongs.

Police Horses Retired

MANY sad stories of the ill-treatment given New York police horses after they have been sold at the end of their services are told by the Women's League for Animals, which has been instrumental in stopping the public auction of these animals. They will be turned over to the S. P. C. A. and good homes found for them. Mrs. Christine C. Wilson, 636 West Ninth Street, for the League, called upon Mayor Hylan and Police Commissioner Enright, and the latter discovered a law enacted many years ago giving the Police Department power to turn over its horses to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Ten horses which were to have been sold this morning went to the society. Three of them were given to retired members of the force, two were taken by the Women's League for Animals, one went to the Ford of Health, and it was necessary to destroy one. Investigation made by the Women's League, substantiated with pictures, showed many of the one-time satiated pets of the police, with rough cuts, marked with whip-lashings, half-starved, with protruding ribs. A well-dressed man often appeared to bid at the police horse-auctions, but the horses were taken to another stable and turned over to a junk-dealer, cheap peddler, or gypsy. At one of these auctions a League member, thinking to interest a purchaser, told him incidents of the horse's life and his name. The man merely interrupted her. "Well, from my own name is Work," he said. What a beautiful thing to take care of these old horses, who have rendered so splendid public service! What a fit and beautiful thing it is to care for people who have served their generation so faithfully! There are some children who count it their first and most happy duty to care for an aged father or mother or other relative. And then there are others who treat their relatives with coldness or harshness, who compel them to work when they are not able, who furnish them with little or no temporal support, who push them back in a corner out of the way, and bring loneliness and untold suffering to them. Fortunately they are an exception to the care of the American Home for the Aged, but there ought to be no exception where there is the ability to help. It was this dad of being forsaken in old age that led to this prayer: "Now also when I am old and grayheaded, O God, forsake me not." (Ps. 71: 18.)

Mount Desert National Park

SHOULD Congress act favorably on the bill, Mount Desert Island, off the coast of Maine, will become a national park, the first one of Uncle Sam's parks east of the Mississippi Valley, and the only one on the seacoast. Two years ago the government came into possession of a beautiful mountain and valley in the eastern portion of Mount Desert Island. Those lands had been acquired through a series of years by a local public-spirited organization known as the Hancock County Trustees of Public Reservations, and for the sole purpose of preserving their wild native beauty in the interest of the community at large. Little by little the domain has grown under the guidance of the society manager and solely through the generosity of individuals interested in the island, until some 5,000 acres have thing besides money. The national parks are a gold mine to the minds and souls of a great nation. It is wise for the nation to provide these bewitching playgrounds for her people who work so hard and successfully. Mount Desert Park calls to mind a natural park in Palestine into which Christ took his disciples for a little vacation, and which he called a "desert place": "And he

May I call your attention to Agriculture Extension Division, Special Bulletin No. 27 of the University of Minnesota, coming from the heart of the wheat-producing districts, on page 7 of which they say, 'Do not destroy the Japanese barberry.' The bad barberry is so terribly disastrous that it is natural that an innocent variety of the plant might have to suffer somewhat from the bad company it keeps. There should be every scientific precaution in discriminating practically between the innocent and deadly varieties that kill the wheat, just as there should be between mushrooms and toadstools. We would suggest to the nurserymen of the country that they change the name of the Japanese barberry to some other name (some kind of a rose), and thus remove the ban that it unjustly shares with the family of murderers. In the spiritual realm there is this reference to the danger of appearances: "Abstain from all appearance of evil." (I Thess. 5: 22.)

Carpeting Bottom of the Mississippi

THE bottom of the Mississippi River, near Memphis, Tenn., has been supplied with a carpet in the shape of gigantic mats woven of willow trees, which were constructed in sections on the surface of the river itself and then sunk into place. The purpose of this carpet is to keep Memphis on the river, which for several years has been cutting a new channel near the city, threatening to leave it high and dry a mile from the channel of the stream. The river has left a score of towns deserted in this manner, with consequences serious enough. In the case of Memphis, however, these consequences would be exceedingly disastrous; the costly wharf facilities would be ruined and the city left with a huge mud bank between its fine levee and the stream. The threatened danger was first noticed by government engineers, and preparations were immediately started to avert it. A wall of solid rock appeared at Hopefield Point, opposite Memphis, which it was hoped would check the river's ravages, but the rock was undermined by the swift current, and the carpeting with willow matting was resorted to. The willow mats which have been placed in the river at that point will, the engineers in charge of the work declare, put a stop to the erosion. Some of these mats are a mile long and 200 feet wide. As fast as a section was completed it was weighted with rocks to sink it into place and then pinned to the bottom with piles. The Mississippi is the only river in the world that enjoys the distinction of having its bottom carpeted. God made the rivers; man harnesses them up for his practical uses, makes their fall turn his wheels and manufacture his products, loads their surface with his crops and wares and lets them go with their current or against it with steam or electricity. He digs out the shallow bottoms, and puts barriers to hold them in their channels. God took his finger and began on the high mountains where the heavy snows melt, and cut a channel for the longest river in the world, which we call the Missouri in the earlier part of its course, and then the Mississippi till it empties into the Gulf of Mexico. He made it for man's uses, and the people of Memphis are holding it to their wharf with the willow mats. "He cutteth out rivers among the rocks." (Job 28: 10.)

been brought under its eustody. To make the plans more secure and far-reaching, the society has offered to turn them over to the national park system of the United States, and bills with that in view were introduced into both Houses of Congress by the members from Maine. The park, which well-nigh spans the island, includes fifteen summits, eight charming lakes, and a beautiful fiord. The pine forests, from which so many masts were taken in olden times for the ships, are magnificent, and the flowers are beautiful. Wild animal life is charming, and it is a feeding-ground for migrating birds, and a paradise for them as well. It provides the only sanctuary for birds on our coast north of Florida. There are three miles of seacoast, which can be used by those who approach it in boats. Part of this coast was given in memory of relations who were old summer residents of the island. There is somesaid unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while; for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat." (Mark 6: 31.)

Plea for Japanese Barberry

MR. ROBERT RYLE of West Grove, Pa., a long-time friend of this paper, in a letter says: "In your issue of September 11, 1918, on the Bible and Newspaper page, there is an article, with illustration, which by reason of the fact that it tells only a part of the truth does great injustice to a large industry in this country. We are referring to your raid against the barberry, and in this reference you make no distinction whatever between the common barberry, which all good people everywhere are endeavoring to eradicate, and Berberis Thunbergii, or the Japanese barberry, which in every

Fountain Bitter and Sweet

A FARMER in Colorado began digging a well. When he got down seventy feet he struck nice soft water fit for the use of cattle and men. But he concluded to bore deeper and get a better supply. When 300 feet had been reached a copious flow of water was found. But it was impregnated with minerals and had a decidedly bitter taste. Then he put parallel pipes in the well whereby he is able to draw sweet and bitter water through the same pump. Bitter and sweet water are not expected to come from the same heart. The professed Christian who has bad manners, who is ugly in his disposition, and sour and bitter in his words to his fellows, should bear that fact in mind. The words of some church members sting and wound, when they should soothe and heal. Some people think that ruggedness of virtue requires severity of conduct toward others. This is not true. The best type of Christianity is sunshine, sweetness, happiness to others by word and deed. The apostle James teaches the lesson in this figure: "Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water, and bitter?" (James 3: 11.)

Lambs as Lawn-Mowers

A SUBURBAN resident of Chicago got a couple of lambs last spring and used them as nature's lawn-mowers. He took them at certain hours each day from his back yard and let them nip the grass on the front lawn. He paid $8 for them in the spring, and will get $16 for them this fall. His object, however, was not profit, but to help his mite in supplying the wool shortage for the war. Sheep-raising for meat and wool was a primitive industry, as will be seen by the record: "And Mesha king of Moab . . . rendered unto the king of Israel a hundred thousand lambs, and a hundred thousand rams, with the wool." (II Kings 3: 4.)

The Grace of Humility

TEXT—Rom. 3:27. "Where then is the glorying? It is excluded . . . by a law of faith."

HUMILITY, which is genuine, unaffected, and contributory to moral character, is rarely found except in Christian circles. Even there it requires assiduous protection from the infections of pharisaism, and prayerful, intelligent cultivation under New Testament guidance. Its excellence and scarcity excite spurious imitations. Abject behavior is common enough, and when based on self-interest is despicable. Skin-deep etiquette rules among the conventional. The Oriental prostrates himself before you and exhausts the language of subservieney. Many similar eodes of speech and ordained customs are practiced by people who, in themselves, are as proud as Lucifer and as braggart as Falstaff, but who, for diplomatic reasons, assume craven attitudes. Nor is there any worse arrogance than that which apes humility; the particularly offensive arrogance which provoked one Greek philosopher to say to another, who made merit of his demerit, "There is more pride in your humility than in my pride." Beneath such meek docilities, the fires of resentment burn fiercely. Differences in civilization, in social status, in wealth and poverty, in culture and ignorance, feed their flames. The East looks upon the West with a patronizing superiority carefully hidden behind a conversation and a bearing which liek the dust.

Beware of sickening pretentiousness in matters of faith and virtue, which too often plays havoc with the beautiful and winsome grace of Christian humility. For it is the office of the Spirit of God to create in the souls of men and women a profound distrust of their own goodness, and a corresponding dependence upon the help which comes from above. He alone can subdue that will-worship which enthrones our own desires and treats our personal preference and prejudice with the devotion due to divine principles.

Jesus came to his own and they received him not, because he was among them as one that served. Their besotted exaltation of peculiar privileges bred their boundless presumption, and their national destiny was split upon the rock of an incurable religious egotism. There was nothing attractive to their fastidious exclusiveness in the spectacle of a Galilean peasant, who voluntarily abased himself and deliberately chose the death of the cross. Thus their knowledge became their destruction; their genius was debauched.

Nor have we to hark back to the fate of the expatriated Jew for significant warnings upon this issue. One once morally great modern nation has wrecked itself and become loathsome to right-minded men and women because, notwithstanding its gifts and its discipline, it has exhibited the disgusting villainy and trickery, the sanctification of lies, the worship of brutality, the divinization of its Emperor, and other degeneracies which belong to a perverted conscience.

IT is not sufficient to detect and denounce the iniquities of pride and contempt and cruelty in Germany. We are to be warned by her fearful fall, and remember that any talent we profitably employ, any virtue we practice, any grace we enjoy, are the gifts of the Spirit. Wherein we shine, we shine in a transmitted light. Trust in God, the Giver of every good and perfect gift, and a determination not to lean too freely upon our own understanding, are hallmarks of moral sanity. Until the first disciples of our Lord appropriated this truth, they found no peace, no power, no serviceable methods. Lowliness of heart, in the impulsive Peter as in the zealous John, showed them their actual ease, and how destitute they were of spiritual riches and influences apart from the baptism of the Paraclete. It was in the moment of this suffusion that the vision of their exceeding sinfulness and also of God's holy and redeeming love burst upon them. And from that moment they entered upon a new being and a new world.

As for St. Paul, who exclaims in the text against unhallowed boasting, he was never accused of being a feeble and timid personality. On the contrary, where he sat, there was the head of the table. He once exulted in his birth, his training, his covenant relationships. When a rival faith arose and threatened the supremacy of Judaism, he became an arch-persecutor of the followers of the despised and lowly Jesus. For nothing is more merciless than outraged pride, and this is always most active when garbed as a pious protestation. Analyzed closely, it is simply the worst, the lowest element of corrupted human nature monopolizing the stage as the maintenance of honor and righteousness. Mark the transformation this Scripture indicates, and how completely the apostle escaped the bonds of legalism. No longer did he vaunt his deserts by blood, by hereditary rights. Stripped of their fond delusions, he bowed at the Cross of shame and was glad to subscribe himself the slave of Him who was crucified thereon.

LET us apply the lesson to ourselves, and reflect upon the conceits which ravage intellectual integrity, especially in its dealings with revelation. Here pride of knowledge, haughtiness of mind, high-flown thoughts against the will of God, are necessarily excluded, because what he bestows upon us is a message of life from his mighty heart, and not an induction from any mortal source. The Gospel, as the summary of his overtures to man, sweeps into its scope every dimension above or below. It is beyond the power of the human mind either to create or to control, and the most gifted brain can but touch the fringe of its content. An individual well-nigh stone deaf, like Edison, can illuminate a city, and make panoramas and sweet music for the city's millions. A Newtonian intellect can measure space and number the stars. A paralytic tied to his bed can invent an airplane in which his fellowmen conquer air and sky. But who except the Christ, sets up his title to be a Redeemer from iniquity? Who seeks his fame in the vast and needy fields of moral and religious regeneration? Find me the genius who can abolish sin and establish godliness and consecrate the soul of the race.

Here the strongest and the wisest ones are the first to admit their helplessness. The mystery of evil, and no less the mystery of salvation, baffle their best concerted schemes. Surely the present state of affairs in Christendom demonstrates how absolutely we have failed to save ourselves; how sorely we have been defeated and brought to the verge of despair, unless the Everlasting Mercy shall devise means whereby we are not finally lost.

BY his solution of these grave problems, Jesus displaced the legalist, the statesman, the thinker. He dispelled the blinding haze of folly and of pride. He bathed us in a celestial light. When we were impotent, he invigorated us; when the law could do nothing but condemn us, because we had not the ability to fulfil its demands, he provided the dynamic which rewrote that law on the fleshly tablets of our hearts. And he accomplished this superlative task, not by a dazzling imperialism, nor a display of resistless power, but by a life of poverty, obscurity, labor, sacrifice; a life as far removed from the policies of earthly potentates as day from night. He freely unfolded his designs, not to the nobilities of this world, who by their rank and station might have been expected to bring them to fruition, but to rustics and fishermen. These in their turn communicated in the Holy Spirit with outcasts and r gades, who stood nearest in the apostolic succession and taught and exemplified the truths by which nations live. Their full, frank recognition of Jesus as the Mediator between God and man ended the travail which had marred their usefulness and tranquillity. The sickening struggles of ambition and vanity were subdued and rendered futile before them with whom they had to do. And his test of greatness, fully accepted, brought about that Divine Human Commonwealth in which the foremost are the universal servants.

Assuredly such marvels as these did not grow in earthly soil. They were directly transplanted from the bosom of the Father. And we are recipients, not partners; suppliants, not exactors, who should sink before His eternal wisdom and love in adoring acquiescence. "Yes," challenges the believer, "but what becomes of our inward convictions as to duty and right? Have we not a way of our own to observe? Can we not be the masters of our fate? I shall not argue at length concerning the relative worth of faith and works, except to say that, proportionately considered, they have no quarrel. But if we need anything in this prevailing chaos, it is not absolutism in morals and religion that can no more evade than the law of gravitation in physics—absolutism to which every moral trait can be attached by which it can be adjusted. Conscience, duty, sense of right and wrong, demand a standard, illumination, an inducement. They wait for the Advocate who ministers to them; for the Spirit of Power, of Life, of Conviction, of Conversion and Judgment. Left to themselves, they wander wide from the center, become dangerous, and subtle their danger; prolific of cults, isms, quack nostrums, fads; and, worse still, they persuade us that their good is evil, their evil good. Many, like Saul of Tarsus, kill and destroy under the obsession that they honor God. A multitude of the malignant plagues which devastate mankind are engendered by a mistaken conscientiousness. We set up our designs against those of our Maker, spurn the delicacy that comes by faith in Christ, and hail as a notion we find which gratifies our conceits. The apostle dreaded this process because it had bitten him, until, stung and tortured, weary and disconsolate, he found refuge in the Gospel. He did to it as the ageless remedy for presumption, pride, self-righteousness, and every opposition against the free grace of God in Jesus the Christ.

WE are driven by reason as well as by revelation, by history as well as by experience, to the conclusion that nothing but Divine Love can save either the man or the state; nothing but Divine Jesus can purify them. None are so remote from heaven as those who portentously announce their part rights to its inheritance. And let him that thinks he standeth fast therein, take heed lest he fall.

Again, realize afresh how munificently God draws upon his own resources when he despatches Jesus to our aid. This is the costliest enterprise in time or eternity, in which the loftiest forces were expended upon an inestimable scale. To perpetuate civilization as we have received it, rivers of blood must flow. What then must it entail to polarize the entire human family in divine life, to open the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers? It is no wonder they glory in the Cross, from which the Son of God reigns, and aliens and rebels into divine sonship. We are paupers. He is the Benefactor. Nothing becomes us so well as humility, contrition, submission, trust.

Away with the fatuous complacency which plays faith! Permit no whisperings of self-gratification to pollute your grief for transgression. For broken hearts arises the cry, "Save, Lord, or we perish!" The depths of sin have overwhelmed us; the seas of sorrow have swallowed us up. Our confidence is shattered, our hopes annulled. What have we in heaven or on earth but Thee?

Then comes the second Spring, the rejuvenation of the soul, in which the tyrant and slayer is made an apostle, and the banished ones return and come to us with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. It is back nothing of your life from the self-surrender, faith, which insure a regenerated existence.

Turn to Christ as instinctively as flowers turn opening petals display to drink in the radiance of noon. Turn now, in the day of visitation, and his presence learn of One who is meek and lowly of heart, who made it his meat and drink to do the Father's will; who, having suffered the death bitterest ignominy, is therefore elevated forever to give repentance and remission of our sins.

FROST FLOWERS

FILLING the old fence corners,
Where silvered rails sag low,
And the chipmunks, at their harvesting,
Speed tireless to and fro;
Nestling in dreamy silence
Close to a gray stone wall,
Content to share its sheltering
With weeds in ragged pall;
Flinging a purple largesse
O'er roadsides lone and bare,
Where once June-loving daisies shone,
Kissed by a kindlier air;
Smiling in still old gardens
That rest from labor done,
The Frost Flowers lavish loveliness
Neath Autumn's brooding sun.

So wondrous fine and fragile
For the late Year's blossoming!
I marveled at the miracle,
And wandered, marveling,
Till, in a far, hushed corner
Of the dusky, dreaming wood
I threw me down on the rustling leaves,
Then, lo, I understood!
For as my eyes grew wonted
To the dimness round me cast,
I saw a gracious figure there,
With fingers flying fast—
Dear Mother Nature, smiling
To see my mute amaze,
The while she fashioned Frost Flowers fair
From the purple Autumn haze!

Mercy and Obligation

SUNDAY, October 27. Matt. 18:32-33. "I forgave thee all that debt; oughtest thou not therefore to have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, as I had compassion on thee?" Here is a man who had received a great mercy, and while he is rejoicing in his own freedom he goes forth to oppress his fellow man. He is false to his own experience. He is a traitor to his own deliverer. He utterly fails to read the significance of his own life. It was the hope and purpose of his master that, having been released from his own burden, he would hasten away to release his brother. The spacious joy of freedom ought to have made him an apostle of liberty. The sunny cheeriness of his own new day should make him a mountain herald of glad tidings to all who may be still in the gloom. He had become a child of privilege and he ought to be inspired with a sacred sense of obligation. That is the broad and certain teaching of the Lord—we are to translate our mercies into obligations. We are to look into our favors and search for suggestions of our duties. We are to carefully count our blessings and then regard them all as the interpreters of our divine commissions. We are to do to others as the gracious Lord has done to us. There is an "ought" in every mercy. There is a duty in every bounty.

Well, that opens out one clear road of moral obligation. If we are to find our duties among our mercies it is necessary that we tread the somewhat forgotten road of divine providence. We must rummage among our negligences. We must make an inventory of our favors. We must notice where a lamp was lit for us at a dark turning of the way. We must call to mind the sweet waters of the spring which we found by the foot of the hill. We must rehearse His dealings with ourselves, and when we have surveyed all the shining tokens of his grace we must re-read them in terms of obligation, and we must go forth in the same spirit of blessing to help and cheer our fellow men. "I gave . . . thou oughtest!"

This has always been one of the lofty distinctions of the saints. They have had consecrated memories, and they have come into God's presence in the multitude of his mercies. But that is not all. Memory has been the inspiration of service. They have come before the Lord laden with the experience of his bounty, and this sense of grace has inspired the sacred desire for a corresponding ministry. "I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercies. . . . What shall I render unto the Lord for all his mercies toward me?" These are two complimentary acts in the healthy action of praise, the sense of God's mercy and a willingness to render it again in the service of his holy will. J. H. J.

The Poison of the Tongue

MONDAY, October 28. James 3:8. "The tongue . . . is full of deadly poison." A very practical man is James. He has not much to say of do-trines, but he is very close to life when he offers us advice as to conduct. He must have suffered much from foolish and malicious gossip. What tragedy of a sensitive soul is suggested by these words—"the tongue can no man tame!" Had he a loose-tongued wife, an indiscreet sister or daughter, a slander-mongering neighbor? Had he an enemy who strove to do by base insinuation what he lacked the courage to do with spear or dagger? Ah, very human were these apostles, and the world was evil-hearted then as now.

He suggests two things: the cure of the careless tongue by the restraining grace of God; and the patient endurance of suffering in view of the coming of the Lord. "Be ye patient; stablish your hearts. We count them happy who endure."

The intimate history of two eminent statesmen of our generation reveals depths of humiliation to which they were subjected by poisoned tongues. What Gethsemanes of agony they endured only those who knew the secrets of their lives could imagine. Yet in both cases there was heroic patience, with only a word uttered now and then to show how keen their anguish was. One of them wrote in his diary one day: "What but the pity of the Lord can compensate for this endless war of words, strife of tongues, fury of temper?" He had his refuge, like James, in the friendship of God. C. C. A.

Faith in His Promise

TUESDAY, October 29. Heb. 11:29. "By faith they passed through the Red Sea as by dry land which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned."

The Egyptians too must have had a sort of faith in their ability to cross the Red Sea, else they would not have rushed into it. Likely they argued: what these Hebrews have accomplished we too can achieve. Why, then, did the children of Israel succeed where the Egyptians failed? Because the Israelites in going into the Red Sea obeyed a command of Jehovah, and believed the promise which he had made them. He had said to Moses: "Lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand over the sea and divide it: and the children of Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the sea." Such a command and promise was not issued to Pharaoh's host.

Let us for a moment try to realize the situation that confronted the children of Israel. It was fearful enough to cause the stoutest hearts to quail: a furious host rushing at them from the rear, the raging sea in front. No ships to be had to ferry even the smallest part of the army across; no way of escape by a circuitous route; and even if there had been, horses' feet are swifter than the puny limbs of children. At this perplexing moment comes the order of the Lord: "Walk right into the sea!" "What? are we to wade across? Surely, the waters are too deep for that. Must we swim? The opposite shore is too distant. Surely, there must be some mistake."

With unfearing faith in God, Moses carried out the direction of the Lord, and his people obeyed the orders which he gave them, and the result was exactly as the Lord had foretold it. The action of Moses and his people was an act of faith; the action of Pharaoh and his warriors was an act of foolhardiness. One single word of God was in this case seen to make a vast difference. True faith always takes its stand, is founded and grounded, solely and entirely upon the word that God has spoken. W. H. T. D.

Unfaltering Love

WEDNESDAY, October 30. Ruth 1:16. "Entreat me not to leave thee." A wealthy miner in California, who had sent some ingots of gold to his affianced bride, suddenly lost all his property and wrote, releasing her from the engagement. She had one of the ingots made into a ring and on the inner margin was engraved the inscription, "Ruth 1:16, 17," and sent it to her lover. He opened the Bible and read, "Entreat me not to leave thee or to return from following after thee." That was an evidence of faithful human love, and was patterned after God's unchangeable devotion.

Real love cannot be purchased by wealth, eulogy, flattery or influence, else it would be a mere mechanical matter. Love at a price is a fraud, for love is the spontaneous flowing out of the soul to one thought worthy of affection. Love wins love by the celestial attraction of hearts. Those who are true to each other are more likely to be true to Christ. "We love him because he first loved us." We may leave him, but he will never forsake us. His disinterested love abides forever. We are drawn to him because of his holiness, goodness, mercy and truth. He is drawn to us because he cannot help loving his offspring, no matter how fallen and disobedient they have been.

The sun brings spring out of winter by earth's asking. The resurrection beauty of summer is in response to the glowing rays of light and warmth. So the sun of righteousness breaks through our cold, stolid nature, making hearts like the garden of the Lord. If we fall like Peter, he has prayed for us and will lift us up again into his fellowship. He came to save us, to pay all our debts and make us his eternal heir. He would have us for his companionship, always. E. W. C.

"Cankered Gold"

THURSDAY, October 31. James 5:2. "Your gold and silver is cankered." Very early in the history of the Church its leaders were face to face with the problem of how to deal with "tainted money." And yet their problem was not so much how to deal with the money as how to deal with men who had gained their wealth corruptly. Not many such men sought the society of Christian people, but doubtless some such had an idea that, corrupt as they were, they could have a part in the communion of saints.

It is edifying to see how James, our blessed Lord's own brother in the flesh, handled the question. He made plain the Christian doctrine of stewardship, and plainer still the Christian duty of honesty. He had no patience with fraud. The problem of the redistribution of wealth had no special interest for him. Like his Master he left that to the developments of future ages under the leadership of God's Spirit. But he struck a great blow for humanity and for progress when he affirmed that all ill-gotten wealth is in itself accursed. The modern Christian economist is entirely in accord with James when he declares, "No man ever enriched himself by fraud." God wants no cankered gold, no corrupt riches, no unclean gifts on his altar. The gift does not sanctify the giver; rather, as in the parable of the widow's mites, the motive of the giver sanctifies the gift. C. C. A.

The Origin of Faith

FRIDAY, November 1. Rom. 10:17. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." The Word of God is not only the basis on which faith rests, but also the instrument by which faith is begotten in men's hearts. We cannot explain the origin of faith any further, nor in any other manner, than by saying that the Word of God which men hear causes them to believe. The Word of God seizes men's hearts with a divine power; it carries conviction to the heart, implants confidence and trust in the heart. To illustrate the process by which faith is engendered, let us think of an astronomer who is studying the sun. In order to do this, he must have light; whence does he obtain the light? He does not kindle a huge fire behind his telescope, so strong that its glare illumines the heavens and reaches even to the distant sun. This would be simply impossible. Nor does he wait until somewhere in the heavens there appears another strong light which casts its rays upon the sun. Such a light does not exist; the sun by its own powerful radiance puts out every other light in the heavens. Well, then, whence does the astronomer obtain the light for his study of the sun? Why, from the sun itself. The attitude of the believer to the Word of God is similar to that of the astronomer to the sun. Scripture is a light that shines in a dark place; all the knowledge which men attain regarding the Word, all the faith they put in its declarations, is from the Word and by means of it, by means of its inherent clearness, force and virtue. Scripture does not require the light of human reason or of an additional revelation to make it clear. It is self-sufficient to engender in man the faith by which man accepts it. Faith is ever of this divine origin. For this reason, too, faith is so precious in the eyes of God; he regards it as his own product, as a work of his Holy Spirit through his own Word, in man's heart. For this reason faith is accorded such great privileges with God; God promises to do to the believer as he believes on the basis of God's promises. Faith confers with God on God's own terms, and God makes himself serve the behests of faith which he has quickened in men. W. H. T. D.

Firm Hold on God

SATURDAY, November 2. Gen. 32:26. "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." Jacob, David and Peter had serious falls, but they were men after God's own heart, because their faces were always toward the loving Father in penitence and contrition. Jacob found Bethel the house of God and the gate of heaven to his prayerful soul. He found the ministry of angels at Mahanaim and the great baptism of the Spirit at Jabbok. Here was the last great crisis of his life. Esau was coming with an army to destroy him. Alone with God he wrestled until the break of day, when he cried out in holy desperation, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." Heaven loves such passionate, irresistible calls of prayer. The fervent is the effectual. The self-life must die in the suppliant.

Jacob must be made over so completely new that his very name, meaning "supplanter," or self-seeker, must become Israel, a prince having power with God and with man. Jacob knew that the name of God was love as he never understood it before. He who had been false now became true. He who had been weak and vacillating became strong. Ever after that victory God was the God of Jacob.

Have we prayed the prayer, "Tell me, I pray thee, thy name"? Then we knew that nature and name are one and the same—the blessed fullness of love. Have we ever been in dead earnest, wrestling for victory at the throne of heavenly grace? Have we touched the scepter of the Almighty and heard that we should have not half, but the whole of his kingdom? Have we connected with the central city of God, sending our passionate messages for the salvation of the world, and felt ourselves the thrill of infinite power? Have we been crippled in our own strength in order to be crowned a prevailing prince of God? Have we clung with unyielding grasp by faith when we could not wrestle any longer, crying, "I will not let thee go"? Oh, then, what waves of glory rolled over our spirit; what a heaven of angels in our heart! E. W. C.

IT was daybreak when Mary Ellis reached the Bureau in Paris. It was housed for the war in a large building once the home of a rich and famous family of France. She was immediately ushered up the broad stairs into a room that had once been the scene of world-famous festivities. She was gravely greeted, cordially but unemotionally, by the four men who sat behind a long table. Quickly she repeated her story of meeting Professor Bonheur, and then of her return journey.

"You say that there are Prussians there?" one of the men asked quickly, looking at his colleagues.

"Yes." And with swift sentences she told of the scene with the young officer, and of his boast that soon the Prussians would be displacing the Bavarians on the front occupied by the American troops.

"Now just tell the story over again," one of the men asked quietly—and she did. They asked her no questions—merely nodded gravely, and made occasional notes. When she had finished they all seemed to look toward one man. He nodded and rose.

"Miss Ellis, you have done a great, unexpected service to France, and to your own America. In the right time you will be rewarded. For the present all we can do is to thank you and to admonish you that silence, absolute silence, is necessary. To tell what you have done may mean disaster. The American boys will be ready for the Prussian regiments." He smiled.

A sigh of relief passed over the American girl, and then as she realized that her work was completed she wondered what she should do next. Would this Bureau have more work for her to do? Would she go back to Printemps Vallée?

"You mean—that—I can do whatever I wish?"

"Exactly."

"And—and I am to go back to Printemps Vallée?" she asked.

"Yes; you are free to go anywhere."

"But what shall I tell them?" For the first time she realized that she had left the workers in the dead of night, without a word. A vague fear filled her as to whether they would want her back.

"They will ask me where I have been."

"That you cannot tell. Say that you went to Paris on a vacation; tell them anything you wish, but not the truth. The man who found you, the officers who detained you, have all been cautioned. To talk at a time like this is treason, punishable as treason."

"I understand," she said quickly; and then after a moment. "But I am a woman; they will think—"

"The worst," one of the men interrupted. "I am sorry, Miss Ellis; but remember, this is war. You are too good a soldier to break your pledge of silence. Outside you will find some one who will see you receive proper clothing and lodging. If you have need of money please present this at this address." He came round the long table, and after she had received the card he took her hand and carried it gravely to his lips. The other men saluted her in like manner, and she went slowly down toward the great doors.

"There is just one thing more," she turned suddenly. "Can you tell me if Captain Renault is still at Printemps Vallée?" She blushed as she asked the question, and the man she addressed smiled kindly, as if he understood.

"We can give you no information as to Captain Renault. I am sorry."

She bowed her thanks, and went swiftly through the door.

CHAPTER XII

IT was cold in Westport. The wind from the plains beyond the town swept the streets with icy breath, and came whistling with weird notes about the corners of the houses. Luther Terry pulled his chair closer to the big open fire in his living-room, and turned a page of his favorite magazine. For a time he read in silence, and then came to him above the wind the sound of footsteps on the porch, followed by a rush of cold air.

Mrs. Luther Terry had come home from her Red Cross meeting.

There was nothing of serious import in this; hardly enough to make him look up from his book; but when she entered the room, almost as soon as the cold air she had admitted, her steps were quick, anxious.

"Well, she's come home," she said; and the words were a triumphant cry.

"Come home—who?" He put down his book. Surely anything that could be of such great interest to his wife was out of the ordinary.

"Mary Ellis. I always did say that she was one of the good-for-nothing kind. Now they've dismissed her—sent her home."

Terry looked at his wife incredulously. "How—how do you know?"

"Why, I saw her on Main Street with my own eyes. She's been home two days; got home on Thursday. Mrs. Pike saw her down town this afternoon, and sent word to Annie Squares, that does her washing, to ask how long Mary Ellis had been back on Orchard Street."

"And the rest?" Terry interrupted.

"What rest? About my being right as to her character? Your common sense ought to tell you that the rest was inevitable."

"Yes, but my common sense makes no false accusations. Do you positively know that Mary Ellis was dismissed from her work over there?"

"Well, no," hesitatingly.

"Go on," he commanded, speaking abruptly.

"Well, you see, we talked the matter over, and we decided that they at least ought to be warned."

"Who ought to be warned?" Anger was creeping into Luther Terry's words.

"The women over there. So we collected a hundred dollars and then found the name of the woman who was head of the committee where Mary Ellis was stationed. We sent her a draft for the hundred dollars—and—" she stopped.

"Yes?"

"And we told her we hoped the work over there would be of benefit to Mary Ellis. We—we were very kind—and we tried to be charitable—but—"

"You despicable bunch of cats!" he burst out, jumping to his feet. "Say, if you were a man I'd wipe up this floor with you. You were kind and charitable, wiping out that girl's chance at life! Say—oh—what's the use?" And he stormed from the room.

Had Luther Terry known how calmly Mary Ellis was reading in her room at that moment, however, he might have felt differently; for while it was true that she was back—even dismissed under a shadow of disgrace—she was happy; supremely happy, almost divinely happy.

AFTER she had left the big conference room of the Bureau that morning she had found a woman pacing the corridors just outside the door waiting for her. This woman, an employee of the Bureau, escorted her to a hotel, where, as the men in the conference room had promised, she was given suitable clothing and a chance to rest.

Two days later, refreshed, but still tired from the nervous strain she had been under, Mary Ellis had left Paris for Printemps Vallée. The return to the Vallée and its band of workers had been decided upon after long hours of planning. As she had lounged by her window in the winter sunshine Mary Ellis had thought out the whole thing. She was world-wise; she had learned in the bitter school of experience that there is little charity in the world; that guilty until proven innocent was the real verdict. And Mrs. Lovett would ask her where she had been—why she had gone away in the night without a word—and she would be able to tell them—nothing. Then they would think the worst of her. Perhaps if Mary Ellis had not lived in Orchard Street in Westport, she would have expected different treatment. As it was, she made the journey from Paris largely because she wished the clothing she had left at the Vallée.

She went directly from the station to Mrs. Lovett, who received her kindly but sternly. Mary Ellis had told her that she had been in Paris on important business, and Mrs. Lovett had frowned. Mary Ellis did not know it; she was not to know the truth for months; but looked in the drawer of Mrs. Lovett's desk was a letter from a committee of women in Westport, New Jersey. At first this letter had been met with a frown; now Mrs. Lovett thought of it with heavy heart, and told Mary Ellis that unless she could tell some real story of her absence, unless she could prove her duties in Paris to be truly important, she must go. Mrs. Lovett was kindly, and Mary Ellis admired her for her quiet dignity. The young woman did not ask to see the others; she went quickly and quietly to her room and picked up her scattered belongings. Then she went back to Mrs. Lovett.

"Would you tell me—if Captain Renault left any message?" Mrs. Lovett frowned. "The captain was gone in the morning."

Mary Ellis understood.

"If I can have the trunk moved to the station I should like to get this evening's train to Paris."

"I will give an order."

"Thank you; and now I will go to the station and wait." She did not offer to say good-by; she made no apologies nor promises that she would one day vindicate herself in their eyes. Instead she went quickly and quietly back to the station. Ten days later she sailed for America from a Spanish port.

THE late winter and spring months of 1918 were long and trying. There were days of great cold, and fuel was scarce. Food was high, and paucity seemed to lurk just around the corner. Suffering was everywhere, especially among the poor, and Orchard Street in Westport suffered with the rest.

Perhaps it was because of her work she could do for the people who appreciated and loved her—perhaps it was because that spirit of service that had filled her and sent her close to death had lifted her above sordid, earthly things; but for one reason or another Mary Ellis lived contentedly through the first three months of the year and welcomed with joy-filled heart the coming of spring.

What did she care for the men and women of Westport? Let them snub her—let them say what they pleased. Mary Ellis had lived more in a few weeks than they would live if fivescore years were their lot. Mary Ellis had loved; Mary Ellis had known the excitement of war; had crept forward to safety; had battled with a man; had done something far better, for it was with a thrill of elation that she had read in the newspapers of the Prussian attack on the American line, and how it was repulsed by the American boys who were ready.

And she had brought the news that made them ready!

The first warm days of April brought the swelling buds, and the world awakened. Birds sang everywhere, spring flowers bloomed gayly on the lawns of Fulton Street, and in the grass on the parks about the big estates beyond the town. It was spring—a warm, glorious spring. And in the girl's heart there crept for the first time a sense of longing, for the lanes outside the town were ready to be walked, and lovers strolled slowly by, whispering the words that are treasured in after days.

"If only he would come to me! If he would even send some message!"

she whispered to herself as she walked in the moonlight. And yet she dared not hope, for there had been no word. Perhaps he was gone forever; perhaps he had not meant all he had said. No; she put that thought from her heart forever. He would come for her if he lived; he would lift her out from this place, and carry her away with him forever—to happiness. Mary Ellis's faith was strong, and she knew that her nightly prayers would be answered. She brushed a stray tear from her eyelashes, and smiled up into the moonlight.

WHEN the warm sunshine told that the winter was truly gone, when the last vestige of frost had left the early morning air, Mary Ellis looked out from her side windows and decided that she would have a war garden, not for herself, but for the children of the neighborhood. There was nearly an acre of land, and it could be plowed and divided into small plots. The next morning she went to work making the allotments, while her father, always ready to follow any suggestion that came from Mary, drove off into the country to ask a farmer whose horses he shod regularly to plow the land and harrow it.

So it was that Mary Ellis worked with the children in their war gardens one Saturday morning, while two long low automobiles, driven each by a man in uniform, came swinging along the road from New York, and at Westport rounded the corner of Orchard Street, where it branches from Main. With stately dignity the cars made their slow way to the big house where Mary Ellis had been born and still lived. She was engrossed in her work, bending low over the difficult task of seeing that young hands properly transplanted some tomato plants, and only the sudden whooping exclamation of a small boy made her look up.

Three men had climbed down from each machine—some dressed in the conventional garb of men of affairs when they make a formal call, the others in uniform. With much dignity the little group moved up the walk. Suddenly from a word of one of them they stopped and turned in her direction.

With a low cry of exultant joy Mary Ellis started forward, for there was one face she knew. Then she stopped abashed at her soiled hauds, her be-draggled short white skirt, wet with dew. In that minute that she hesitated the foremost man had gained her side.

"Jean!" she cried, the hot tears starting to her eyes. "Jean, my Jean!"

"Mary, my own! It is I, Jean!" his heart answered her, and heedless of the children, unknowing of the little knot of watchers who stood outside the fence on Orchard Street and wondered caring nothing for the soiled hands that might mar the glory of his bright blue suit, he swept her into his arms.

Then suddenly, as if he had forgotten some duty, he released her.

"Come!" he cried; "there are gentlemen to call on you." And he half-dragged her toward the gravely waiting men.

MRS. LUTHER TERRY was entertaining eleven of her best friends at a luncheon and bridge that Saturday—the event being in honor of a Mrs. Westerly-Smith, a distant cousin of Mrs. Terry's, who had been doing caution work in Belgium. Mrs. Terry was quite aflutter at the prospect of the affair; entertaining for a person who had really been near the scene of battle was a distinction.

"I'm so glad you were able to come," she greeted each guest at the top of her porch steps, and then came the proud introduction that she knew would add much to her social standing in Westport.

Most of the ladies had arrived when Mrs. Terry saw a figure approaching she had not expected. It was her husband, who shunned "women's socials" and sneered at them with cynical laughter. Now, however, he was hurrying; and it must be something of importance, for twelve o'clock on a Saturday was a busy time of day.

"Why, Luther, Luther! What is it?" she gasped, and hurried toward the edge of the porch. The other ladies, sensing the unusual, seemed to gather about her as if to support her through some impending climax.

"It's about Mary Ellis." He was quite winded. "They've come for her."

"Come for her!" one of the women almost shrieked. "She's been arrested?"

"Arrested! Oh, no! But this morning a captain in the French army, one of those very rich fellows you read about, and the French ambassador, and his helper, and a couple of our army men, and—well, there were six of them—they drove up Orchard Street and stopped right outside the Ellis place. It must have been some sight. They tell me Mary Ellis was out with the children she's been making a garden for, and her hands were all dirty, but the big man shook hands with her and kissed her, and one of the fellows, the rich captain, is going to marry her."

"Mary Ellis! Marry Mary Ellis? After the way she got—"

"Got sent back nothing!" he snapped at his wife. "That girl's a hero—or a heroine, whatever you call it. Haskin is getting out a special edition of the Reporter for this afternoon; he's got her whole story—told me some of it. Why, Mary Ellis went into Germany on some kind of spying mission for the French, and she got news that saved a whole regiment of Americans—think of it! And she was told that she daresn't tell anything about it, so when she showed back at the place where she's been working they sent her away. They didn't think her moral character was good enough to work in the devastated districts." And he stopped short, his teeth shutting with an ominous snap. Ten of the women present knew what he meant, and a cold shudder that is akin to a smarting conscience went over them.

The silence that followed was painful—filled with regret.

"Well, I just thought you'd like to know about Mary Ellis," Terry said finally. "You were all so interested in her—always interested in her. Sorry I can't tell you the names and the whole story, but that will be out in the afternoon papers. Some class to Westport—having a real heroine that is going to get the French Cross of War pinned on her, and get a medal from the United States Senate, and marry a real live millionaire Frenchman. He's a handsome fellow, too," he chuckled.

Again there was a long silence. For the first time in her life Mrs. Luther Terry was absolutely speechless.

"Well, I must get back to the store," and he mopped his forehead and started down the steps. "Have a good lunch," he laughed.

"I—suppose—I suppose—we ought to call," he heard one woman suggest very meekly, as he reached the foot of the steps. "We ought to congratulate her."

"Oh, no—she wouldn't have us—now," Mrs. Terry spoke quickly, as one recovering her breath.

"She would, too!" Terry had not quite reached the end of the front walk. "There's one thing you've got to hand Mary Ellis—she's no cat; she's got real charity in her."

AND that noon, while the ladies at Mrs. Terry's lingered over their luncheon, stopping to marvel and heap self-condemnation on their shoulders, Mary Ellis, hidden from the dining-room by a screen of palms, sat in a far-away alcove of Westport's big Garden Hotel and faced the man she loved.

Swiftly, eagerly, he told of the work that had carried him half way round the world and because of its nature had kept him from sending her even a word. In his pocket he bore a note from Mrs. Lovett, a tender sweet note such as a mother might have written. Mrs. Lovett knew that Mary Ellis understood.

Mary Ellis hardly read it, however, and she paid but scant attention to Jean Renault's tales of the honors that would be hers. There are moments when the world and its rewards count for little. This was one of them.

"Did you really think of me?" she teased. "Were you truly worried?" she laughed.

"Think of you! when you had told me of Orchard Street, when I knew that in silence and shame you would be sent away, without a chance to say a word for yourself, for my sake? Mary, my Mary, my heart has ached; and how, how did I know that you would still be waiting for me?"

"Your heart should have told you. Love should have told you," she said, softly.

"Yes, but then—" it was his turn to tease, "you yourself told me that every chain had its weak link. How did I know that some man had not snapped it, and bound you with steel of his own forging?"

"Man! man!" she said soberly; "don't you know that all rules work both ways? Love was the weak link in that chain of German intrigue. Love saved you, captured Von Erdmann. But in the chain of our lives love—"

"Is the strongest link. Oh, Mary Ellis, that I may always be worthy of you." He pushed back his chair and went to one of the long windows that looked out over the parklike hotel grounds.

"That girl from Orchard Street," he said suddenly, proudly. "You told me once that was what they called you, and now all the world will call you that; but I—I will say, 'my girl from Orchard Street.'" And, regardless of any discreet waiter who might be lurking behind the palms, he went swiftly to her side and gathered her to his arms.

THE END

Exploding a Numerical Superstition

THAT there is anything unlucky in the number thirteen is a belief that ought to have been exploded long ago, considering that the United States started as thirteen colonies which have grown into the greatest Republic in the world. When on February 13, 1918, in his thirteenth year of service, Frank L. Wright, mail-carrier No. 13 of Springfield, Ill., started out to make his Thrift Stamp campaign, his route seemed likely to make good the No. 13 tradition, situated as it was in a poor section of the city, with poor or at best middle-class families. In spite of this he made it the first 100 per cent. one in the United States. Out of 2,242 people living, working and going to school on his route, he made sales to all but 20, and 200 more thrift cards and war certificates were sold than there were people on the route. Mr. Wright began his work by sending a personal letter to each of the householders whom he served. On the first day he sent letters to half of them, securing $3,010 during the week. Since then he has taken in $11,000 for Uncle Sam, and practically every home has a 100 per cent. sign displayed in its front window. Mr. Wright has conducted six strenuous war campaigns, the latest being for the Salvation Army. He is now trying to make the home of Lincoln the first 100 per cent. Thrift Stamp city in the United States.

John Goode's Evangelistic Work

MR. JOHN GOODE, after spending several weeks in missionary work in the mountains of Kentucky, is home again at the Bowery Mission. He is open to take engagements in evangelistic services, church meetings, and Y. M. C. A. gatherings. The thrilling story of the transformation of this devoted man ought to be heard everywhere. He is one of the most wonderful trophies of divine grace the world has ever seen. You may secure his services by writing to Mr. A. C. Baker, assistant superintendent of the Bowery Mission, 227 Bowery, New York City. If you wish a copy of the book, "The Wicked John Goode," you can procure it through the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

How Experts Make An Ideal Soup

Perfect in Blend and Flavor

This is why a Van Camp Soup is so amazingly delicious.

Each soup is founded on a famous recipe, usually a French creation. A noted chef of the Hotel Ritz in Paris made the basic soups in our kitchens.

Then our scientific cooks studied out improvements. These are culinary experts, college trained, and their work is done under laboratory methods.

Every ingredient is studied, and a standard is fixed for each. Then tests and analyses prevent variation.

Comparing Blends

Then many blends are tested—sometimes hundreds of them. Step by step the flavor is perfected.

It takes months on some soups—sometimes years—to attain the acme of deliciousness.

When the ideal is reached, every step is recorded. The formula for a single soup covers many pages. And every detail is exactly followed—forever—in the making of that soup.

The result is the finest soup of its kind that was ever made anywhere. Each is vastly better than the basic French creation. And every lot is exactly like the model dish adopted.

At Your Command

Now there are 18 kinds of these soups, all ready to serve, sold at a little price. Any can be quickly served, at trifling cost—the very utmost in a soup of its kind.

Get two or three kinds from your grocer. Compare them with the cruder soups you know. You will gain new respect for scientific cookery, and a new conception of what good soup means.

Order them today.

More Heat
Less Coal

Does It

THE most coal most of us can have this winter, will be 75% of what we had last.

If you have a steam, water or furnace system, it won't be enough.

But it will if you have a Kelsey.

From less coal it will give you the same heat. This may sound like too strong a claim. We don't just claim it. We can prove it. Want the proofs?

Appetite and Greed

International Sunday School Lesson for November 3
Gen. 25:27-34

Modern Jacobs and Esau

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE begin today the story of Isaac's twin sons, Jacob and Esau, and find neither of them showing himself in a favorable light. There are some sad reflections upon the family life in these brief descriptive verses. There is the miserable ban of favoritism, fortunately less prevalent in American life than in ancient times. Jacob was a home body and his mother's darling. Esau was his father's joy and pride, doubtless because his dash and recklessness in hunting were so different from his father's quiet timidity. Isaac is a colorless character; in fact, the lesson committee passes by without giving one lesson to his career. But the impression we get is of weakness in the father, of unrefined animalism in Esau, of trickiness in Jacob, so ready to take advantage of the others. The chosen family had fallen upon evil days.

Esau's Folly

So many Esaus there are, weakly yielding to the insistent assaults of their appetites, governed by their desires! How foolish it is—selling out for a mess of pottage! How foolish are the Esaus of today, selling out self-respect, the love of wife and babe, for the temporary stimulus of strong drink! Said one such poor creature to me, "I'm sorry, but I must have my glass, and nothing else counts." How foolish other Esaus, selling body and soul for the mad pleasure of an hour! Truly it is an old story. This particular earth-child was so simple and so sordid that he would barter his birthright and spiritual leadership to get his supper ten minutes sooner!

Esau is the typical worldling. His motto is, "Let us eat and drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die." What is the headship of a clan compared with a good bowl of stew? What is the dream of fellowship with God compared with "having a good time and getting all the fun you can out of life"? Such men live for the present moment only.

Jacob's Craft and Deceit

While we pity poor foolish Esau, we must also despise and denounce Jacob. He was willing to take advantage of his own twin brother in a moment of weakness. There be many Jacobs still, who are willing to make gain of their fellow-man's folly. Such are the distiller and the saloon-keeper, who prey upon society through its weaker members, being quite willing to make money from the suffering and want of drink-cursed families. Such indeed are the popular club and even the fraternal lodge which make a profit out of the vices of their own members by maintaining a bar which frequently "pays for the upkeep of the whole clubhouse." Pays for it in the worst possible way, one would say, taking it from a companion and sworn brother. Willing to prosper from a brother's loss—how flatly contradictory to the spirit of the Christ who taught that in brotherhood should society find salvation!

The Church of God must deal with both erring brothers in these shameful transactions. Her teachers must inspire youth with a chivalry that would scorn to profit by another's woe, showing just how low and despicable the Jacob-spirit is. Getting the best of the other fellow is discredited as a method in business as well as in the home. Service, honor and fair dealing are becoming universal watchwords. On the other hand, we who teach the men and women of the future must still emphasize temperance, whose key is self-control over the body. What an anomaly that the palate or the stomach should dominate over the mind and heart of a child of God!

The Possibilities in Jacob

Yet Jacob had one saving grace; he despised himself. Esau seems to have been without aspirations for anything better and higher. Jacob was "the wrestler" in whom the Divine waged endless warfare with the Satanic. He knew he was bad, and he yearned to be good. He appreciated the religious ideals of Abraham, his grandfather, and Isaac, his father, while Esau scoffed. He came to loathe his lower self, and like a better and greater Hebrew he found "the law that to me who would do good evil is present." Like Paul he delighted in the law of God after the inward man, but he was conscious of a different law in his carnal nature. So Jacob fought his meanness and his sin. That is why Christians have come to prefer him and to sympathize with him. We have all seen our good intentions fall down flat before repeated temptations. In the book of Psalms there is an interesting recurrence of the appeal to our Heavenly Father as "the God of Jacob." He who did not disown Jacob, but helped him, humbled him and finally crowned him a prince with God, is the same in whom we trust and upon whom we call despite our own unworthiness.

Which then do we really prefer—worldlings who make no pretensions to faith and who care nothing for God and the ideals of Jesus, or struggling faulty Christians who make awful mistakes, fall into besetting sins, and sometimes treat you or me with considerable meanness? The thoughtless world often says, "Give me the hail fellow well met who does not care." Is that our attitude also? Jesus pronounced a special benediction upon us Jacobs: "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be filled." He loved blundering Peter, and had compassion upon the woman who was a sinner, "yet loved much." Do we truly love one another despite the faults, as Christ loved us? Are we magnanimous enough to remember that our brother longs to know God though he continually catches himself stooping to crafty unbrotherliness? Are we like our Master, who saw boundless possibilities in those who seemed utterly hopeless to the loveless Pharisees?

I see the feet that fain would climb,
You but the steps that turn astray;
I see the soul, unharmed, sublime;
You hut the garment and the clay.

You see a mortal—weak, misled,
Dwarfed ever by the earthly clod;
I see how manhood perfected
May reach the stature of a God.

The Outlook for True Temperance

This is World's Temperance Sunday. We shall always need careful and thoughtful training for our boys and girls. Some are speaking of the coming of National Prohibition as though it will solve the problems of appetite and intemperance. Great as this forward step is in removing the flagrant temptation from the public view, it will not be any more complete than the prohibition of drugs or of thievery. We shall still have crafty and unbrotherly men who will be secretly at work in defiance of the law to corrupt their fellow men. The liquor men have boasted that the law cannot be enforced, by which I suppose they mean to announce their purpose to evade it and break it, treating the law of the land as contemptuously as they have treated the law of Christ. We must create a public sentiment strong enough to classify the sellers of alcoholic drink with the sellers of other demoralizing drugs. But we must do much more than that. We must teach and help boys and girls to achieve self-mastery, to become truly self-controlled, to stand erect as sons and daughters of God, reflecting the "light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Program for the 'Teen-Age Session

WITH forty thousand classes of the 'teen age now enrolled in the United States, covering a membership of over 600,000, the question of a program especially designed for them is important. This program must recognize that they are neither children nor adults, that they have interests peculiar to the life social, physical and spiritual of young people.

Furthermore, the program should be run by the young people. If we expect the Sunday school to produce a leadership for the school, church and community, we must secure it from the young people of the later 'teens, and the Intermediate and Senior Departments of the Sunday school are the places where we must commence to train this leadership.

Therefore the schools which are most successful in holding and training their young people are giving them a large share in the actual conduct of the department session and life. They are electing these young people as officers and members of the department committees.

The First Methodist Sunday School at Evanston, Ill., has a strong 'Teen-Age Department. They have a Junior 'Teen-Age Section composed of scholars twelve to fifteen, and a Senior 'Teen-Age Section for those sixteen to nineteen. One section meets at nine o'clock Sunday morning and the other at twelve, so each section has full use of the department room and class-rooms.

The departments have each a department president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, members, of course, of the department. The president presides and is elected for six months.

There is a department superintendent, an older person, who advises the officers and committees, but puts responsibility for the actual work upon the boys and girls.

The department committees are Missionary, Program, Membership, Social, Interclass (for plans that bring classes together) and Athletic. The vice-president of the department is chairman of the Program Committee, and if he has done good work he naturally in six months is elected to the president's place.

The Department Adviser meets with the Executive Committee, which is made up of the department officers and chairmen of the committees.

Departmental Socials are held annually and for six weeks during the Lenten season Sunday afternoon prayer meetings of the Department are held.

The features of the program used in this school follow:

1. Opening Exercises—Singing, with a pianist, leader and orchestra from the department assisting. Devotional—The Senior classes in rotation are responsible for this. Talk by a department scholar on a topic of interest, such as the religious leaders of the day.

2. Lesson period—Class devotions. Business handled by class president. Teaching of lesson.

3. Departmental affairs—Reports by officers or department committees of work done or plans made.

4. Closing service—Song, announcements, closing prayer.

In another school's 'Teen-Age Department the program was as follows:

1. Opening service—(a) Piano plays softly, several minutes before opening. Some hymn, such as "Where cross the crowded ways of life." (b) Call to Worship—Response: "O come let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker." (c) Prayer period—Sentence prayers by scholars or teachers and a silent prayer period. (d) Good service of song. (e) Bible drill. (f) Song. (g) Items of interest. (h) Prayer for classes as they go to study.

THE Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions gives in an 88-page booklet, "By Hammer and Hand," an interesting description of the industrial work in the mission schools of the Presbyterian Church throughout the world. The result of the training is shown in pictures of the various industries which render the schools to a great extent self-supporting, enable their graduates to maintain themselves by honest industry, develop Christian communities, and raise the standard of civilization in lands where savagery would otherwise prevail. The booklet can be obtained by addressing the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Buying in Bulk an Extravagance

HAVING already, and more than once, called the attention of sister housewives to the truth set down above, I accede with pleasure to the request from a highly respectable source that I lay the matter at greater length before our constituency.

The belief that buying groceries at wholesale by the box, barrel or keg is practical economy was justifiable in the housewife of a former generation. In the country, the difficulty and expense of transportation made it a necessity. Then the mistress of the house had cellar and storeroom "wherewith to bestow her goods." She demonstrated the risks of the practice by putting said "goods" under lock and key, and looking sharply after the key. "Mother's key-basket" was one of her valuables. She recognized, as clearly as do her granddaughters, that the hiring whose own the foods are not cannot be trusted to measure them correctly and use them sparingly, or even honestly. The true anecdote told here a while ago of the cook who, on being checked for throwing six fine potatoes, along with the parings of others, into the swill-pail, excused the waste by saying, "An' shure, there's a barrellful of 'em down cellar!" would have been as applicable then as now. Mother measured and weighed what raw materials were needed in the kitchen for the day, fitted the covers in place upon box, barrel and keg to exclude dust, insects and dampness, and locked the storeroom or pantry door.

FROM a pamphlet prepared by Edwin Bower, M. D., an eminent writer upon domestic economies and dietetics, I extract certain paragraphs that convey the truths I would inculcate more aptly than I could hope to do:

In this most crucial period in the history of humanity—when the fate of the world is tilting in the balance—certain well-intentioned but badly informed people would have us turn back the hands of the clock of evolution and ring about a return to the open cracker-barrel and uncovered sugar-bin days.

They suffer from the conviction that, by dumping the oatmeal into a bin and then scooping it out a pound at a time, patriotism could be enhanced. They feel strongly that, when the loose soap-powder is permitted to float freely through the grocery-air and settle in the butter, the economic interests of the country are being served.

They are convinced that to dispense sugar, tea, or spice, or any of the hundreds of standardized food-products, in scrupulously clean, sanitary, weight-and-quality-guaranteed packages, is a sin which can only be expiated by returning to the era of primeval simplicity and industrial ingenuousness from which the world has emerged.

Those were the happy days when every article was weighed with the grocer's hand in the scales, or measured with his thumb unobtrusively occupying a few cubic inches of the space he was selling for food. After which followed the time-eating practice of tying the material safely and securely in the grocer's own paper bag with his own string—neither of which he got for nothing—and for both of which his customers were paying.

The fact is ignored that the sixty to seventy per cent. of food-products now sold in clean, sanitary packages—with the weight not guessed at, but plainly stated—are sold because of a hard-won reputation, honestly earned by years of fair dealing in open competition.

Also, food-cost increase since the war began shows that packaged goods have not advanced in price as have bulk-goods of corresponding character, nor have they advanced in proportion to the cost of the material out of which they are composed.

This is due not only to patriotic desire on the part of manufacturers to "do their bit," and thereby lessen the cost of living, but also to a desire on the part of manufacturers to retain the good will of the public, as represented in their names and in their trade marks.

I would add to this admirable summary of the manifest advantage of buying dry foods in packages, economy of space in pantry and kitchen. To the straggler or to the city flat-dweller this consideration appeals with force. Her shelves are goodly to behold when the respective parcels and cans are arranged with due regard to contents and convenience. And in using them there is absolutely no waste. The neat cardboard package is emptied without the loss of a grain of sugar, rice, tapioca, or whatsoever it may contain. Then it may go to feed the fire. I need not designate the divers purposes to which clean cans and boxes may be put in households where nothing is wasted.

WITHOUT apologizing for the space devoted to a subject far more important than the casual reader might suppose, but which will, I am convinced, be welcome to the many who are learning to study hygiene and economy as housemothers have never studied them before in the history of the nation, I pass on to our day's allotment of letter-reading:

Seamless Cookers and Hollow Handles

Correspondents are so willing and able to reply satisfactorily to queries of all sorts that I bring my trouble to the Corner.

Can you or any of them bring about a sanitary reform in the manufacture of cooking utensils, by joining the different parts without leaving spaces in which dirt accumulates that cannot be removed by brush or dishcloth? I wish also they would avoid hollow handles.

By inserting this, you will greatly oblige an Oklahoma member.—Mrs. S. B. W. (Oklahoma.)

There are "seamless" cooking utensils that deserve the name. Will correspondents tell us how they compare in price with those of which our member complains? Likewise, tell us of the drawbacks and the advantages of hollow handles.

Whole Wheat Bread

Could you give me a recipe for whole wheat bread? Should it be mixed not so stiff as white bread? War-time desserts are such a problem now, too! I have been reading with interest and pleasure your Corner, and shall watch for an answer to this in it.—Mrs. C. (Colorado.)

I am sorry you have had to wait so long for an answer, but it was an unavoidable delay. In the hope that you will let us help you again to show that you bear us no grudge, I insert here the best recipe at my command:

Break up a cake of yeast (dry or compressed) in half a cupful of lukewarm water. Into another vessel pour two cupfuls of milk and upon this the same quantity of boiling water. Stir into this liquid a teaspoonful of salt and one of sugar. Let it stand until it is rather more than blood-warm, when add to the yeast. Mix with this a quart of whole wheat flour, or enough to make a good batter. Beat with a wooden spoon—up-strokes that touch the bottom of the bowl every time—for five or six minutes. The batter should be as light as a soufflé. Begin now to beat in more flour, and keep it up until you have a soft dough easily manageable with floured hands. Flour the kneading-board and lay the dough upon it. Knead for ten minutes; throw a light cloth over it, and set it to rise. It should be light in about three hours. Knead quickly for five minutes, make into loaves, and when these are light, bake—if the loaves are small, three-quarters of an hour; if large, one hour.

A CORNERITE sends a recipe which she has tried with success, and I can conscientiously recommend:

Oak Hill Potatoes

Cut into meat cubes four cold boiled potatoes of fair size and six cold hard-boiled eggs. Arrange in alternate layers in a buttered baking-dish. Sprinkle well with pepper and salt. Pour over the topmost layer two cupfuls of hot white sauce. Cover with dry crumbs, dotted with butter, and bake brown.

N. B.—For the white sauce use two cupfuls of milk, half a teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of butter and the same of flour.—RUTH C. R. (Indiana.)

We thank you for a tempting addition to our list of meat-substitute dishes. It is easily prepared, economical, and promises savoriness. Now, when flesh-foods are "on the fly," housemothers catch eagerly at such recipes as you have given us.

FIVE decades ago there were only 300 Christians within the bounds of the Punjab Mission, India; now, there are 300 preachers alone, a fair proportion of whom are Moslem converts. Twenty years ago there were only as many Christians altogether as have been baptized during the past year alone. Now the total number of adherents is about 20,000.

No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

READER, ILL. We have laid your very pathetic and appealing letter before the Prayer League, and it will be made a subject of supplication. In your letter you do not state whether you have any church connection, or have in any way sought relief from your troubles at the great Fountain of forgiveness and help. God, if you will only trust him, can bring you out of your tribulation. If you will ask him, in the name of his dear Son, to help you to fight the battle against temptation and to keep you from falling—and ask this daily, persistently, like the importunate woman in the Scripture (Luko 18: 5)—God will give you strength to win. We would advise you to get into contact with some good Christian in your neighborhood, who will give you wise counsel and help you in this battle. The spiritual experience of those who have been through the conflict and come out triumphant is always helpful to those who are still in struggle, and you will find it so. And when you lay your case freely and unreservedly before your Heavenly Father, he will not withhold his help. Remember, he is still the same Lord “who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases” (Ps. 103: 3). Have faith in him, and pray for still more faith. He has promised, and if we do our part he will assuredly not fail us.

W. H. W., Eugene, Ore., writes: “I think I can supply two lines of the song concerning Napoleon, asked for by Mr. Ford in the Christian Herald of September 11. They are all I remember of a song I saw in a book sixty years ago:

“There he can tell of the sights he has seen, ah!
And mourn for his home on the isle St.
Helena.”

“There was also ‘Napoleon’s Dream,’ of which I remember:

“The bearded Russian he scourged again,
The Prussian’s camp was routed.
Again on the hills of haughty Spain
His mighty armies shouted.

“Again Marengo’s field was won,
And Jena’s bloody battle,
Again the world was overrun—
Made pale by his cannon’s rattle.”

H. G., Soudan, Minn. To become a citizen of the United States, you must first make a declaration of intention in the office of the clerk of the county court in the county in which you reside, or in the nearest United States court. Ordinarily, two years must elapse before the final petition can be made, and to obtain your papers you must have resided continuously in the United States for five years, at least the last year of which must have been spent in the state in which application is made. Two witnesses are required. If, however, you desire to enlist in the military or naval service of the United States, you can obtain naturalization papers without a declaration of intention and without proof of the five years’ residence in this country.

S. A. R., Utica, N. Y. The population of the more important warring nations is as follows: United States (continental), 102,826,309; British Empire, 437,947,432; France (continental), 39,601,509; German Empire (in Europe), 66,715,000; Italy (continental), 35,598,000; Russia, 175,137,000; Turkish Empire, 21,274,000; Austro-Hungarian Empire, 50,000,000.

M. G. P., Warren Va. There is no age limit for candidates taking positions under the civil service, except that they must be over eighteen. The civil service office examinations for clerical positions are both statistical and departmental. The salary for a clerical position commences usually with $1,100 a year, increasing to $1,200 in three months, if services are satisfactory. These examinations are not difficult, requiring principally a ground knowledge of arithmetic, English grammar and spelling. The time allowed for the examinations is usually about five hours. Full information can be obtained from the Civil Service Commission, 1724 F Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

F. G., Albin, Iowa. You can obtain full details concerning the work of women in the Y. M. C. A. abroad by writing to the War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A., 124 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York City, N. Y.

No women under twenty-five years of age can obtain passports from the government to go abroad.

Miss E. E. G., Washington, D. C. The Navy Department is in need of yeowomen at present. Applicants should have a knowledge of bookkeeping, stenography or typewriting. The pay of a yeowoman, third class, is $75 per month, with an allowance of $60 for a uniform upon entrance. Applicants should be in good physical condition. The length of service is supposed to be for the period of the war. Apply to the Yeowoman Recruiting Office, Maryland Building, Washington, D. C.

P. H. B., Liu Ho, Honan, Yia Su Chow fu, North China. The naturalization laws prohibit the naturalization of Chinese. The child of American parents born in China is considered a citizen of this country. White persons born in China may be admitted to citizenship by making the usual application for citizenship papers through the courts.

F. R. J., Paterson, N. Y. A parent under the common law is entitled to the earnings of a child until the latter is twenty-one years old. This may be changed by statute, but the law in New York State is the common law. We would further suggest that the child under the circumstances should think well before leaving the father for an uncertainty elsewhere, as the parents might legally disown him, and in that way cut him off from much that might benefit him in later years.

T. K., Youngstown, Ohio. Get in touch with the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Madison Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, New York City.

W. J. T., Farmville, La. Extending about sixty miles north from the Switzerland border, through Alsace, the Allies have long held a battle line in what the enemy claims is German territory, penetrating at some points as deep as twenty miles. The Allied line continues another 100 miles farther north within one to ten miles of the Alsace-Lorraine line. Berlin is 550 miles from Paris.

F. B., Philadelphia, Pa. “Secretary McAdoo has done well in inviting suggestions and even criticisms of the railway management. Let me take advantage of the opportunity to put in a plea for better car ventilation. In most of our trains, summer travel is a punishment when it might be made a pleasure, if electric fans were installed. The average passenger dreads an hour or two of suffering in such an atmosphere, and the commuter nightly shrinks from it as a daily torture. Let the Director-General of our Railroads popularize a new motto: ‘Cool the Car and Win the War.’ Multitudes would be grateful to him for this relief. Sanitary considerations alone would suggest the free ventilation of the sweatboxes in which unhappy travelers are obliged to sit on many of our railways.”

E. C., Cresco, Iowa. Paul evidently looked forward to a condition after death in which the soul exists apart from the body. He said that he was willing to be absent from the body and present with the Lord (II Cor. 5: 8). John in vision saw the souls of the martyrs under the altar. The parable of Dives and Lazarus implies that the resurrection had no taken place when Dives made his petition to Abraham. The corrected translation of the well-known passage in Job 19: 26 makes it read: “Yet without my flesh shall I see God.” We must not forget, however, that there is: natural body and a spiritual body (I Cor. 15: 44). Death is called a sleep by pagans as well as by Christian writers, but as sleep lasts forever the resemblance is significant to Christians, reminding them that death is not a final cessation of life, but rather the transitory state or period out of which the spiritual body shall arise. Any one who denies the authenticity of the Bible is out of place as superintendent of a Christian Sunday school.

Prophetic Conference Nov. 25-27

A CALL has been issued by over a hundred prominent clergymen, Bible teachers and Christian business men for a Prophetic Bible Conference, to be held in Carnegie Hall, New York City, November 25-28, 1918. Among the speakers invited to take part in the proceedings are Drs. C. I. Scofield, A. C. Gaebelin, Mark A. Matthews, Dr. James M. Gray, Ford C. Ottman, David J. Burrell, John I. Carson, A. C. Dixon, W. L. Pettigill and others. Has the Bible any light for these days of war, pestilence, and famine throughout the world? It will be the purpose of the conference and the aim of the speakers to answer this much-discussed question. Requests for literature and programs should be addressed to the secretary of the conference, George I. Dowkontt, 113 1/2 Fulton Street, New York City.

“Closer to the Almighty”

THIS is the philosophy of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, the author of “The Harvester,” “A Girl of the Limberlost,” and other marvelously successful stories—to bring those who read her books “Closer to Nature and the Almighty.” Mrs. Porter has opened the eyes of thousands to the wonder and glory of the world about them. Mrs. Porter, who has spent her lifetime with the birds, the moths, the butterflies, the herbs and the flowers, weaves into her stories the love of Nature, and every one of her novels stimulates the reader’s interest in the life of the woods and fields.

Mrs. Porter’s stories all have, as a fundamental reason of their existence, the author’s great love of Nature. To impart this love to others—to inspire many hundreds of thousands to look for the first time with seeing eyes at the pageant of the out-of-doors—is her gift of rare quality.

Thousands of people have sent the author word that through her books they have been led afield and to their first realization of the beauties of Nature. Through the romance of life and the delights of Nature she directs the mind upward toward the Infinite into an atmosphere that is sweet, cleansing and exalting.

In writing of “A Girl of the Limberlost,” Mrs. Porter said: “This comes fairly close to my idea of a good book. The book can, and does, present a hundred pictures that will draw any reader in closer touch with Nature and the Almighty, my primal object in each line I write.”

Over 3,000,000 Copies of Mrs. Porter’s Books Have Been Sold

ALL large book circulations come from only one cause—the recommendation of one reader to another. Mrs. Porter’s novels are not only wholesome and clean, but they are romantic and cheerful. The people who live in their pages do things and accomplish tasks worth while. In the last six months of 1915 the sales of her books in the United States, England, Australia, and many other places were 625,000 copies for six months alone.

Another reason why Mrs. Porter’s books have so great an appeal is that the whole family enjoys them. They are not for men, women, or children, but for all three; and an important feature is that they will be eagerly read by young people.

Rare Chance to Obtain a Special Edition of Mrs. Porter’s Novels

IT is the desire of the Christian Herald to give its readers an opportunity to procure the best in literature at very reasonable cost. Of the many thousands of books which we have considered, we selected Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter’s novels as the ones which should be in every Christian Herald home. Arrangements have just been completed with the publishers of Mrs. Porter’s works to print a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. These six volumes will be printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear, and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth, with gilt tops, making them especially attractive. Twenty-five full-page illustrations.

Mrs. Porter’s Novels in 6 Volumes

AT THE FOOT OF THE RAINBOW An idyl of central Indiana—a tale of devoted friendship and tender, self-sacrificing love—the friendship that gives freely without return, and the love that seeks first the happiness of the object.

FRECKLES Few books of recent years have sounded such a new and wholly refreshing note as that which dominates “Freckles.” It is a gem, full of beauty and sentiment and well worth reading. It is an out-door story filled with adventure and pleasant atmosphere.

A GIRL OF THE LIMBERLOST This companion story to “Freckles” has repeated the striking success of that book, which, published over ten years ago, has steadily increased its tens of thousands of readers year by year. It is an exquisitely simple love story which stands for true womanhood, as did “Freckles” for pure manhood.

THE HARVESTER Mrs. Porter has lavished upon this unique romance all the wealth of nature lore and nature love from her years of patient enthusiastic study. It is a charming blend of love, romance and the hidden delights of the woods and roads.

LADDIE, A TRUE-BLUE STORY The love story of Laddie and Pamela Pryor, the English neighbors of the Strattons, as told by Little Sister, the youngest of the Pryors, is a genuine “home-story” close to the heart of Man and of Nature.

SONG OF THE CARDINAL A beautiful and touching story of the love of a Cardinal bird for its mate with an appeal to every one who cares for true romance, as delightful for its descriptions of wild life and nature as for its tender human feelings.

Fairy Lands

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WE were coming over the river on a ferry boat, the Best Pal and I. And we were standing together, close to the rail, watching the shore-line grow out of the mist—a shore-line transformed and made wonderful by a myriad lights that flickered and fluttered and glowed across the night.

"It looks like a magic land, doesn't it?" I said at last, "and yet—"

"And yet," finished the Best Pal, "it isn't a magic land at all. It's only Hoboken, and Hoboken isn't a very attractive place as seen by daylight."

I stood beside the rail, thinking of the Hoboken that I know—a rather dingy little city it is—and trying to reconcile it with the vision in front of me—the vision that was vague and softly lighted. And somehow the vision and the reality didn't—fit.

"No—Hoboken isn't a fairy land," I agreed. "I've walked along the docks in the daytime, and it isn't even clean in most places. But here at night time, with the lights on every pier and the dirty little streets in the shadows, it's an Arabian Nights city. And it fascinates me—and thrills me."

"Yes," said the Best Pal softly, "it is an Arabian Nights city. And, even though we know that underneath the glow and the glamour it is dirty and unattractive, we can still thrill to the sight of it. Even though we know that it's only the lights shining across the darkness that fascinate us—they do fascinate us. And I, for one," finished the Best Pal warmly, "am glad that it does fascinate me, that it does cause me to thrill! I'm glad that, even though I know it's Hoboken, I can think of it as a fairy land. I'm glad!"

Our boat bumped against the dock and the scores of other passengers swarmed to the rail. Most of them were in a hurry—in too much of a hurry to see the shore-line that a few lights had transformed from the commonplace into the magical something that is not at all commonplace. Most of them were in too much of a hurry, and we, with a sigh, joined them as they stepped ashore.

A FEW lights can transform a dingy town into a fairy land. Any one who has ever come into a city by night knows the truth of it. A few lights can make a badly constructed building look like a palace—or a scrapheap look like an enchanted hill. Moonlight can transform a river into a miracle of loveliness; the glow of a yellow candle flame can soften a hard face into a quite unexpectedly charming one. Daylight shows a thing as it is—but the lights of the night time, the lights that shine through the darkness, beautify most things and make them more attractive than they are.

To the literal-minded things should be seen as they really are—in all of their stark ugliness or sheer horror. To the literal-minded a building is a building, a dingy town is a dingy town, and a scrapheap is a scrapheap. It is only the person with the gift of imagination who sees beauty and loveliness in a town that is softened by the darkness and lighted by a necklace of lights.

Perhaps the literal-minded person is right. Undoubtedly it is wise to be conscious always of what lies underneath surface beauty—to know that dirt and sharp outlines are there. And yet—

Is it necessary for a person to be so literal-minded that he must always say, when he sees a vision like the vision that the Best Pal and I saw in the dingy little waterfront town, "It isn't really pretty underneath! It's really dirty!" Is it necessary?

Somehow I don't think it is necessary. Somehow I think that it's rather pleasant to have enough imagination to be able to see beauty in things that you know aren't really pretty—to be able to dream pleasant outlines on buildings that the darkness makes indefinite. It's rather pleasant to be able to see a possible genius in a grimy-faced child, to see a possible poem in a badly expressed thought, to see a possible flower in a misshapen bulb.

MY GALLEONS

By Thomas Grant Springer

FROM Lethe Wharf the shadowy ships set sail,
Bound for an unknown port in distant lands.
Upon the yellow gold of glittering sands
Weird watchers send to them the parting hail.

The sun, blood-red, sinks in the western sky,
And o'er the land the hush of twilight falls;
From far inshore a soft-voiced night-bird calls:
The cliffs send back an echo in reply.

Into the dimming, purple void of night
The ships fare forth, each rich with Fancy's freight,
And on the shadow-haunted shore I wait
Till like low stars I see each pale stern-light.

They are my galleons bound for far-off Spain,
Where lie the castled lands that wait for me
Till I too cross the night-enshrouded sea
From which no ship has e'er come back again.

thrilled us. And we were sorry for the people who could not see the romance in the gem-starred waterfront; we were sorry for the people who were so literal-minded that they only knew that the town was a town, and that the lights were lights.

The world is full of harsh outlines and harsher facts. The world is full of tragedy and sorrow. And, so as a poet said,

The sad old earth has need of your mirth;
It has sorrow enough of its own!

It's the same way with imagination, I think. The "sad old world" has need of imagination just as it has need of laughter and mirth. Imagination is a gift that God has given us to soften harsh outlines and facts—to relieve tragedy and sorrow. Imagination is a gift that God has given us that we may keep the spirit of childhood in our hearts and the breath of a song in our souls.

Beaumont B. Buck

HE always signed his name Beaumont B. Buck. Nobody knew, except himself and his parents and a few friends and classmates, what the B. stood for.

This 24-year-old Mississippi boy was only one of a number of young second lieutenants who stepped out of West Point one day back in the eighties. He was sent to posts where he was kept to the humdrum work of the infantry service of the regular army. Therefore the promotion was slow, and in 24 years he had climbed up three grades, so that in 1908 he was commissioned major. Three years in the Philippines made some break in the monotony, and in 1914 he was on the Mexican border. But there was little excitement and little glory in all this. In his fifty-eighth year, being at the time with the Massachusetts National Guard, he was sent to France with the New England Division. This was in June, 1917.

The chance to vindicate his parents' choice of a name never came until he found himself on the desolated fields of France. But he was probably thinking, all this time only of doing his day's work and living up to the traditions of the United States army.

One day at Berzeylesee most of the officers had fallen under a withering fire. Then he put himself at the head of a battalion and gave the order "Forward."

When the French general pinned the medal of the Legion of Honor on the breast of Brigadier General Beaumont Bonaparte Buck he must have been delighted with that middle name.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

SHE was a dumpy little woman in a rusty black dress and a black straw hat trimmed with shabby yellow flowers. Her shoes were of the blunt, ugly kind; and they were not new. As she stepped up on the speaker's platform, her contrast to the other women sitting there—the smartly frocked business women conducting this big rally for the Fourth Liberty Loan—shocked the eye.

But suddenly she began to speak, and all else was forgotten. We sat, spell-bound, staring up into her lighted face and blazing blue eyes. And as she talked, we relived the scenes she was describing. She was just here from Over There!

"I want you to know," she said quietly, "what heroism women are displaying overseas. Then you can decide whether or not you are sacrificing to the utmost here."

She told, first, of a munition factory she had visited, where air raids were a frequent menace. When one occurred, the lights in the factory were instantly extinguished, and the girl workers (the night shift) had to stand motionless, in the dark, with explosives all about them, waiting for certain death or else for the departure of the raiders.

She reminded us, next, of the "Canary Girls": women munition workers in England who quietly volunteer to do certain work which gradually turns their skin and hair a hideous yellow. If these women marry, their children are born with the same yellow skin and hair. Yet more than one English gentlewoman has taken up this work, for the sake of her country!

She told us of the bombing of a hospital behind the lines, and of how the young nurses stuck to their posts. She related thrilling tales of the bravery of women ambulance drivers, women doctors, college girls doing relief work, and Salvation Army and Y. M. C. A. workers.

Her talk was a paean of praise for heroic womanhood; and she terminated it with an incident that brought the tears to our eyes.

It seems that one woman among a group of men and women canteen workers at the front refused to leave when the warning was given that it was no longer safe there. Every other woman left: this one alone stayed on, despite all protests. She was of middle age, and (she declared) alone in the world. So long, she insisted, as she was able to add to the comfort of our boys, by having dry socks and hot coffee ready for them, she was going to remain. And remain she did, mothering our boys, until, one day, a shell fell on the hut she was working in, and a piece of it struck her. It was not quite the end of the story, although it was the end of her. For, the following day, that little soldier was laid to rest with full military honors!

WHEN she had finished, our speaker's voice was husky, and the room very still. She added her brief plea for the Fourth Liberty Loan, and for every other demand made on us stay-at-homes by our boys in the trenches; then she stepped down from the platform. Just for an instant we sat (a roomful of business women) staring at her in a daze of self-questioning. Then, in one great wave, we swept up and around her, promising her soberly that we would sacrifice to our utmost this winter; and that we would pass on to other American women the message of heroism and self-denial she had crossed the ocean to deliver.

As I walked home that night, Christian Herald friends, I determined to ask you—all of you—to help arouse in your neighbors, your communities, a passionate devotion to the cause of the Allies equal to the fidelity of these heroic women overseas. They are willing to die for our cause; we should at least be willing to live for it.

And by "live for it" I mean support it to our very utmost; not only financially but morally. Let us keep the ideals and principles for which we are fighting ever before us and our children and the stranger within our gates! Let us hold weekly patriotic rallies in the town hall. Let us hold indoors (now that the winter has come) the Good News Days you have been holding outdoors this summer.

Think it over, and see if you cannot start the custom of Good News Days in your town. Do it now! Hold one the week this issue reaches you: even if it be only a small neighborhood gathering in some one's parlor, for the purpose of singing patriotic songs, giving one-minute speeches crowded with good war news, and reading letters from men relatives in khaki. You will find that such a gathering will act as a tonic on your community, banishing any pessimism and arousing in every one the same glorious spirit shown by our dear ones at the front.

IF you doubt the joy and worth-while-ness of such an effort, read the following accounts from plucky women who have carried out the plan. This first letter wins the ten dollar prize:

Good News Days Held in a Small Town in Illinois

Our little town of about 1,200 inhabitants has had many patriotic gatherings: Red Cross, Liberty Loan, Young Men and Young Women's Christian Associations, those at our Civic Club, etc. But it is our rule never to be satisfied until we have "gone over the top."

So—in addition to all these other gatherings—we have had two "Good News Days," in accordance with the suggestion which appeared on the Neighboring Page in the Christian Herald early this summer.

The first of these celebrations—held on a July evening—was a lawn party. The decorations were electric lights and Japanese lanterns against a rose-hedge background. And our program was as follows: a general reception first, and then five-minute talks by the guests (each having to take part) on war subjects; and lastly, the singing of patriotic airs. Conversation, refreshments, and a general good time completed the evening.

Our second Good News Celebration took place on an August day and it took the form of a general Round Table held in a private home but open to all the community. At this Round Table letters from our boys Over There were read and discussed: after which a number of timely articles (written for the occasion) were read aloud, awakening great enthusiasm. The subjects of these articles ranged from "The Daily Life in a Big Military Academy" to "The Results of This War." There followed a period of open discussion of war topics; and this was most interesting and helpful. Two subjects we talked over at some length were: "The Call for More Women in War Work Overseas," and "What Can We Do Now to Prepare for Our Boys' Return After the War?" Many fine suggestions were exchanged, and some plans were laid for future war activities in our community.

Next on our program was a war poem written by one of us. After this we adjourned to the lawn, where twenty-two young girls in white were called to "attention," saluted the flag and (marching and singing) formed themselves into a huge letter "G." While in this formation they sang The Star Spangled Banner, retiring to form the next letter, which proved to be "O." This time their song was "When Sammy Comes Marching Home." Their next letter, of course, was another "O," and their song was "Where Will We Go from Here?" After which they formed a "D," and sang "Over There;" an "N," and sang "The Red, White and Blue;" an "E," and sang "Wake Up, America!;" a "W," and sang "Just a Baby's Prayer at Twilight;" and finally an "S," singing "God Save Our Splendid Men."

Their drill received such applause that they were obliged to return for an encore; and this proved to be the word: "France," spelled out at one time by the twenty-two girls. They accomplished that feat by standing at the corners and center of the imaginary letters, stretching out their arms to form the connecting lines. It was a very clever and pretty idea; and while in this formation they sang "Joan of Arc."

The girls were absorbed in these tableaux, as they were in the whole plan for a Good News Day. You see, the idea was something entirely new. Many of the girls had never before been interested in community doings, or our Civic Club work, as they were outside of the club. That was one reason why I chose them for this drill. I knew it would win them over to our Civic Club, and give them a different outlook on our neighborhood.

These Good News Days will not be our last; for the Neighborly influence is spreading, and we hope to keep on holding Good News Days until we have included every one in the community.—Mrs. E. R. WHITE, Neoga, Ill.

Doesn't that adventure thrill you, Neighbors, and make you wish you could roll up your sleeves and go right to work arranging a Good News Day for your own community? I know it does; for on receiving it—the finest of all the letters in the Contest—I wanted to toss my hat into the air and shout "Hur-rah!" I told a New Yorker about it, one day, out of sheer enthusiasm; and she became so interested in the whole idea of our Contest, and of Good News Days, that she told me of a live town in New Jersey, and of a friend of hers there, who would love to get up a Good News Day. So you see, Fellow Adventurers, our big ball has only just started a-rolling. May it amble across the country, gathering momentum as it travels!

MEANTIME, let us hear again from a community that has already tried the plan and found it worth while.

Good News Day Held in a Rural Community in Arkansas

Neighbors in the community in which I live had planned a picnic for the Fourth of July; but after reading, in the Neighboring Column, the suggestion about holding a Good News Day, I at once decided we ought to have one, and that there could be no more appropriate time to meet together and talk over news concerning our beloved country than the day on which she gained her Independence.

I talked about the plan until everyone was interested; and the whole community pitched in and helped get up a Good News Day on the Fourth. It was a catching idea, and very successful. Truly I never enjoyed anything more than that little gathering of rural people!

We discussed the War, and the part our country was playing in it. But we did not forget our Allies. The talks were just splendid, drawing us all closer together; and closer, too, to our relatives and our Allies Over There.

And of course we sang every patriotic song we knew: "The Star Spangled Banner," "America," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," "Over There," "The Red, White and Blue," "Joan of Arc," "It's a Long, Long Way to Blighty." In between the songs we talked of the missing ones who had answered their country's call; and we all had tales to tell of the heroism of our men overseas. I don't think any of us will ever forget it.

Finally we had a short sermon on The War, that would have touched any one's heart, causing them to be willing not only to do all they could for their country and the Allied nations, but all they could for their Lord, who has permitted us to live in a free country and who will, in time, permit us to live in peace again.

At the close a prayer was offered up, thanking God for the Declaration of Independence and asking Him to guide us and our Allies in this war, so that we might fight it for His glory.—Mrs. B. H. SIMMS, Kerlin, Ark.

How I wish, Neighbors, that every one of our dear boys in khaki, standing Over There in a wet trench (perhaps) with a mug of steaming coffee in one hand and a sandwich in the other—food for his body provided by some heroic woman canteen-worker at the front, could have (as food for his heart) this issue of the Christian Herald, so that he could know of these Good News Days held by the home folks.

Won't you be sure to send them these accounts, when you write, and tell them that we have only begun to hold these rallies? We are just getting our start. Perhaps they—your sons or brothers or husbands—will have something to contribute to our next Good News Days: anecdotes or a bit of cheerful philosophy, or only a "God bless you, home folks; I'd like to be there, too!"

Good News Day Held in a Farm Community of Wisconsin, July 19, 1918

We had held community picnics and sings and other celebrations; but never a Good News Day. So we had to let every one know what it was we were planning. This is a community of farmer-folk, and night is our only time for pleasure. So we decided to hold our Good News Day in the evening, out of doors. Our pastor and his wife joined in with a will, helping us plan and carry it through. And it was a happy occasion for all of us.

Nothing blue or sad was allowed on the program. The recitations were all patriotic, chiefly humorous; and some of the patriotic songs were sung more than once. How good that singing did sound, out of doors! The talks were all on the subject of the war; especially our duty to the loved ones who had gone to the front from our town. We were all reminded that it was as much our duty to keep up the spirits of our boys Over There by writing them the right kind of letters, as it was their work to fight. If it did nothing else, our Good News Day celebration sent every woman home promising herself to look on the bright side of the war, no matter what she had to bear; and to send only cheery messages overseas to her "boy."

We had refreshments; but nothing wasteful or expensive. With us, as at most every gathering nowadays, were some of our boys about to leave for a training camp. We sang to them, that night, and all wished them a cheery godspeed. They seemed to appreciate this, as they always have any honor we have shown them here in our neighborhood. And I feel impelled to say to other communities: Plan for a Good News Day when your boys are about to leave you. It reminds them of the things they are going out to fight for; and it helps us at home. May God bless our Good News Days!—Mrs. J. W. QUINCY, Platteville, Wis.

May he, indeed, bless our Good News Days, neighbors of mine! And may we bless all those who took part in this first effort to interest communities in the plan! I only regret that I have not the space to publish here every fine letter I received. I am earnestly thankful for them all.

If there is any one—man or woman—who would like to get up a Good News Day in some community where the plan has never been tried, I shall consider it a privilege to assist in any way I can: by providing programs.

And now, Christian Herald comrades, we must grip hands and part for a brief and busy fortnight.

Christmas Gifts for the Soldiers

THE regulations governing the sending of Christmas presents to soldiers and sailors in the army and navy of the United States have been published after a conference between officials of the War and Post Office Departments and the Red Cross.

These regulations will permit each American soldier or sailor in a foreign land to receive one package of Christmas gifts.

Christmas package labels are being distributed to the army and navy, one to each man. If a soldier loses his label he has lost his chance to get a Christmas present this year, as no lost label will be replaced. These labels should reach the soldier's friend in the United States about November 1.

This distribution is made in France, or wherever the soldier or sailor may be, and the recipient mails his label to the person from whom he expects a Christmas present. The soldier's friend who receives the label takes it to the nearest Red Cross station, where a cardboard box 3x4x9 inches in size will be given him. These boxes must be returned, filled but unwrapped, to the Red Cross collection point. There they are inspected and wrapped, and the labels attached. They must be accompanied by enough stamps to carry them to Hoboken, N. J., at parcel post rates. The Red Cross will attend to the mailing.

No box can be mailed to a soldier or sailor if it contains intoxicants, inflammable material of any kind, liquids, fragile articles, writing or perishable foodstuffs. The Red Cross advises any person intending to send gifts to a soldier to pack food in small tin or wooden boxes (not glass bottles) and to pack gifts in khaki-colored handkerchiefs, all to go packed in the 3x4x9 box. When candy is sent it should be of the hard kinds (not soft chocolates that would crush and soil the other contents).

Navy Regulations

A different set of regulations is set forth for the sailors in Uncle Sam's navy.

Presents for sailors, if sent by mail, must be packed in hinged or screw-topped boxes to facilitate opening and inspecting. Weight and size of boxes are governed by the parcel post regulations. Boxes sent by express are limited to twenty pounds in weight and two cubic feet in volume; they must be of wood, securely strapped with hinged or screw top.

All mailed packages should be addressed as provided by the postal regulations. Express packages should be addressed in care of the Supply Officer, Fleet Supply Base, Twenty-ninth Street and Third Avenue, South Brooklyn, N. Y.

Perishable food stuffs sent to the navy must be inclosed in tin cans or glass jars.

All packages must be marked with the name of the sender and with the words "Christmas box" or "Christmas present." The Supply Officer in New York will open and examine all packages. Christmas packages sent to sailors abroad must reach New York on or before November 15.

Among the Workers

IN the early part of 1918, Mrs. John Boyer of Vancouver, B. C., fell asleep in Jesus. She was converted at a Methodist camp meeting over fifty years ago, and in her early Christian life she had a desire to go as a missionary to the foreign field, but the way never opened. After her marriage she became a life member of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Church. She gave one son to God's service as a missionary, and herself supported as many as thirty children in an orphanage, besides giving in the past six years over $5,000 to the work in China, India and Japan.

MANY a letter comes from war-torn France which makes the watchers at home feel that this strife is not in vain—that something big and helpful is coming out of it all. Such a letter has been received by the New York Jewish Welfare Board from a private in Co. F, 163d Infantry, who writes: "I have an urgent request to make, which I hope will be granted, and that is, to send me an abridged Prayer Book for Jews in the United States Army. . . I simply cannot do without it. It may interest you to know that, after keen observation, it has been borne out very vividly to my mind that atheism is a dead issue on this side. Everybody prays; there are no slack-ers! One thing is certain—after this war, religious observance will be worldwide."

"CARRY ON" is the title of a new magazine on the reconstruction of disabled soldiers and sailors. It is edited by the Surgeon-General's Department of the U. S. Army and published by the Red Cross. It tells of the plans and methods to be adopted in preparing the blind, the maimed, and the otherwise disabled for a self-supporting career after the war. Such is the ingenuity of the contrivances and the skill of the methods used for this purpose that it may almost be said that under the system of re-education, a majority of the avocations now followed by trained men in normal condition will be opened to the rehabilitated. "Carry On" appeals to so many Americans that it deserves to have a big success. Douglas C. McMurtrie, director of the Red Cross Institute for Crippled and Disabled Men, says: "We must count on the return from the front of thousands of crippled soldiers. We must plan to give them the best possible chance for the future. It is no kindness to encourage the cripple to idleness; on the contrary, every influence should be brought to bear to have him accept training and prepare for useful employment."

The Seed and the Harvest

YEARs ago, in 1905, in the secluded valleys of northern Japan, when the nation was exhausted after the long and costly war with Russia, the crops failed and dire famine set in. Thousands of adults and children died and orphans were left by the thousands more. At such a time, Christians in America who had been in Japan and knew the conditions, made appeal for funds and food.

Among those who led in the work of famine-breaking was the big-hearted proprietor of the Christian Herald. He secured thousands of dollars for a relief fund which was wisely distributed by American missionaries on the field. The good done was not only to the bodies of old men and women or youngsters. The harpies were on hand early to buy up girls for immoral purposes. As a matter of fact, the money of the Christian Herald and of other friends of Japan in America saved hundreds of orphans and kept girls to purity of life. At one time, a contingent of 600 orphans arrived at Mr. Ishii's Christian orphanage at Okayama.

Today in 1918, most of those orphans thus rescued are useful subjects of the Mikado. They are, many of them, active members of Christian churches. The city of Sendai, the center of the famine district in 1905, is now the great educational capitol of northern Japan. The largest electrical power-house and plant in the Far East is at an industrial center not far away. The Japanese have learned to utilize the forces of both nature and grace. They heard the Almighty's challenge, "concerning the work of my hand, command ye me."

Thousands of Remarkable Cases

An old lady, 72 years of age, who suffered for many years and was absolutely helpless, found relief. A man who was helpless, unable to rise from his chair, was riding horseback and playing tennis within a year. A little child, paralyzed, was playing about the house after wearing a Philo Burt Appliance 3 weeks. We have successfully treated more than 30,000 cases the past 17 years.

30 Days' Trial

We will prove its value in your own case. There is no reason why you should not accept our offer. The photographs show how light, cool, elastic and easily adjusted the Philo Burt Appliance is—how different from the old torturous plaster, leather or steel jackets.

Every sufferer with a weakened or deformed spine owes it to himself to investigate thoroughly. Price within reach of all.

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 2497 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (pre-paid), or 3 pkgs. for $2.25 prepaid as a special offer to "Christian Herald" readers. So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied, your money will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send for this remarkable tonic today or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.—Adv.

Young People's Topics for November 3

All for Christ, Our Time

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic. Eccles. 12:1-7

WHAT is life? It is only a spark from the Infinite which glows for a minute between the æons of eternity. God gives it and it returns to him, if, while it glowed, it glowed worthily. It is his more than it is ours. How then can we ask how much of it we shall spend in his service? Looked at from the other angle, how better can we spend our time than in his service? What do we know that gives more joy and a greater recompense? Those that hunger and thirst for righteousness shall be filled, and a righteous life goes on through the millenniums of eternity, while the dust that compassed the life returns to the earth as it was and is just dust again.

But some will ask how they can give all of their time, if they must earn a livelihood. While they occupy the flesh, it requires food and clothes and other ministries. It is unfortunate that in so many lives the earning of daily bread is set apart from the serving of God. We should serve God in all our uprisings and down-sittings. If we cannot serve him in the work in which we earn our daily bread, then we must deny him in it, and if we deny him there, we cannot serve him acceptably in our hours of leisure. It is the life of continuous service which Christ craves from us, whether we run a lath, keep a set of books, stand behind a counter, or, as an employer or manager, direct the tasks of others. Unless those who work with us see the life of Christ in ours, such other service as we render will be but lip service and ineffective.

A Friendly Hand to a Foreigner

Epworth League Topic. Acts 13:44-52

THIS topic is based on Chapter III of the Home Mission Study Book, "Christian Democracy in America." The book may be procured, as also special helps for the leader of this meeting, by addressing the central office of the Epworth League, 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill.

America has been the promised land in the eyes of thousands who found life in various countries impossible or too unpromising. To her they have come for liberty, education and opportunity. The great America of today is not great so much because of her Puritan or Huguenot foundations, although without these the temple of liberty could not have been raised, but she is great because of her free churches and her free public education, Christian in thought and expression, even though no creeds are taught. Her public schools and her churches have been the melting-pots in which natives and foreigners mingled on an equal basis, often with the foreigners taking the palm. The hand of America has been stretched out toward the foreigner through more than 100 years; yet many a church has failed to see its opportunity, and often the man of foreign tongue has found himself in an English-speaking church where he was neither understood nor appreciated.

Many years ago the great city churches began to see this opportunity. Beginning with missions in the "slums," the present far-reaching social service plans were worked out item by item and thousands of emigrants who in the light of liberty had broken with the church of their homeland were led through help toward their ambitions into a new and vital union with Christ, becoming thereby both better men and better citizens. Just now, with the war on, problems of social service are largely those of ministering to the women and children and old people, who, while they do not understand all about it, are proud to have their sons in the uniform of Uncle Sam. The foreigner wants to understand America. If he eliques together with those of his own race, reads papers in his own language, and is among us and not of us, that is our fault, because our hand is not held out as it should be.

If the church is to save the country from drifting into socialism minus religion, it must make Christ real to those who have come to us from abroad. It must find a way to prevent wealthy men from using religion as a cloak under which to exploit for profit the sweat of the poor. It must show the man whose ideas of liberty exclude religion, that the greatest liberty lies in the life lived according to the Gospel of Christ, which must translate Christian democracy into life.

The Church's Work in War Times

ON the 24th of September, in the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church in Washington, was held the second annual meeting of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, under the presidency of Dr. Robert E. Speer, chairman of the Commission.

Dr. William Adams Brown, executive secretary, made a report of the year's work, in which he indicated a distinct advance in the consciousness of religious unity, the uniformly courteous and sympathetic attitude of the government, and the increasingly close relations with the two Christian Associations, as well as with the bodies of other faiths. One incident related in the report of the executive secretary was the act of a Jewish committee member who was the first to protest against the removal of the cross from the chaplain's collar.

The War Department, said Bishop W. F. McDowell, was preparing to give an adequate equipment to the chaplains. The training school for chaplains at Camp Zachary Taylor, in Kentucky, is a thorough place of preparation for the great work overseas. Bishop Me-

Dowell's report started several good speakers, among them Dr. F. P. Keppel, Third Assistant Secretary of War, who said "The army recognizes that the work of the soldier is strengthened by the highest spirit of devotion we can maintain. Not the least of its difficulties is in keeping the various agencies from getting into each other's way. There has to be some co-ordinating agency, and that has to lie in the War Department. The spirit in which the chaplains are taking up this work overseas is fine. One chaplain, who was to be honored for bravery in action, together with a number of soldiers, did not appear, while the soldiers did. When search was made, the chaplain was found in the trenches—he had forgotten about the medal."

Chaplain Frazier, dean of the naval chaplains, said that he had seen the number of chaplains in the navy grow from 24 to 185, not because of political pull, but recommended by their denominations.

Dr. Macfarland, general secretary of the Federal Council, told of a Belgian officer who said to him, "I wish you could supply our Belgian army with some American chaplains."

"It is impossible," said Dr. Macfarland, "to imagine a wider difference than that presented by Ludendorff and Hindenburg on one side and Foch, Pershing and Haig on the other. The greatest part of the work must be done over here, to fortify our men for what they must meet there."

Secretary Daniels of the Navy, the Bishop of Oxford and Dr. Guttery of the Primitive Methodist Church of England served as magnets to draw the people.

The Bishop of Oxford, in the course of his address, said "It is one of the paradoxes that no Christian can go out to justify war, yet no Christian could have lifted up his head if England had not gone to war."

And Dr. Guttery: "The world is not big enough for autocracy and democracy, and we refuse to consider terms of peace with the burglar till he gives up the goods. . . . The coming in of America has saved the world, but that thin line of dying British lads before Paris secured for you a world to save."

The War Work Campaign

SEVEN great organizations, at the request of President Wilson, are merging their separate campaigns into a single drive, to be known as the United War Work Campaign, and are asking the people of America to give $170,500,000 to the united work in the week commencing November 11. The National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. are asking for $100,000,000; the National Catholic War Council, which includes the Knights of Columbus, $30,000,000; the War Camp Community Service, $15,000,000; the War Work Council of the Y. W. C. A., $15,000,000; the Jewish Welfare Board, the American Library Association and the Salvation Army, $3,500,000 each.

Five representatives of each of the above organizations have formed a national committee of thirty-five, under the chairmanship of Dr. John R. Mott, who has been elected Director General of the United War Work Campaign.

"On Nov. 11," said Dr. Mott, "the people of the United States will be asked to give the largest sum that has been asked in all history from the people of any nation as a gift. The appeal will come in the interest of a program so all-inclusive that every loyal individual citizen of the United States may back it to the limit, while its leadership includes men who by common consent are acclaimed as among America's foremost citizens. And for the first time in the history of America Catholics and Protestants, Christians and Jews, men and women of every race and party and social group, have come together voluntarily, united only by the common spirit of service, to combine their efforts for the common welfare of our fighting forces."

The object of the campaign is to unite the people of the United States in one vast organization to strengthen the arms of our soldiers in the field in their fight for world liberty. It is believed that this drive will reach into every community, great and small, in the United States. The purpose of the campaign and the budgets on which it is based have been approved by the War Department.

More Women Needed for War Work

WOMEN who are not nurses are urgently needed in war work—women of health and energy and common sense and devotion. The Red Cross alone—and it is but one of the organizations employing women—call for a thousand right now. "Two hundred and fifty for canteen service, more than 400 for hospital hut service, about 450 auto-drivers, seventy-nine for airplane hut service, and seventy stenographers."

These women must be found or the Army will suffer. High schools and colleges will furnish some, others will go straight from their stenography. Moreover, there is being opened in Chicago a "Training School for Woman's War Work," which will gather many, training and testing and showing women "how to get into it." The course is ten weeks long and the subjects are such as will be most likely to be needed—French, simple business, first-aid home nursing, recreation, etc. Any one desiring to know more about it should address the dean, Dr. Lucy Rider Meyer, 4947 Indiana Avenue, Chicago.

Keeping Power on the Job

Many truck owners think that the only big job of any bearing is to reduce friction and to stand up under hard service without wearing out and needing repair or replacement.

This is, of course, vitally important, but equally so is the job which bearings in any motor car, truck or tractor have to do in keeping other working parts operating as they should—the wheels turning true, the transmission gears properly in mesh and the rear axle driving-mechanism steadily pulling its load.

It's up to the bearings not only to keep power flowing smoothly all the way from engine to wheels, but to keep the important power transmitting units from wearing out and costing you money for replacement. The better the bearings the smoother the operation and the lower the costs.

Timken Bearings are especially fitted for this difficult service because the Timken Taper resists the destructive side-pressure (or "end-thrust") as easily as it carries the heaviest direct load, and, moreover, allows wear to be taken up when looseness becomes apparent. Timken Bearings wear as little as any other bearing before adjustment is needed, and can be made practically new at any time by a part turn of a wrench or removal of a shim. Write for the booklet "The Companies Timken Keeps" and see who's using Timken Bearings.

Should Children Ever Be Whipped?

This and Hundreds of Other Problems in Child Training Answered for Parents

THE most disagreeable task in the world to parents is that of whipping a child. No mother or father will inflict blows upon their children unless they feel that there is no other method of securing the desired results. Yet the truth is that whipping is the most ineffective weapon in the entire field of child training and cannot result in making children obedient, truthful, pleasant tempered, or good in any other way.

The trouble with whipping is that the child's mind is not impressed favorably. The physical pain creates a feeling of fear, anger, resentment, revenge, enmity or evasion, according to the child's age or temperament. The whipping itself is remembered—but not the reason for the whipping. So, instead of helping and teaching children, corporal punishment defeats its very aim, in fact, makes things worse. That is why we so often hear mothers say, "I can't do a thing with Marjorie—she simply will not mind, and whipping doesn't seem to do a bit of good."

Good Children for Bad

The true science of child training does not have as its basis for control the fear of punishment. Children who are afraid of their parents are afraid only until the time comes when they can break the shackles that bind them. The only sensible way to instill obedience, love, truth, respect and other desirable characteristics is through a sympathetic and thorough understanding of child nature, and knowledge of methods which have as their foundation confidence, suggestion, parental initiative in co-operation, and parental approval.

Children become habitually disobedient because parents have not secured their confidence. Properly trained children do not require reasons—they obey willingly and without promise of reward. Children "get into all sorts of mischief" because parents have provided no substitute—and the child's pent up energy seeks its own outlet. Children acquire ill-temper, jealousy, impertinence, maliciousness, carelessness, obstinacy and other bad habits simply through the fault of parents who do not know child nature. Instead of shouting commands, instead of inflicting physical punishment, instead of inciting rebellion, the well-informed parent makes comrades of the children, shares their confidence, enjoys their respect, prevents the formation of undesirable habits and creates refinement, culture, gentleness, and love in their hearts.

New Ideas in Child Training

Until recently, mothers have had to solve their own child-training problems as best they could without outside help. But that is now all changed. Mothers and fathers need no longer be slaves to their children—need no longer worry about their children's future—need no longer be at their wits' end for means of correcting and preventing bad habits and of instilling good ones. A new organization known as the Parents' Association has been formed which has solved the problem once for all. Child training has been made a pleasure instead of a hardship securing immediate results in many cases almost over night. The founder of this new system in Child Training is Professor Ray C. Beery, A. B. M. A. (Harvard and Columbia), whose extensive investigations and wide, practical experience have enabled him to provide a simple, well-worked-out plan which any parent can easily follow. The instruction is given entirely by mail.

Nothing Else Like It

Membership in the Parents' Association entitles you to a complete course of lessons in child training by Professor Beery. These lessons must not be confused with the hundreds of books on child training which leave the reader in the dark because of vagueness and lack of definite and practical application of the principles laid down. It does not deal in glittering generalities. Instead, it shows by concrete illustrations and detailed explanations exactly what to do to meet every emergency and how to accomplish immediate results and make a permanent impression.

No matter whether your child is still in the cradle or is eighteen years old, this course will show how to apply the right methods at once. You merely take up the particular trait, turn to the proper page, and apply the lessons to the child. You are told exactly what to do. You cannot begin too soon, for the child's behavior in the first few years of life depends on the parent, not the child.

Free Book

"New Methods in Child Training," is the title of a little book which describes the Parents' Association and outlines Professor Beery's course in Practical Child Training. The Association will gladly send a copy free on request.

If you are truly anxious to make the greatest possible success of your children's lives, you owe it to them to at least get this free book, which shows how you may become a member of the Parents' Association and secure the fine benefit of this wonderful new way in child training. Merely mail the coupon or a postcard or letter, but do it today, as this offer may never be made here again.

Germany Spars for Time as Her Armies Flee

EAST and West, on all the war fronts, the military power of the Hun is broken; but the old arrogant spirit is not yet fully crushed. Germany is fighting for time—fighting to save her face and to make her people regard the discomfiture of all of her plans as less terrible than it really is.

Berlin's reply to the latest American note was dated October 21 and is printed on another page of this issue. In this note the German Government appeared partially to accept the conditions on which the President was willing to submit a proposal for an armistice, although, instead of agreeing that the Allied superiority should be preserved, it based the armistice on the actual standard of power on both sides. The President was asked again to arrange for the fixing of the details, and a significant sentence of the note represents the German Government as trusting, "That the President of the United States will approve of no demand which should be irreconcilable with the honor of the German people and with opening a way to a peace of justice." The German Government denied the President's accusations of inhumanity against its army and navy and proposed that these charges be laid before neutral commissions. It announced that it had ordered its submarine commanders to cease torpedoing passenger ships; and, also, at considerable length, outlined the changes being instituted in the German Government which should make it impossible for any arbitrary power within that government to again disturb the peace of the world. As before, this note was signed by the new Foreign Minister Solf and not by the Chancellor. From other sources, some little light is thrown upon political conditions in Germany which are of special interest just now. The German people and their political leaders, and even the leading newspapers, are openly denouncing the men who only a few months ago they still lauded as heroes. Ludendorff has been called a gambler and military adventurer in the Berlin journals. Von Tirpitz has been assailed furiously in the Tageblatt for his false predictions of success for his U-boat warfare, and told to keep silent. Even Hindenburg is mocked, and no more nails are being driven into his statue.

At a meeting of the Crown Council, Ludendorff plainly admitted that Germany had lost the war—"lost the game," as he is said to have phrased it. Several members of the council bitterly assailed him for his misleading promises of last spring, in which assurance was given of victory. Chancellor Prince Maximilian, who was present, is said to have declared that peace must be made at once, and on the terms stated by President Wilson.

Whether these reports, which come from Copenhagen and Amsterdam, are literally accurate or not, it is certain that the German leaders feel that they are facing a situation which is rapidly passing beyond their control. There is the growing dread of an invasion of German territory also to be taken into account, and it is beyond question that Germany will fight bitterly to avoid that which she has time and again promised to her people would never take place. Meanwhile the Allies are everywhere pressing their advantage and winning back territory from the invaders. It is expected that great events may be looked for within the next few weeks.

STEADILY, surely, with the inflexible logic of cumulative events, the ultimate defeat of Germany and the unconditional surrender of the Hun seemed on October 18 to be approaching with the swiftness of an eagle's flight. The German army, though still in the field and fighting, was in flight in Belgium and Flanders, and the stand it was making in Picardy, in the Champagne, on its badly ruptured Kriemhilde line and north of Verdun, was a stand of desperation, a hopeless stand against odds overwhelmingly great; a last-ditch stand of the wings which must hold if the main army was to make good its retreat.

The Allies' attack northward and northeastward of Ypres, under the personal command of King Albert, which we noted last week as having broken through the German line and being still in progress, proved to be one of the big victories of the war. Immediately the break was established, French and Belgian cavalry surged through and began sweeping up the disorganized bodies of German troops which still offered resistance. The cavalry men by the capture of Thourout cut the communications of the German armies on the coast south of Ostend, while by the crossing of the Courtrai-Bruges road they separated other sections of the German army of General Sixt von Armin, whose seventeen divisions were on October 18 in full flight.

The French cavalry, on the 18th, had advanced to Thielt on the road to Ghent, while the Belgian horsemen had swept past Thourout to Ostend and the outskirts of Bruges. Ostend was evacuated on Wednesday night, October 16. A British airman reconnoitering over the city on Thursday saw civilians making signals and descended to see what it meant. Shortly afterward British naval forces landed and Belgian troops entered the city. King Albert and the Queen were in the city before nightfall, and were given a more than loyal welcome by the liberated people of this former U-boat base.

THE Germans were hurrying eastward along every road left to them, their principal line of retreat being the road from Bruges to Eeloo, which, however was being reached by French and Belgian guns.

To the southward the British struck across the river Lys, taking Menin and pressing near to Courtrai, Tourecoing and Lille, at the same time pressing northward from Douai. Lille, the great manufacturing city of Northern France, whose Lisle thread is famous the world around and whose 250,000 people before the war sent their products into every quarter of the globe; Lille, whose towers had long been seen dimly from the British lines, a standing challenge to Briton and Frank; Lille, for four years Germany's greatest base in France and the Allies' principal objective, defended with the utmost of Teutonic skill and constantly attacked with Allied thoroughness, fell to the soldiers of France's British ally on October 17, without the firing of a shot or the crash of a shell. On the night before the Hun cleared out, the British airmen, flying low over the city, caught the signals of the happy populace, who were able once more, after four years of slavery and terror, to walk in freedom the streets of their own city. British troops were soon marching through the streets, acclaimed by weeping, cheering, happy people. Lille was left unburned and undamaged. The Germans organized new resistance on a line a short distance east of Lille, Tourecoing, Courtrai and Thielt, and claimed to have repulsed British and French attacks. The three days' fighting cost the Germans over 15,000 prisoners and over 130 guns.

South of Cambrai, on October 17, General Haig's British and American troops struck along a twenty-mile line from Le Cateau southward to Bohain, crossing the little Selle River along the whole line and joining up with the French, who had crossed the Oise south of Bohain. The Germans had intended

The Church After the War

Leading Minds in the Various Denominations Give Their Views as to the Opportunity and the Outlook

WHAT is the Church going to do to face the new conditions and the new opportunities that will present themselves after the war?"

The Christian Herald has advised with conservative leaders in Christian thought on this vital question, which has been brought to the front in a very remarkable manner and from many different sources during the time since America's entrance into the world-wide conflict. The conviction has gained ground in many minds that it will be "a new world, with new conditions and new opportunities," when the strife has ceased. Christian love has been drawing the home churches together, and the desire for spiritual cooperation—indeed, cooperation on all lines of Christian work—is now stronger than at any previous time. Many have come out boldly for such a realignment of spiritual forces as will give all the religious bodies a basis for cordial and effective cooperation.

It has been claimed that the whole war is in itself a call for reality in religion, and that the time has come for such a union of Protestantism in America as would revitalize our churches, and make their work incalculably more effective for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom on earth.

The first instalment of these letters is given in this issue of the Christian Herald, and we prefer that they should speak for themselves. The presentation is in the nature of an open forum in which the writer is accorded the largest freedom of opinion. We commend the views expressed by the writers to the serious consideration of our readers and their friends everywhere. They will be followed by others in subsequent issues.

The Time Near at Hand for Restating the Great Truths of the Christian Religion, writes R. C. Wylie, Professor of Theology, Ref. Pres. Theological Seminary.

YOUR communication with reference to the present duty of Protestant America to meet the religious situation as accentuated by the war is worthy of the most careful attention.

The problem, however, is not entirely new. It has engaged the attention of many thoughtful people for more than a generation. It requires new interest, however, because of the war and the religious attitude of our men at the battle front.

Neither is the situation in the camps, namely, the association of men of different creeds, wholly new. Most Protestant denominations have for years been able to meet together in brotherly love, even at the communion table, but without renouncing their denominational creeds. The point that is pressed now, however, and pressed with great emphasis, is that creeds are of little account, that denominational distinctions must be wiped out, and that this is to be done by the elimination of all creedal distinctions.

Since the issue is raised it must be squarely and honestly met. It is useless to deprecate it, or be sorry that it has been raised. We must face it with a sincere purpose, to find the proper solution. In fact, we should be glad to face it, that we may find opportunity to express what we believe to be the truth about it.

It may be wise to inquire, at the outset, how far the religious attitude of men in the army demands a change. Doubtless there is something of a chaotic condition of thought on many religious problems. Our information on this point leads us to the conclusion that there is lack of unanimity in the camps and trenches as to what religious principles one should believe. When facing death, men may see no value in any religious proposition except such as relates directly to personal salvation. There is even a tendency to revolutionize the old creedal teachings on this matter, so as to guarantee salvation to every one who dies fighting in the cause of the Allies, whatever may be his attitude toward Jesus Christ. A moment's thought should show the absurdity of this. And another moment's thought should show that it is a very inadequate creed that tells only how to enter into a state of bliss when we die. We must have a creed that tells us how to live, and how the nations may live at peace with one another.

Certainly, the churches should learn a lesson, as you suggest, from the experience of the Allies. It became absolutely necessary that they should be unified under one commanding officer. It is altogether probable that if this had not been done, the Germans would have reached Paris in the early spring. But the Allied nations not only retained their individuality, they also retained their forms of government and their conceptions of the meaning of the war. Not only the churches, but also the nations, need to be unified under the only Commander who can lead them to victory, namely—the Lord Jesus Christ.

The practical questions to be met are such as these: How much in the church creeds of the day can be given up as of no practical value? To what extent may we expect church people to come closer together in their religious beliefs? Differences of view there will doubtless always be, but a far greater degree of harmony is desirable and possible. How far is it possible for church people to live together harmoniously even when they do not agree on all things? We do manage to live together in a good degree of harmony when there are differences of considerable magnitude. To what extent is this possible and desirable? Is it possible to frame a basis of union that will deal with the supreme religious problems so as to lift the Church above the field of controversy, and thus bring about unity on a higher level than has yet been proposed?

Whether the churches are ready for it now or not, the time is doubtless near at hand when there will be held a great representative assembly for the purpose, not of revising some one of the existing creeds, but for the purpose of restating the great truths of the Christian religion. In any case, the Bible must be taken as the supreme standard of faith.

This War Pressure of Us into Loving Union Cannot but Have Considerable Effect in Winning Us to Ways of Religious Unity, writes Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle (Protestant Episcopal).

THE fervent fire of pure patriotism is warming and welding into unity the hearts of all our people. We are not of the North or of the South, we are not of the East or of the West; we are not of the rich or of the poor; we are not of the learned or of the ignorant; we are not of the native or of the adopted—but we are Americans, simply, unitedly, devotedly.

This war pressure of us into loving union cannot but have considerable effect in winning us to ways of religious unity. Let the churches of all kinds and names heed and welcome and improve this winningness.

Our Protestant Churches May Find a Condition Confronting Them Which Would Compel Submergence of Differences, writes President Wilbur W. White, of Bible Teachers' Training College.

YOUR question, "What should the Churches of Protestant America do to meet the situation?" has reached me here at Camp Logan. I am speaking to secretaries (Y. M. C. A.) of different denominations in the daytime, and to soldiers of different denominations in the evenings. As I have been teaching the Bible in all sorts of international classes and assemblies at home and abroad for twenty-eight years without the suggestion of difficulty in so doing, but rather with every encouragement, you may well imagine where I stand.

Riding with a minister recently, who represents one of the more exclusive denominations, I was asked my denomination. I told him that I am not much of an ecclesiastic, that I can be satisfied with nothing short of the fellowship of all lovers of our Divine Lord and Redeemer. I find myself at home—perfectly at home—with any one, whatever his denominational affiliation, who manifests a vital relationship with God, through Jesus Christ his Son, our Lord.

For years I have considered it nothing less than a crime for the people of God to lag so far behind in efficiency and economy in Christian work. As I read your letter, I turned to the fly-leaf of my Bible and found the following, uttered by the Bishop of Ely, which, with its implications, I heartily endorse: "Would it not be a piece of vain and ignoble hypocrisy if Churchmen and Nonconformists united—as indeed they do unite—to celebrate this commemoration of the English Bible, and yet failed to unite that together they may maintain the rightful place of the English Bible in the education of English children?"

In closing, may I add that it is not beyond the probable, in my judgment, that the Protestant churches may find before long a condition confronting them which, as in the case of the Allies, will compel the submergence of differences and the adoption of the policy of concerted action, in order that the cause which has cost so much and has progressed so slowly so long may be saved from utter destruction to say nothing of its pushing forward to the conquest of the world in obedience to our risen Lord's command.

Rev. Dr. Sheldon (Cong.), Author of "In His Steps Believes the Problem Can Be Solved, if the Church Is Willing."

IN response to your interesting inquiry, "What should the Churches of America do to meet the situation?" as to a union of Protestant forces should say, first of all:

1. A spiritual revival, brought about by the pastors of all the denominations, presenting the new to their people;

2. A systematic propaganda through pulpit and press, giving the facts of church federation, such as the Christian Herald has so effectively done lately;

3. The enlistment of able laymen of means to organize a great American Missionary College to train recruits for interdenominational reconstruction of the world.

I believe all details of the coming union of denominations can be worked out, if the pastors at boards of missions and societies really want such union. If Christ's disciples will only love one another enough to work together, there are no problems too difficult to solve.

The Church's Opportunity Will Come in a Union of Evangelical Forces After the War, writes Dr. David J. Burrell, of the Marble Collegiate Church, New York.

THE close of the world war will present to the American churches such an effort for evangelization as they have never had, and it is just here, in my judgment, that the evangelical forces can best prove their unity in Christ. However the denominations may differ in matters of detail, they are all avowedly agreed as to the importance of bringing men to the saving knowledge of Christ.

At the close of hostilities there will be millions of men returning from camp and firing line who have been forced to face the problems of the future. Here will be fallow ground for the Lord's husbandmen. The fields will be ripe for the harvest. What a glorious ingathering there would be if the churches were to combine to thrust in their sickles, and what a blessed truce in the Church there would be!

A Genuine Spiritual Awakening Would Solve All Our Problems Today and in the Future, writes Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly.

THE Presbyterian Church, of which I am a member, has placed itself on record, by the vote of its last General Assembly, as standing ready to unite with other evangelical churches on a purely evangelical basis and ready to move forward as a united body to do the work of the Master. It is to my mind a very serious question, however, as to whether the Protestant churches could ever be organically united and it is an equally serious question as to whether or not they should be so united; but beyond all question there should be a federal combination, and the interests of the churches should be so pooled as to keep hem from trespassing upon each other's territory, and make them a united power to stand against the forces of evil, and in favor of everything that would advance the Kingdom.

What the Church needs, more than anything else, in my judgment, is a gracious revival of true religion, a spiritual quickening, and power from on high. I am persuaded that when the soldiers come back they will not be concerned as to whether the Church is Methodist, Baptist, or Presbyterian, but they will be concerned as to whether or not it is a spiritual force. Beyond all question, denominational lines have fast faded out at the front, and they must not be too much in evidence here at home. We may be able to do certain parts of our work better if we continue as Methodists, Baptists, Episcopalians, and Presbyterians; but if we push our denominationism to the front, our hands will be tied and our influence crippled. If the churches would unite in lays of fasting and prayer, and if evangelical ministers, irrespective of their denominations, filled with the desire to lead men to Christ, should go through this country preaching the Gospel to the rowds waiting to hear the message, there would, I am sure, be a wonderful response; Christ would be exalted, the Church in every way strengthened, the indifferent church members would be reclaimed, and the whole country would be made better.

This is the day of the Church's glorious privilege. God pity her if she should fail to embrace the opportunity! I do not believe that she will. In my travels through the country I have found ministers greatly concerned to do their best for their country and for the Kingdom, and I have found men more willing to listen to a straight-out appeal to surrender to God than I have ever known them to be in all my ministry. A genuine spiritual awakening would solve all our problems today and in the future.

Vipe "isms" and "cisms" off the Slate and Preach the Old True Gospel as Never Before, writes Evangelist W. A. Sunday.

THE religious situation, as I view it, demands that the true Gospel be preached as never before. There can be no more of a change in the plan of salvation than there can be a new God or Christ, or a new sun or moon.

Reports from abroad and personal contact with tens of thousands of soldiers and sailors at home reveal to me that they are not clamoring for anything new in religion. They are not demanding that denominations be blotted out because Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Methodists, Disciples, chum daily with each other. They did it in civil life without any such demand.

No regiment, corps, battalion or brigade loses its individuality because the men mingle daily.

One writer at the front says: "As the wave of battle sweeps on victorious and the armies carry with them the plaudits and attention of the world, behind them lie the wrecks of men. A group of men follow to gather up these bodies and dig a trench in which to bury our heroes. Almost all the bodies carry letters from a mother or a sister and almost all contain appeals for the boy to give his heart to Christ.

This does not look as though they are tired of Jesus.

A soldier boy wrote me that you couldn't find any fidelity on the firing line, and that the most read book in France is the Bible.

Let the preachers wipe the slate clean of all "isms" and "cisms" and ethical culture stuff that have been proclaimed as substitutes for the Gospel and prepare to preach Christ and him crucified when the boys come home, and they will flock to the churches like doves to their windows.

America will win this war as sure as God reigns, but she must not lose her soul in doing so by becoming materialistic, as Germany did in her half-century of preparation for the war.

A Deeper Realization of the Leadership of Jesus Christ Alone Must Prevail, writes Dr. Francis E. Clark, Christian Endeavor's Founder and President.

[HAVE no doubt that the war will bring about great changes in the attitude of the soldiers toward religion. Some will be strengthened in their faith, others will find the old ties loosened and their faith in God and in the church waning. Undoubtedly, sectarianism will receive a severe blow, though I do not think that a wise, broad-minded and brotherly denominationalism will necessarily be injured. Certainly there will be a got-together-ness after the war, that we have not known before.

"The one great Leader" under whom we must unite "for the drive against the hosts of sin" must be Jesus Christ. It is inconceivable that it should be the Pope of Rome, the Archbishop of Canterbury, or any of our popular free church preachers. In this respect the analogy some one suggests, between Marshal Foch, as the head of the Allied forces, and the head of the new allied forces of the Church, would break down. But in the spiritual sense, the analogy is true. A deeper realization of the leadership of Jesus Christ alone must prevail. He is the only one under whom all can rally. Every denominational name must be made secondary and subservient to the name Christian, not in theory but in practice.

I hope I shall not be considered as taking an undue advantage of the opportunity kindly offered me by the editor if I remind my readers that we already have a great federation of young Christians in the Christian Endeavor Society in all lands, which embraces the young people of over one hundred denominations in a genuine working fellowship, without in any way weakening their allegiance to their own churches. The Federal Council of Churches is another most hopeful move in the right direction. Why should not such a federation be still further enlarged, and a strong bond of union thus be established among the older people of all the evangelical churches?

The Church's Only Course Should Be One of "Watchful Waiting," to Be Prepared for Such Actions as May Be Required, writes Bishop Greer (Episcopalian).

IT is difficult if not impossible to state what the churches of America should do to meet the situation after the war, for the reason that it is almost impossible to know what the situation will be at that time.

The only course for the Church to pursue at present is one of watchful waiting, and then to be ready to do whatever the situation, when it occurs, may require.

The Church, as the Conservator of the Nation's Spiritual Life, Must Ever Keep in Mind the Sacred Work Intrusted to It, writes W. R. Moody, Head of the Northfield Schools.

NO specific answer can be given to the question. Of course there are some people who are ready to state exactly what the Church must do after the war, and doubtless such people have always existed in similar crises of the world. We hear that the present condition is unique. That, I suppose, has been said of every great war and social upheaval since the time of Christ.

Having spent the greater part of the past six months among the soldiers, both in camps and in hospitals, I am not prepared to say that I find men very different now from what they have always been, and this has been the experience of many who have had long terms of service with the soldiers at the front. By strange coincidence, a letter was received from a British chaplain who has seen two and a half years of service with the British forces during the war, from which I quote as follows:

I do not believe there is any revival of religion at the front. I am sure there is not. . . . The atmosphere of warfare does not make for a revival of religion. What I am convinced has happened is this: War has not changed men. It has rather made them more what they were before. It has intensified, rather than recreated, character; and that brings the whole matter right back to homes and churches. If men come unstained and unsullied through life in any of the war zones, it will be because of the ideals of purity, and honor, and chivalry, and faith that they learned before they went into it.

I believe this testimony will be that of many others with the same extended experience, and the lesson is clear that the Christian Church, as conservator of the spiritual life of the Nation, must ever keep in mind the sacred work intrusted to it—the preaching of the Gospel and the fostering of the spiritual life of men.

The Old Hostile and Controversial Spirit Has Perished, writes Dr. C. I. Scofield (Cong.), Eminent Bible Expositor.

LET us keep the historic verities. The fraternization of Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist and Episcopalian is not a new situation created by the brotherhood of arms. For fifty years those and other Protestant denominations have worked together in an ever enlarging fellowship. The two great expressions of that fellowship in the Young Men's Christian Association and the Red Cross antedate the war. In the trenches today not one in ten thousand of our Christian heroes ever heard a sectarian sermon. The old hostile and controversial spirit has perished.

The proposed remedy for an imaginary evil, "one great leader," is a perilous and desperate resource. The moment in which a candidate should be proposed would witness new and sharp divisions. The whole suggestion is monarchical, and not in the democratic spirit pervading the Christian message. "He that will be chief among you let him be servant of all." God has strange ways of choosing his leaders—he may still be trusted. Let us look with hope and sympathy upon any real awakening which may come, but be assured that if an attempt is to be organized to put the Hun theology at the head of Christ's host, there will be music by the band.

Our Soldiers Will Come Back From the War, Lured by the Church as They Knew It in Their Yesterdays, writes Bishop Quayle (Methodist).

MY own observation of the mood of mind of the American people and of the American soldier would lead me to believe that, instead of the soldiers coming back to America after the war universalized in regard to religious affairs, they will come back lured by the Church as they knew it in their yesterdays.

I do not see the signs which would indicate that there should be a Holy Protestant Church, fashioned after the likeness of the Holy Catholic Church. My judgment is that these matters are a little inclined to be hysterical at the present time, and are not as serious and important as some folks seem to think.

There should be no scuffling amongst churches, but there is need to be a hobnobbing of all churches.

Men will be men after the war, as before the war, and home things will look pretty good to the soldier who has not seen home for a long time, and to go to his own church and sit in citizen's clothes with his own folks will be a merrymaking to him like the conversation of angels.

The Way is Prepared for a New Alignment of America's Protestant Forces, writes Rev. Everett C. Herrick, First Baptist Church, Fall River, Mass.

AFTER serving for two months and a half as a camp pastor and a Y. M. C. A. secretary at the same time, I have come to have a strong faith in the spiritual power of a united and cooperating Protestantism.

The question is asked, "What shall the churches do?" Most certainly they should seek to do, and not simply to discuss. If conventions, addresses and resolutions could have brought the Kingdom of Heaven, it would have come long ago.

This world-shaking war and the great work of the Y. M. C. A. have prepared the way for a new alignment of the Protestant forces of America. It is not so much one name, as one aim, that we need. After what I have seen in the camps and what I have heard from those that have been across, I am praying that God will give us some kind of authoritative leadership. I believe that for the most part the churches will be ready to follow. We do not need to surrender any of the things that are sacred to us as denominations, but simply to get together with a common program and leadership.

There is a sectarian press that needs to be muzzled and there are some denominational leaders who need reconstruction. We all need arousing to the fact that the world can never be the same as it was before 1914, and that the time has come for the Colonies of Protestantism to become a Federated Republic in the Kingdom of God.

The Bible Still the Authoritative Word of God—Stand by It with Conviction, writes Rev. Dr. Haldeman, First Baptist Church, New York.

IN response to the question you recently addressed to me, I would say: If the Bible was the authoritative Word of God before the war, it must be the authoritative Word of God after the war. Men may change, God's Word cannot. Let the preachers preach the Bible as it is to men. Let them be sure to give them what it says and give it to them as "thus saith the Lord," stand by it with conviction that it is a "thus saith the Lord," and let the consequences take care of themselves. God will take care of his own truth.

Liberty Loan Goes Over the Top

HANDICAPPED by spreading influenza and harried by conflicting currents of peace talk emanating from Teutonic capitals, the Fourth Liberty Loan seemed, at the beginning of the third week of the campaign, to be threatened with failure. But America has never feared great endeavors, has never been dismayed by great difficulties. Whether it was Manila Bay, St. Mihiel or the greatest National Loan in the history of the world, the American spirit has always carried us on to victory.

The last day of the campaign opened with five-sixths of the loan covered and a full billion to raise. In countless communities, the loan committees made it a day; house-to-house canvasses were repeated, street corners sprouted bond booths, traffic cops blocked traffic to speed the loan, mass meetings stirred those to do more who thought they had done all they could, and banks set aside the ordinary business of the extraordinary business of Liberty. From early morning until midnight, in an ever-increasing stream, the subscriptions poured in. On Saturday morning, only the St. Louis district had its quota officially raised. Minneapolis, unofficially over the top for several days, was not yet able to count the actual subscriptions, but was drawing close; Boston, fighting the worst and most widespread epidemic of influenza, was still third in the race, and Dallas, fighting business stagnation due to drouth, was fourth, the New York district had $800,000,000 to get to reach its quota and Atlanta was making a brave fight, with only 51.3-10 per cent. in hand. All the cities were having a hard pull, but all were pulling with every ounce of steam in their greatly multiplied army of bond sellers. Thus the day began and thus its hours passed, and at midnight the Treasury Department was able to report that it had satisfactory assurances that every district had reached its quota, while oversubscriptions would run well above $500,000,000. Cuba, with a quota of $6,000,000, took $10,000,000 in bonds.

To make this victory possible more than 25,000,000 people, men, women and children, had entered the lists of bond buyers. The Third Liberty Loan, for $3,000,000,000, found 17,000,000 buyers who overbought it $1,176,000,000, while 10,000,000 people oversubscribed the $3,000,000,000 of the Second Loan by $1,617,000,000, of which $808,000,000 was issued.

PRESIDENT REPLIES TO AUSTRIA. President Wilson, on October 19, sent to Austria the separate reply promised in his note to Berlin. The first paragraph of the note is as follows:

"The President deems it his duty to say to the Austro-Hungarian Government that he cannot entertain the present suggestions of that government because of certain events of utmost importance which, occurring since the delivery of his address of the 8th of January last, have necessarily altered the attitude and responsibility of the Government of the United States."

The note then explained that the previous demand for autonomy for Austria's subject peoples no longer covered the situation, since the United States had recognized the Czechoslovak National Council as a de facto belligerent government and had also recognized the Jugo-Slavs.

The note closed:
"The President is therefore no longer at liberty to accept a mere 'autonomy' of these peoples as a basis of peace, but page. Coming just as we were going to press it is impossible to forecast the possible action of the Allied governments. Such newspaper comment as is available indicates that the note is variously felt to indicate that Berlin is not ready to admit defeat yet; that the note marks a certain degree of progress toward unconditional surrender. Many papers consider it hypocritical, while others look upon it as a sincere attempt to avert disaster on the fighting front as well as on the home front, there having been mutterings of Bolshevism and the German ruling powers apparently fearing PACKERS NOT GUILTY. The Federal Trade Commission, which early in the summer startled the country by making public widespread charges against the great packing interests, more especially against Wilson & Co. of Chicago in which they were accused of attempting to sell to the army and navy meat unfit for food, on October 15 completed its formal inquiry into its own charges and announced that not one had been substantiated by the evidence. Rejections, of which much was made in the charges, proved to have been due to rigid army and navy regulations rather than to inherent unfitness in the good offered for sale.

SIX BILLION FOR THE ARMY. The House of Representatives on October 18 passed the military deficiency bill carrying appropriations of six billion of dollars, of which the navy was to spend $107,217,000 and the War Risk Insurance Bureau $70,000,000. The bill was designed to supply deficiencies in appropriation arising since the passage of the regular supply bill. Part of the new requirements was caused by the expansion of the plan for the army abroad. The new plans contemplate a total force of 4,850,000 men of whom 3,600,000 would be in France and the balance at home. I was announced on October 18 that the Yanks in France, Russia and Italy numbered more than 1,900,000 and that America had in France 8,390 trained airmen with 6,210 others ready to sail. The plans contemplate the training of 30,000 airmen and the formation of 450 squadrons.

BOHEMIA IS FREE. On October 18 the Czechoslovak National Council in Paris issued a declaration of independence from Austria in which the duplicity of the Hapsburgs for 300 years was reviewed, and Bohemia's right to self-government declared. At the same time, as a culmination of a general strike the Czechs seized the capital of Bohemia and the Czech flag once more waved over the Hradschin Castle in Prague, while Czech money was placed in circulation. Austrian authorities appear to have regained control by the next day. The Czech army in the Ural and European Russia having given up Samara on the Volga, was reported, on October 15, as about to withdraw into Siberia until Spring because of difficulty in maintaining communications. This army has several times recently been reported short of ammunition yet on October 19 it was reported to have administered a severe defeat to the Bolsheviks near Ekaterinburg, killing 1000, taking three armored trains and some guns.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Copenhagen dispatches of October 16 reported that the German Federal Council had accepted a proposed amendment to the constitution of the Empire which provides that "The consent of the Federal Council and Reichstag is required for a declaration of war in the Empire's name, except in a case where Imperial territory has already been invaded or its coasts attacked." . . . The fast approaching eclipse of the German army has emboldened the Danes to raise the question of the return of Schleswig and

Text of Germany's Reply to President Wilson

London, Oct. 21.

The text of the German note in reply to President Wilson, as received by wireless, is as follows:

In accepting the proposal for an evacuation of occupied territory the German Government has started from the assumption that the procedure of this evacuation and of the conditions of an armistice should be left to the judgment of the military advisers and that the actual standard of power on both sides in the field was to form the basis for arrangements safeguarding and guaranteeing this standard.

The German Government suggests to the President that an opportunity should be brought about for fixing the details. It trusts that the President of the United States will approve of no demand which would be irreconcilable with the honor of the German people and with opening a way to a peace of justice.

The German Government protests against the reproach of illegal and inhumane actions made against the German land and sea forces and thereby against the German people. For the covering of a retreat, destructions will always be necessary, and they are carried out in so far as is permitted by international law. The German troops are under the most strict instruction to spare private property and to exercise care for the population to the best of their ability. Where transgressions occur in spite of these instructions the guilty are being punished.

The German Government further denies that the German Navy in sinking ships has ever purposely destroyed lifeboats with their passengers. The German Government proposes with regard to all those charges that the facts be cleared up by neutral commissions.

In order to avoid anything that might hamper the work of peace, the German Government has caused orders to be dispatched to all submarine commanders, precluding the torpedoing of passenger ships, without, however, for technical reasons, being able to guarantee that these orders will reach every single submarine at sea before its return.

is obliged to insist that they and not he shall be the judges of what action on the part of the Austro-Hungarian Government will satisfy their aspirations and their conception of their rights and destiny."

INFLUENZA UNDER CONTROL. On October 18, although the influenza had become epidemic in practically every State of the Union, and churches, schools, movie shows and all public gatherings were closed or suspended over most of the country, the health authorities felt that the disease was under control. The army camps, which had been hardest hit of all, on that date reported a marked decrease in new cases, both of influenza and the attendant pneumonia. The total of cases in the camps, from the beginning of the epidemic to October 18, was 279,945 cases of influenza, 42,675 of pneumonia, with 13,681 deaths. New York and Philadelphia, both of which had been hard hit, were beginning to gain control on October 20, although deaths from both diseases were still around 700 daily in New York.

GERMANY'S LATEST NOTE. Germany's reply to President Wilson's note of October 14 was received by wireless on October 21 and is printed in full on this

As a fundamental condition for peace the President prescribes the destruction of every arbitrary power that can separately, secretly, and of its own single choice disturb the peace of the world. To this the German Government replies:

Hitherto the representation of the people in the German Empire has not been endowed with an influence on the formation of the Government.

The Constitution did not provide for a concurrence of representation of the people in decisions of peace and war. These conditions have just now undergone a fundamental change. A new Government has been formed in complete accordance with the wishes (principle?) of the representation of the people, based on equal, universal, secret, direct franchise.

The leaders of the great parties of the Reichstag are members of this Government. In the future no Government can take or continue in office without possessing the confidence of a majority of the Reichstag.

The responsibility of the Chancellor of the empire to the representation of the people is being legally developed and safeguarded. The first act of the new Government has been to lay before the Reichstag a bill to alter the Constitution of the Empire so that the consent of the representation of the people is required for decisions on war and peace.

The permanence of the new system is, however, guaranteed not only by constitutional safeguards, but also by the unshakable determination of the German people, whose vast majority stands behind these reforms and demands their energetic continuance.

The question of the President—with whom he and the Governments associated against Germany are dealing—is therefore answered in a clear, unequivocal manner by the statement that the offer of peace and an armistice has come from a Government which is free from any arbitrary and irresponsible influence, is supported by the approval of an overwhelming majority of the German people. SOLF.

the occurrence in Berlin of something like the commune which marked the birth throes of Liberty in France. There was no indication coming from any of the Allied capitals of the attitudes of the governments toward this latest note. The correspondents transmitted the impression that the only reply that could be made to Germany would be to "see Foch next."

FRANCE FLOATS LIBERATION LOAN. On October 20 France offered for sale bonds of her newest loan. Through an avenue lined with 1500 captured cannon, a parade of Allied soldiers, led by American troops, marched to the enthusiastic acclaim of thousands of happy French people. Though it was pouring rain Paris made it a fête day, the first since the war began. A subscription booth was opened inside the pedestal of the monument to Lille in the Place de la Concorde. In the midst of an enthusiastic meeting a white-haired man forced his way toward the stand. He proved to be the Mayor of Lille. Asked to make a short speech, he said: "For four years we asked one day after another, 'Shall it be tomorrow?' The morrow came Thursday." The Mayor of Rheims met the Mayor of liberated Lille with the greeting, "We have both suffered for France."

"GREEN GROCERS" and Some of Another Color.

by W. Livingston Larned

THE conversation really started when the tall, thin gentleman by the window made this remark:

"You can say what you please, but grocers, as a class, are unprogressive. It's very difficult to help them, for they can't help themselves."

There were four of us, and we sat in the day coach of a short line train.

I am frank to admit that I was the unprofessional member of the group. The tall, thin personage happened to be an Advertising Agency representative. The stoutish party was a "Travelin' Man," and the good-natured, smiling chap, who wore a liberty Bond button done in gold, was in charge of a tractor show exhibit.

I had started the ball rolling. We were bustling through a picturesque village and suddenly came to a full stop on the main street. Just across from the tracks stood a country grocery store.

It was a one-story affair of rather primitive appearance, and the small new window bore no semblance of artistic attention. A big black cat lay asleep on a pile of cereal boxes.

WHEN I think of grocery stores," I ventured, "I always go back to the one memory of such things that lingers—the grocery store run by good old Mr. Hobbs in 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.' That grocery over order makes me think of it."

"I never waste any sympathy on these country grocers," said the Advertising Man, "and I'll tell you why. We have a number of accounts that find outlet through the grocery trade. As a class, grocers are unprogressive. Look at that window—full of dust, spider-webs, dirty packages, and a cat! Let the chances be that the proprietor has a dozen beautiful colored lithograph window displays under his counter at this very moment."

"The average country grocery store isn't very neat," admitted the Tractor Expert.

"No use attempting to argue it out with them," put in the Advertising Man; "the divine spark is missing."

"I can't believe that the margin of profit—now, particularly—permits of such missionary work," I suggested.

The Traveling Salesman, who had been silent up to this moment, launched himself into the conversation.

"I'm mighty glad to hear you defend the grocer," said he. "In any event, there are three classes of groceries—not counting the chain-store variety. They can't be judged alike. That little shop across there," pointing through the window, "is Class Number One—the cross-roads, country town grocery; the one that hasn't grown up; never will, ever can. I think it would surprise you to know the struggle those stores have. They are on the frontiers of civilization. They have a limited territory to draw from. Let's consider that ramshackle yonder. I can tell you something about Peter Rodney, who runs that particular grocery. I happen to know him."

"Go ahead!" snapped the Advertising Man.

"THERE'S not much romance in the place," resumed the Traveling Salesman; "just horse sense and hard work and the exigencies of the game. Peter Rodney's grocery is going through an inevitable transition. He belongs to the old régime. Twenty years ago, Rodney ran a smart grocery. It was an extremely popular store. The town wasn't built up as it is today, but people drove over from other parts. Men and materials wear out. That's the idea I want to get over. He has had one helper all through the years—the business wouldn't stand more. In the meanwhile, five streets down, large money interests have put in a very large and a very pretentious grocery—for a place as small as this. There are two progressive little spot-cash places. Sixteen hundred grocery mail order catalogues go through the post office here every third month. Every other family has its own War Garden. And this has crumbled up our old friend Rodney."

"Tell me this," broke in the Advertising Man; "isn't it true that this man Rodney could keep pace with the times if he wanted to?"

"Come, come!" answered the Tractor Expert, who could not resist the temptation to butt in; "you must take into consideration that men who carry on this line are not essentially business types—not analysts. They do the best they can with what they have."

The Traveling Salesman nodded.

"The grocery game is one of the most difficult," said he, "and I mean that. A man works harder in it for his profit than almost any other trade. It's constant grind and constant fighting. Credit is almost necessary, and people somehow treat grocers as they do dentists and doctors—pay them last."

"GO in a grocery some morning . . . one of about THAT size. Not more than two people are making sales. Orders are always fussy little items. There is much weighing and measuring and computing. A grocer's day is the shortest day on the calendar. Night comes a few minutes after he has opened his doors. He hasn't the time to do all these fine progressive stunts others plan for him."

"If twenty manufacturers send twenty shipments of booklets or leaflets for free distribution, it's one man's job to keep them going. Yet someone invents a counter-stand with a patent pocket. And the grocer is supposed to see that booklets are kept in that pocket. Along comes a window cutout that is as complicated to set up as a Chinese puzzle. The fellow who invented it can't fit it together outside of an hour. I am amazed at the amount of time-consuming material that is distributed to grocers."

"There are more mortalities in the grocery business than in hundreds of others. That's because it is an exacting business."

"Now let's look on the brighter side—the optimistic side. Your modern grocer, even in a small village, is being greatly assisted by both the manufacturer and his advertising and advertising agency. You advertising fellows are doing more good than you would indicate by your recent remarks, but you are at your best when you are intensely practical—and uninvolved. War has temporarily inconvenienced the package goods; there are restrictions in the matter of sizes, and all that, which peace will bring back to the old wise status. Advertising is growing to be the mainstay of the grocer. It creates a steady and sure demand for easily handled lines. It creates hosts of friends who settle upon one grade and one trade-marked brand—and stick to them."

"Advertising departments take it upon themselves now, more than ever, to call on the grocer and to arrange displays for him. They realize he is a busy man. They set up the windows and canvass the town and even arrange their own newspaper and pamphlet campaigns. If the grocer is entirely and wholeheartedly receptive to this proffered assistance, he is sure to profit."

"This new generation of grocers is learning, among other things, that there is psychology to salesmanship. Women grow to depend upon a grocer and his constructive advice. They consult him. Business is becoming a problem of making friends. It's all a mistake, this established conviction that all grocers are dull and stupid and unprogressive. Take the rank and file of them, and you will find neater stores, greater efficiency, a higher order of arrangement and stock selection. Your modern grocery store is really a delightful shop to visit. It looks good, smells good. The shelves are a constant treat to the eye and to the senses."

"Nor has the 'chain store,' with its tremendous momentum, financial backing and unique system of economic production, secured a monopoly. It has been my experience that purchasers prefer the smaller groceries."

"CERTAIN things can't be done. I know a country grocer on a cross-roads. He was reared in the community, and everybody knows him. I dropped off at his place one day last week. It shocked me to see the change—an air of desolation and discouragement. Very little in stock. But you could read the handwriting on the wall. It was as plain as day. That grocer was unwilling to live in the present. He still sold bulk goods as he did twenty years before. People, in the meanwhile, through the medium of magazines and even local newspapers, had learned to ask for certain lines. They know the latest of this or that. If a new breakfast cereal is put on the market, they want it . . . and they ask for it . . . and they keep going and asking till they get it."

"That grocery was dying for lack of nourishment—the kind of nourishment that advertising brings. It never kept anything the people asked for, and they did not want what was left. As for the future of the grocery business, now that there is a certain, definite promise of peace and a progressive resumption of 'on-the-job-as-usual,' there is no finer line. Americans eat well. They insist upon quality. Even the workingman's table is spread with good things. We are willing to sacrifice much, but nutriment, never. In six months from now, competition will be very keen and times good. Mr. Advertising Man, you will help in all this, you have been helping."

The train was speeding on, past miles of fine farmlands, with their glistening white silos and their handsome barns, and their acreage waiting for the new season. It was a beautiful and inspiring sight.

"It's God's country, isn't it?" the Tractor Man reflected, as his eyes followed the horizon.

"America is just beginning to progress!" muttered the Advertising Chap; "the whole world looks to us. War has made us a nation without parallel. We are respected, loved. I think even the jealousy has disappeared. They know we are not without consideration for the lands beyond the sea."

FOR my part, I was thinking of the lonely little grocery store by the tracks and of Peter Rodney.

"You had something more to tell us of that place," I hinted. "What was it?"

The Traveling Salesman took a sheaf of paper from his pocket.

"See this?" said he. "It's an order for goods from Peter Rodney, Jr. And the lines covered are the advertised brands. The boy takes over the place next month. I visited them one day last week. Plans have already been drawn up for a three-story brick building. It will be a modern grocery with modern stock."

"But it took the new generation you spoke of to turn the trick," interrupted the Advertising Man.

"The minute the boy got in he insisted on changes," suggested the Tractor Expert. "I find it that way in my line; the boys know a good thing when they see it; they are willing to smash precedent and tradition."

"I don't like to break in on your dreams," said the Traveling Man, "but old Peter himself had the plans drawn up. He was the one who started the boy off along new lines. It was his idea, from first to last."

"That spoils the story," growled the Advertising Chap.

"Can't help it," was the response; "it's true. And that's why I say it's a mistake to judge these old fellows too hastily. Did you ever stop to think that tearing up a store is almost equivalent to asking a dear old mother to blossom out in fancy silks and satins? She might attract more attention and look younger, but we love the simple brocades of yesterday. Peter's store knew him as a boy. He knew every syrup-stain on the floor—every spider that spun a web. And that big black cat is a member of the family. It keeps the store clear of rats and mice. You can't catch a grocery-store rat in a trap—they are too wise. It takes a cat—and a black one—to get 'em."

"Still," observed the Advertising Man, "business failure forced the old man to make the change."

"Perhaps," continued the other. "I wish I had Peter's money. He owns a farm of eleven hundred acres and is a director in the local bank. Both of his daughters are in France right now, doing Red Cross work—they were educated at Vassar."

No one said a word for a moment or so.

Finally the Advertising Man ventured a question.

"Tell me," he exclaimed, "how is it you know so much about this subject. You talk as if you knew every grocer in every town in this section."

"I do," was the reply. "I'm a salesman for a grocery house, and I have been covering the territory for the past twenty years. That's my line."

CHAPTER ONE

AMOS THATCHER, the old photographer of Bradford, was honestly perplexed on that memorable day when the town decked itself out in all the flags and bunting and welcome banners it could buy, borrow or secure, when the boys came home and the whole town turned out to greet them.

There are certain events in the history of towns as in that of individuals which are epochal and deserve to be so treated. Such an event had come to Bradford. When Ambulance Company 241 had entrained for its camp, there had been no banners, no bunting, no brass band, no decorated streets and office buildings. The boys had gone away in rather a quiet fashion. Fathers captain, and he was coming back with decorations pinned on him by Clémenceau himself). And there was the depot and the incoming train, and the churches, and the G. A. R. and the mayor and city officials, and the fire department, and the procession which had formed and was even now extended all the way from the depot to the post office.

To be sure, there were two other photographers in Bradford, but they were women, and Amos secretly sniffed at them and their outfit as altogether impossible and inadequate for the great occasion.

He had flitted nervously all over town that morning, getting snapshots of nearly everything, but had finally come down to the depot to catch the boys at the exciting moment of their arrival.

He planted his camera up against the end of the depot, put his black box with its plates down by it, and in turning around as he rose, he knocked the hat off a man in the crowd.

DR. WARD smiled again, and returned Amos' pleading look with one that meant a yielding affirmation.

"Mary is at the other end of the platform with the rest of the high school. But—oh, well, come, Sarah, Esther. It is one day out of a lifetime. Give Amos his chance.

"Out here!" cried Amos, eagerly pushing through the crowd to a sunny spot outside the circle around the depot.

And the crowd turned with real interest and amusement at the sight of Dr. Ward, his wife and their oldest daughter forming a group for Thatcher.

For in all the history of Bradford's far no one had ever known Dr. Ward to have his picture taken, far less to stand for a group with his wife and daughter.

SO the crowd was at a high tension of excitement as it viewed the unusual sight with almost as much interest as Amos himself, who when he had succeeded in positioning the doctor and Mrs. Ward and Esther as he wanted them, turned about to find ever person at that end of the little depot standing in a half circle, as if they were a real audience at a real show.

Amos grinned at the sight, but turned his back on the crowd to give the doctor a direction. "I can't get a good picture with your hat on, doctor. You will take it off, won't you? Just a little farther in, Miss Esther. There! That's better. Mrs. Ward, if you please, a trifle back just a trifle. Thank you."

Amos held up his hand, adjusted the dot on his head under it, and at that precise moment an engine whistle blew! They're coming! They're coming!

The whole crowd surged down the track. Dr. Ward, dragged by Esther and Mrs. Ward, followed and Amos emerged from the black cloth to find his picture slipping into the shouting, hurrahing mass of Bradford's best citizens in that moment of real life.

Amos threw up his hands. Then he grabbed all the implements of his profession he could hold and followed the crowd to get whatever he could as he groaned over the marvelous pictures and group going to waste on every side.

AND truly no picture or series of pictures could do justice to the home-coming of Ambulance Company 241. The people ran out in front of the engine and surrounded the train on all sides. Old Jim Wilson, the engineer, pulled up and stopped before he was within a hundred feet of the depot platform and climbed down out of his cab and joined the welcoming mob. There were so many scenes that an army of photographers, to say nothing of one Amos Thatcher, could not have got them. Men and women were crying and laughing and shouting and calling out the names of sons and brothers and husbands and lovers crowding up on the steps of the coaches, trying to swarm into them, while the boys inside yelled to get out and Jim Wilson stood helpless by the side of his engine, wiping the tears off his cheeks with an oily rag and swearing under his choking breath that he would be another day late getting into Bayview, next station to Bradford.

But when the boys finally succeeded in getting out of the coaches and out of the arms of their respective fathers, mothers, wives, sisters and lovers, the company formed for its place in the procession; for Men and women crowded up on the steps of the coaches while the boys inside yelled to get out

"WHY don't you"—Amos started to complain irritably, and then almost with comical rapidity his own hat came off and he dived down after the other man's.

"Dr. Ward! I beg your pardon! All my fault! Here!"

He picked up the hat and handed it to the man, who took it with a smile that seemed to irradiate the atmosphere in a circle like a personal halo.

"It's all right! All right, Thatcher! I got in your way."

Amos Thatcher looked at Dr. Ward wistfully. "That's fiction, doctor. But we understand you. Tell you what! While we're waiting, give me a group! You and Mrs. Ward and Esther. Where's Mary?"

"Down at the other end of the platform," said the doctor. "But I—"

"Don't refuse me, doctor. Think of it! Here I have loaded down with hydroquinone, and sulphite of soda, and carbonate and bromide of potassium, and pyro at six dollars a pound, and hypo, and alum, and acetic acid at a dollar and a quarter a gallon, and metol at one hundred dollars a pound. Think of that, doctor; and it used to be five dollars! And just think of the pictures going to waste here today!" And Amos groaned as his eye took in the wealth of impossible chances on this day of Bradford's great celebration.

"You don't mind just this once, do you, doctor?" Amos pleaded. "You have never given me a good chance at you, and here is Richard coming home with the Croix de Guerre and all that and I want Mary in it too."

and mothers, sisters and sweethearts, had come down to the train and there had been abundant leave-taking after a fashion, but nothing exuberant or demonstrative. When the train finally pulled out there was a cheer and some waving handkerchiefs and hats, and hands reached up to the windows out of which the boys were leaning, and bundles and baskets of fruit and candy and lunches were caught at by smiling-faced lads, and the crowd had lingered around the station until the train was out of sight. And then it had scattered very quietly and soberly, and eyes that had bravely and steadily looked into other eyes undimmed, now filled, and the step faltered in anticipatory thought of the unknown future for Ambulance Company Number 241.

BUT the home-coming! Ah! That was a different story. Bradford put on all its holiday and convention clothes. It spread its colors lavishly to the breeze. There was not a store, an office, a house, or even a barn, without its token of welcome. Main Street was a fluttering rainbow. The little depot which had not been painted for a good many months was almost covered up with the colors of the sky, the sunrise and the starlight.

And the tragedy of it all to Amos Thatcher was the plain fact that he could not be everywhere at once to get all the views he wanted. There was the Main Street and the post office and the court house and Dr. Grant's home (Grant was the company's Bradford was not going to be cheated of that procession, which it had projected in its imagination almost from the very day when Ambulance Company 41 had left for its training camp.

The company would much rather have gone straight home without any fuss, but it good-naturedly understood the situation and with more or less simulated protest consented to be lionized.

They formed up in the place assigned by the marshal of the day, right behind the band, composed of high school students, boys and girls, proud of the honor, and waltzing with excitement. The lines of citizens up the street through which the procession was to pass had fallen into the middle of the road in their eagerness to see the company, and were wondering at the delay, as all people at all processions always wonder.

But the delay was excusable, for it was caused by the one company ambulance which Number 241 had been permitted to bring home as a trophy.

This ambulance had a history, and all Bradford had more or less knowledge of it. But the thing itself was what Bradford wanted to see almost as much as the boys themselves. Bradford was proud of its two mounds in the courthouse square at the base of the Soldiers' Monument, cannon of an obsolete pattern captured by the Boys of '61. But the younger generation knew nothing of their history, and only an occasional veteran would stop as he slowly crossed the square and lay his trembling hand on the cold lip of the cannon's mouth, and linger a moment, memory traveling back over the fifty years.

BUT the ambulance of Company 241 represented a new type of war, with new and strange weapons and appliances that even high school boys and girls understood, and when, after considerable delay, the well-shattered car was brought out and cranked up, Bradford within seeing distance of it sent up a cheer that was heard beyond the postoffice and broke the line of waiting delegations in the procession. The people who had been waiting impatiently there, mostly the older men and women who were not related to the company, broke from their places and surged down the street to the depot, and the marshal of the day, old Judge Grayson, in vain tried to reform the waiting lines. His horse, which was almost as old as himself, backed over the curb onto the sidewalk and threatened to march hind-first through Deacon handler's grocery store. The judge had not been a horse for a good many years, and he soon found he had all he could do to reform himself, to say nothing of the impatient lines of citizens who swarmed down to see the ambulance and followed its course up the main street in a tumultuous, hurrahing and altogether undignified manner, old men and women walking and dancing in front of the car like boys and girls at a circus parade.

There was enough of the famous ambulance to go to its own power, and Richard Ward, Dr. Ward's younger son, was at the steering-wheel, which was just the upper half of its circle. The whole car was battered up enough to satisfy the pride of every Bradford citizen. "It sure has been to the war all right," one after another said, eyes glancing now at the boys, now at the dumb but not silent witness of the company's share in the greatest war of the world. The sight of that ambulance after a while acted on the crowd in a curious way. As the procession slowly climbed the grade of Main Street, the shouting and excitement and noise grew less and less. The car heezed and rumbled. A great ragged rent right through the main body of the old covered sides revealed where a piece of shell had torn. It was a rent which the boys had tried to mend by tacking over it a piece of folded canvas cut out in the shape of the red cross. The top of the radiator had been shot away, and only one wheel had all its spokes left. The frame had been bent and twisted out of plumb, and the whole thing wobbled over the street in a drunken fashion that required a skill born of acquaintance with its antics to steer it so as to prevent it skidding to the populace on one hand and backing down the street on the other. But as it rumbled along on that tiny memorabilia in Bradford annals, it seemed to be a thing of majestic and heroic build, its faded, rusted, misshapen form telling of the grim struggle "over there." The mud of France was still clinging to the fenders, and what was once the lifeblood of human beings stained the seats and floor and even the sides of the wheels within. No wonder if Bradford, by the time the company had come as far as the courthouse square, was quieter, almost as if it had begun to catch the real meaning of the story which the old ambulance had not only seen but made. For this is the story of the ambulance of Company 241, as told by Archie Nelson that night to a crowd in the National hotel lobby, after the reception was over and most of the boys had gone home to their own folks. Nelson is a lone sheep and had no relatives in Bradford and is staying in the hotel that night.

AT the request of the crowd, most of whom had heard the story before, but not at first hand, Archie gave the details, the crowd standing and sitting around in a rapt silence which embarrassed Archie, he said he was not used to saying anything unless he had to yell louder than a six-inch bomb.

"You see, we were at Belleau Wood, over the ridge east of Buresches, Dick and Bert Chaudler and two other boys—"

"You were there, weren't you?" a voice interrupted, the only interruption Archie noticed.

"Well, of course; I'm telling the thing as an eyewitness would tell it," Archie acknowledged as he continued; "and it was pouring rain to beat Flanders, and that is pouring some. My hair is wet yet from Flanders. Well, we had driven the old car down the ridge, where we picked up three fellows and were giving them first aid when a bunch of Boches jumped out of a clump of trees and began throwing hand grenades. We picked up the men we had been working over, loaded them into the car, and Dick started her up the ridge, chug, chug, chug, through the mud and over the holes, while Bert and I leaned up against the back end of the establishment so the fellows inside wouldn't slide out, and to give the old engine a heart, for she was beginning to have palpitation and compound fractures. Well, we were within twenty feet of the top of the ridge, when a machine gun in the woods let loose on our right, and the first volley took the half of Dick's steering-wheel right off and also the best part of his right hand. He went on steering with his left and all that was left of the wheel, when a grenade took the top of the hood off and clipped several spokes out of the off front tire. And at that minute the old engine went dead on us, just as a company of negroes broke over the crest of the ridge flinging grenades at the Boches and singing 'It's a long, long way to any breakfast.' They quit singing long enough to yell a cheer for the Red Cross, and then swarmed down the ridge into the clump where the machine gun was spitting. Bert and I leaned as hard as we could against the old car, but we couldn't budge her. Then what happens but one of the fellows we had picked up and shoved into the machine seemed to come to life. At any rate he backed out off the floor where he'd been lying, and as his feet hit the mud he said, 'Excuse me, fellows, for butting in, as I don't belong to this company and was never introduced, but there's nothin' the matter with my legs if my eyes is gone. And it strikes me your old buggy lacks pep!' He leaned up against the thing alongside of Bert and me, his face streaming with blood and rain, and if you will believe me, the old thing began to move! Not very far, for nothing less than a steam jack could have shoved her uphill through that mud, but just as she began to sag down again what does that engine do but begin to thump again, chug, chug, chug, with Dick sitting there minus one hand, working the mixer with the other, and steering with his teeth or something.

"The fellow who had slid out to push fell down when the engine started with a jolt, and Bert stepped on him accidentally, pushing him deeper into the mud. But we had leaned over to pick him up and put him back into the jimikisha, and had just got his head up to the end of the side cot, for one of the other fellows had slid off that onto the floor, when, bang! comes a shell, and slams right through the barouche, carrying away the cot and killing one of the boys inside. But the engine kept a-going and just wheezed over the ridge as a covey of shrapnel pattered around us and got Bert in the shoulder and me in the leg. And as we began to slide downhill, we could hear the negroes yelling and singing, 'It's a long, long way to any breakfast!' as they charged over the machine gun and captured the whole bunch of Boche grenadeflingers. After he got out of the hospital Dick got the Croix de Guerre, and who should get the same at the close of the next day but Private Henry Munson of the 369th Infantry, formerly of the old New York Fifteenth, a negro regiment? Munson was the first negro to get the Croix de Guerre, but a lot of them got it later. His company stood grinning in the pouring rain (it was still raining) while Munson received his honor, and when they broke ranks they were singing 'It's a long, long way to any breakfast, but we's gwine to git some now!' And you can be sure they did get some, the first bite, though, they had had for fourteen hours.

"Oh yes, and I forgot to say that the fellow who had lost his eyes but not his legs, and who helped push the buggy out that ridge, was a marine by the name of Sam Rogers. He had gone over the slope with a handful of marines just a few minutes before the 369th Infantry. Bert and I helped get him into the first base hospital, and as we laid him down he came to and began to sing a line of the Marine Band Chorus:

'If the Army and the Navy ever gaze on heaven's scenes,
They will find the gates are guarded by United States Marines.'

We heard of Rogers before we left France. He is totally blind, but he is an expert stenographer and typewriter, with a good position in Kansas City, and one of the most jolly fellows you ever saw. He says he owes his life to Ambulance Company 241, and I guess he does, but maybe we owe ours to the extra push he gave us over the ridge at Château-Thierry."

THE next few days at Bradford were days of excitement and much visiting and talking. The boys declared they were more exhausted at the close of each day than they had ever been on the hardest field of battle. But the home-coming was so great an event that they reveled in the lionizing, and Bradford gave several days to it. The ambulance with due ceremonies was installed as a permanent trophy on one end of the platform of the City Hall, with a neat worded account of its adventures under a glass cover hung on one side, and the list of its heroes on the other. It was difficult for Bradford, in making out this list, to make any special note of individual heroes, and no attempt to do so seemed practical. As time went on, however, after the excitement of the first days of the welcome had subsided a little, a few persons emerged from the group and grew more distinct and outstanding than the rest.

Among these was Richard Ward, Dr. Ward's son, the driver who had lost his right hand at the ridge of Château-Thierry.

"Dick," as Nelson called him, and as he was known to every man in Ambulance Company 241, was an average American boy, one of thousands whom the Great War had developed into a grown-up, if not serious-minded, man. The first day that Dr. Ward had an opportunity to study his son's face he was reminded of one of John Oxenham's poems, in which a father is pictured as asking his son what he has seen "out there." Dr. Ward silently sat facing Dick, but inwardly he was going over Oxenham's verses, "Face to Face With Reality:"

"What did you see out there, my lad.

That has set that look in your eyes?

You went out a boy, you have come back a man.

With strange new depths underneath your tan;

What was it you saw out there, my lad,

That has set such depths in your eyes?"

"Strange things, and sad, and wonderful—

Things that I scarce can tell;

I have been in the sweep of the reaper's scythe,

With God and Christ and hell.

"I have seen Christ doing Christly deeds;

I have seen the devil at play;

I have gripped to the sod in the hand of God.

I have seen the godless pray.

"I have seen the devil in petticoats

Wiling the souls of men;

I have seen great sinners do great deeds,

And turn to their sins again.

"I have sped through hells of fiery hail,

With fell red-fury shod;

I have heard the whisper of a voice,

I have looked in the face of God."

"You've a right to your deep, high look, my lad,

You have met God in the ways,

And no man looks into his face

But he feels it all his days.

You've a right to your deep, high look, my lad,

And we thank him for his grace."

THEY were sitting in Dr. Ward's little study off the library room and talking about Dick's plans for the future.

"I haven't any, Dad," Dick had answered in response to his father's direct question. "What plan have you? You see, Dad, none of us has had much time to plan for careers. We have had so many careers in the old ambulance that we don't seem to care for anything common."

"How about the university? You haven't given up the thought of college?"

"I don't know." Dick's reply was slow and hesitating. "I was half way through, you know. I don't feel much like starting in again. The old class is scattered. Some of it is in Alaska, and pieces of it in Jerusalem. And you know, Dad, I'm not like Albert. He always said he was going to graduate with a degree when the war was over, even if it lasted a hundred years. But Albert was a scholar. You know, I never was."

"Yes, your brother took to books," Dr. Ward said calmly. His gaze traveled from his living son to a picture on the top of his writing-desk, the picture of a young man in officer's uniform, with the aviation wings of silver across the breast. And by the side of the picture a framed letter.

Dick, following his father's look, seemed surprised, as if seeing something for the first time. He started up and put out his hand, his left hand, to take the framed letter, and paused to throw a questioning request at his father, who was gazing at him thoughtfully.

"Yes, read it. Your mother put it up there this morning. You haven't seen it yet. Every word in it is just like Albert."

Dick, with a reverence he would never have exhibited to any stranger, took the letter and read it standing. It had been found on the body of his brother after he had met his death in an air duel and sent to Dr. Ward by Albert's company officers:

Father of all, Helper of the free, we pray with anxious hearts for all who fight on sea and land and in the air to guard our homes and liberty. Make clear the vision of our leaders and their counsels wise.

Into thy care our ships and seamen we commend; guard them from chance-sown mines and all the dangers of this war at sea, and give them the victory. To men on watch give vigilance, to those below calm sleep.

Make strong our soldiers' hearts and brace their nerves against the bursting shrapnel and the unseen fire that lays the next man low.

In pity blind them from the sight of fallen comrades left upon the field.

O God of love and pity, have compassion on the wounded; make bearable their pain or send unconsciousness.

To surgeons and dressers give strength that knows no failing and skill that suffers not from desperate haste.

The Promises

TEXT—II Peter 1:4. "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature."

PETER was a poor man. Time was when, as a well-to-do fisherman, he owned his boats and nets; but when Christ said "Arise and follow me" he left everything to follow him. Thenceforth he lived from hand to mouth. Did it pay? He seems, at least on one occasion, to have had his own misgivings about it; for we hear him saying, "Lord, we have left all to follow thee; and what shall we have?" The answer, however, must have satisfied him: "No man hath left anything for my sake and the Gospel's but that he shall receive an hundredfold in this world, and in the time to come life everlasting!"

Every Christian knows the meaning of this "hundredfold" here and now. Who shall measure the joy of sins forgiven, or the comfort of the everlasting arms in times of sorrow, or the spiritual ecstasy of certain brief moments in the trysting-place when "heaven comes down our souls to meet?" But they are nothing to what awaits us. For so it is written, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

When Joseph was in charge of the granaries of Egypt he caused the chaff to be floated down the Nile, so that sufferers from the famine in the Delta might be advised that up above there was plenty and to spare. Thus the present compensations of the Christian life are but an earnest of things better farther on. "The milk and honey," Bunyan says, "are beyond the wilderness." They are ours, to use a lawyer's phrase, "in reversion" or by promise only. It was thus that Peter, however poor in this world's goods, could nevertheless congratulate himself on being rich toward God.

It was thirty-odd years after his conversion that he wrote the "general epistle" in which our text occurs. Here, as it were, he opens up his strong-box full of promissory notes: and behold, every one of them is as good as gold or better. Were ever such "securities" as these?

TO begin with, he characterizes these promises as "exceeding great." They are so because they cover all the necessities of life from beginning to end.

They stretch backward over all the past. Here is one of these promises: "I will cleanse thee from all thine iniquity whereby thou hast sinned against me." How exceeding great that is! And there are countless others of like import. Peter was once a moral bankrupt; but when God canceled his obligations there was no "deficiency judgment" that could ever shake its finger at him. The record of the mislived past was blotted out, sunk in the depths of an unfathomable sea, east behind God's back so that it was no more remembered against him. And the same is true of every sinner who, by accepting Christ, falls in with the overtures of the grace of God.

They cover all the present. "Who knoweth what a day may bring forth?" But what matters it? I am secured by an exceeding great promise, "As thy day, so shall thy strength be." Before sunset I may lose my dearest friend; but even so I shall not mourn as those that are without hope, since I am assured of a happy reunion with him. I may be confronted by some temptation so formidable as to threaten my very spiritual life; but I am promised "a way of escape out of it." I may be stricken by some mortal malady, but though the cold fingers of the King of Terrors touch my heart-strings, I will not fear, since the rod and staff of the Omnipotent shall comfort me. "Lo, I am with thee always, even unto the end!"

They reach on through the interminable æons of the future. I have the exceeding great promise, "In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you." There will be no cramped-up limitations in the home of many mansions; no waiting in a long slumber till the place is made ready for us; no going alone, since Christ has promised to "come again and receive us unto himself." And after that there will be no going out again forever.

Forever with the Lord;
Amen, so let it be;
Life from the dead is in that word;
'Tis immortality!

OBSERVE, also, these promises are characterized as "exceeding precious." Promissory notes are to be estimated at their face value. A man who recently died was reputed to be a millionaire; but his strong-box on being opened was found to contain little else but speculative mining stocks and other I. O. U.'s not worth the paper they were written on. The value of "securities" depends on three things.

First, the denomination of the note. All God's promises are for things of inestimable value. The wealth of all the millionaires on earth could not purchase the faintest glimmer of the hope of everlasting life.

Second, the responsibility of the signatory must be considered. God underwrites his own contracts and he has boundless resources wherewith to fulfil them. All the treasures that lie buried in the bosom of the everlasting hills are his. His word is buttressed by omnipotence. "The voice that rolls the world along speaks all the promises."

Third, the authenticity of the document must be taken into the reckoning. Is it properly signed and sealed? And is the signature genuine? Any bank will honor a certified check. The divine promises are all certified with a "Thus saith the Lord." More than that: he being "willing to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel hath confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." (Heb. 6:17-18). These two immutable things are his Word which is yea and his oath which is amen; as it is written, "All the promises of God in Christ are Yea and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us" (II Cor. 1:20).

FURTHERMORE, Peter affirms that all these promises are through Christ. He has been congratulating his friends on their knowledge of God as revealed in his only-begotten and well-beloved Son. To know God is life eternal; but it is impossible to know God except as he has unveiled himself in Christ: "whereby," says Peter, "are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises."

Therefore, if we are to make these promises ours it is necessary at the very outset to know Christ as our Saviour. One of my old parishioners was accustomed to say in his prayers, "All our blessings, Lord, come swimming to us in thy blood." This is true. Without the Cross no blessings beyond the ordinary gifts of Providence would be assured to us.

And we must know Christ not only as our Saviour but as our Mediator. At his death in our behalf the veil of the Temple that hung before the Holy of Holies was rent asunder; so that by "a new and living way" we might enter in and bow before the blood-sprinkled mercy-seat. We have no assured entrance there except "in his name." We offer no effectual prayers except "for his sake." In him as our divine intercessor we have carte blanche at the throne of the heavenly grace; for so it is written: "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you."

And, if we would attain unto the full riches of his grace, we must know him also as "the first-born among many brethren"; that is, as our Elder Brother. There are many sons of God by adoption, but there is only one begotten Son. To him belong all the rights of primogeniture; but he shares his inheritance with those who believe in him. Thus "by faith we inherit the promises"; becoming "heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away" (I Peter 1:4).

AND finally we are here informed as to ultimate purpose and consummation of these promises; namely, "that by them ye might be partakers of the divine nature." Here is a great mystery. We may not be able to comprehend its full significance; but we know some things leading up to it.

We know for one thing that man was created in the divine likeness; free from sin, erect, self-respectful and "able to think God's thoughts after him."

We know that somehow we have become alienated from God. Nothing but sin could do that. And "there is no difference, for all have sinned." On every forehead is inscribed "Iehabod," "the glory hath departed."

And we know that a way has been provided in the Gospel for our return to God. The immeasurable gulf that separates between a sinner and a holy God is bridged by the Cross. "He that believeth in the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved." The middle wall is broken down by the omnipotent hand that was pierced for us. Thus we may regain our lost estate and become once more "partakers of the divine nature." This is in pursuance of that wonderful prayer of Paul, "I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, that he would grant you according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge; that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God."

IF the foregoing facts are rightly stated, then we are bound to conclude that these exceeding great and precious promises are for Christians only. There is not one promise in the Scriptures that a non-Christian is warranted in claiming except that which assures him of salvation by faith in Christ.

If this be resented as unfair, the following fact will justify it:

First, my non-Christian friend, you have all the good things now that you are willing to accept at the hands of God. The gifts of his providence are yours. "He maketh it to rain upon the just and the unjust." You breathe his air and eat his food, possibly without the common courtesy of thanks. What do you deserve? "He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. If he had, you would not be in the land of the living today."

Second, you can have all the additional blessing of his grace for the mere taking. Nothing is asked of you but an acceptance of Christ, from whom a blessings flow. Faith is merely a hand stretched out to receive what is offered without money and without price. Grace is free. "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

Third, you will not. You decline to accept eternal life in Christ as a gratuity. What more can God do? What would you do in his place? He once gave manna free and plenteous as hoar-frost to the starving Jews in the wilderness, requiring only that they should gather and eat it. Suppose one had said "I refuse it on those terms; if the Lord wants me to eat manna he must force it upon me. I will sit down here and open my mouth and wait for it." Would you have fed that man?

THE Bible is a strong-box of promises. Peter was enriched by possessing it. So may you be. But surely you cannot complain if you refuse or ignore it. The Lord has said that he "will not turn aside the right of a man." You have a sovereign will by which you may cross the beneficent purposes of God. It is your right to be saved if you choose. But you have an equal right to be lost; and it is for you to say which it shall be.

At one of our military posts on the frontier an old Indian used to beg for pennies. He was a pitiable object in his ragged shawl and buckskins. One day a soldier asked him about a leather cord on his neck. He drew it forth and showed a chamois bag enclosing a bit of parchment on which was written a certification by General Washington that, for services as faithful guide in the Revolutionary War, he was entitled to a pension for life. He was potentially rich and had nevertheless grown old in poverty. The exchequer of the Government was his to command, up to the full measure of his need, and he had never taken advantage of it!

But what greater folly is this, to be advised of one's spiritual inheritance and still reject it? "Come now saith the Lord, and let us reason together." What could be fairer than the offer of life for the taking? But whether it shall be taken or left is for each to say. God has done all that he can for us.

When the Boughs Are Bare

WHEN the boughs are bare, and the rustling leaves
Flit over the fields where they bound the sheaves;
And the stars shine keen, and cold, and high,
Where the pale moon sails through an alien sky;
And the sun lags late in the mornings chill,
And sinks too soon in the evenings still—

Then the pulse beats strong, and the eyes shine bright,
And the hands are sure, and the feet are light,
And the quick thought leaps, and the strong will springs,
And the work is wrought with a heart that sings,
And the doing of deeds makes life seem fair—
'Tis the work-year's June, when the boughs are bare!

Shadow and Substance

SUNDAY, November 3. Col. 2:17. "Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is Christ." In the urgent concerns of religion, how prone we are to live in the shadows and not in the substance of things! We remain in the unsatisfying phantoms: we do not abide in reality. We do not pass through the shadow into the substance. For, in the realm of religion, material things are the shadows. The visible and the tangible and the transient thoroughfares lead into the glorious temple of the Unseen, the holy sanctuary of the real and eternal. We take the bread and the wine at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but the material elements are only the shadows of the heavenly feast. Our journeying soul tarry with these we do not inhabit reality; we are in the realm of phantoms, however seemingly impressive the service may be. The substance is Christ, and it is only as our soul reverently presses forward to the spiritual bread and wine that we pass into the august realities of the sacrament. And so it is with all external ministries, and with every ecclesiastical and devotional ordinance and institution. We must distinguish between the shadow and the substance, or leanness will come into our souls.

Indeed, in the only truly vital sense of the words, we never inhabit reality until we abide in Christ. And yet, how we do dwell in the shadows, and how we pursue them! But when, at last, we do enter into our Dwelling-place, there is a strange and wonderful sense of home. It is not that our quest is ended when we make our home in the Lord; it has only just begun. We are at rest for quest; we are like mineral explorers who have found the precious location, and who have just sunk their shaft into the buried wealth. We, too, have found our Mine, and there stretch before us the endless veins of the unsearchable riches of Christ. We have discovered Reality. Everything else is a shadow—this alone is Substance. "Thou, O Christ, art all I want!" J. H. J.

The Grace of Courage

MONDAY, November 4. II Peter 1:5. "Add to your faith courage." In every age of the world men have set a high price on courage. At first courage was wholly physical. The caveman wrestled with beasts of prey. With bare hands he throttled the lion and rent asunder the jaws of the cave bear. Ages swept by, and man, having conquered the beasts of the field, turned conqueror of his fellow man. He was king among his fellows who had the thickest neck, the stoutest arm, the swiftest feet. As man climbed up the steep heights of knowledge, there dawned upon his mind the idea of a higher type of courage—a courage calling for self-denial, devotion to higher ends than self-preservation. We have not yet reached the summit of that mountain. People in large numbers still see no beauty in the courage that renounces one's rights. But the summit beckons on, and we are climbing still. Courage means more to us than it ever meant before. It is more evident that tenderness may be courageous, that even weakness may be courageous by the very renunciation of its own strength. A friend wrote to the father of a young aviator who had fallen to his death from an airplane in England. "The spirit that defied the air here shall conquer the heavens there." Certainly the spirit which fights worthily the moral battles of life deserves to be immortal. If God is, and if he is just, the soul that is fit to live can not be defeated by the accident of death. God is, and he is just. Our efforts as Christians must be to square our conduct and our character to the demands of a worthy immortality. C. C. A.

Indifference and Division

TUESDAY, November 5. Amos 6:6. "They are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph." Thus Amos rebuked the Jews of his day for their religious indifference. Joseph had been chief among his brethren; to him had been given a double portion of the inheritance of his father, and his two sons, Manasse and Ephraim, had become the ancestors of the two most numerous tribes of the people of Israel. Scripture therefore speaks of Joseph as the representative of the entire race of the Jews.

In the days of Amos the Jewish nation was sadly divided. A rival kingdom had been established by Jeroboam in opposition to proud and headstrong Rehoboam. There was a royal palace at Jerusalem, the ancient residence of Israel's greatest kings, David and Solomon, and another at Samaria. Civil wars were waged between the twelve tribes, and in order to hold their own each side would enter into ungodly alliances with the pagan kings around them. The mighty nation, which in the days of David had been the terror of the heathen, and in the days of Solomon had received tribute from distant peoples, had become weak through internal strife. The heathen mocked it, and took advantage of its weakness to increase their own strength. Worse than this political division, however, was the divided condition of the church. The ten tribes which had gone with Jeroboam no longer came to worship with their brethren in the true faith at Jerusalem, but had set up their own worship, and that an idolatrous one. The great men of the nation, the kings with their counselors, the priests and scribes, made no effort to have this sad division removed. They proclaimed peace where there was no peace. They were at ease in Zion. They cried down Elijah, who rebuked them, as a disturber of Israel, and forbade Amos to prophesy again any more at Bethel, the king's chapel and court.

The affliction of Joseph still exists, not only among the political organizations of our day, but, worse than that, in the church, which has been split into many denominations and sects. The greatest power for good in the world is thus weakened. All Christians should grieve of this affliction, and labor that those who have erred from the faith may be brought back to the true teaching of God's Word.

Sons of God

WEDNESDAY, November 6. I John 3:1. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God." By the new birth of the Spirit, we are made sons of God. Being sons, we are heirs to the inheritance that fades not away. Our Lord made this relationship possible by his death and resurrection, and the Holy Spirit makes us meet for the inheritance of the saints in light by making us partakers of the divine nature.

By creation we are God's offspring; by grace we are his children; a spiritual inheritance requires a spiritual condition to receive and enjoy it. Belonging to the brotherhood of man does not mean that we are God's spiritual children unless we have accepted the redemption provided. Heaven is a soul state of blessedness imparted by the Divine One. This is fatherhood and sonship. We are made joint heirs with Christ to all he is and has. "My peace I give unto you." "My joy will remain in you, that your joy may be full." This is the divine legacy from the Christ, the unspeakable gift to the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. We have him in the beginning here and in the never-ending there. We are heirs to all his infinite wealth of love, wisdom and power. "In this the children of God are manifested and the children of the devil." They are as far apart as good and evil, sin and holiness. When God breathed into man the breath of life, we received the divine image, but having blurred or effaced it by sin, we are no more in harmony with the Father's family. By wicked works we have shown ourselves enemies of his kingdom, and only Jesus' blood can make us white for the inheritance. E. W. C.

Delivered from Littleness

THURSDAY, November 7. II Cor. 6:13. "Be ye also enlarged." Nothing enlarges life so certainly as a truly intelligent spiritual faith. A man may be religious and narrow, but he would be vastly narrower without religion. What an ample soul was Jesus of Nazareth! What a many-windowed temple his spirit inhabited! His view took in all the past, all the present, and all the future. He never traveled far, but his soul was at home with all peoples. The superscription on his cross was written, as well it might have been, in three languages. The scornful Roman, the proud Greek and the bigoted Hebrew were alike his brothers. How differently his apostles came to see things after they had learned of him! He taught them to be citizens of a kingdom which includes all other kingdoms, excluding none. If any man has an exclusive religion, let him be sure he did not derive it from Christ. The fashionable church which was spoken of as exclusive suggested even to a secular journalist the question, "Whom does it exclude?" Jesus excluded from his love, and excludes now from his eternal kingdom, only those who choose to exclude themselves. Neither ignorance nor poverty excludes us from entering into the larger life of the Spirit. We are called to glory and honor and immortality. C. C. A.

Paul's Plea for Unity

FRIDAY, November 8. Eph. 4:1. "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you." With these words Paul introduces his admonition to unity among Christians. The apostle's social condition at the time is very suggestive. Why was he a prisoner? Could he not have avoided this misfortune? He calls himself a "prisoner of the Lord." It was for the Lord's sake that he suffered bonds. He had preached the Gospel of the forgiveness of sin for Christ's sake and the hope of the resurrection at Jerusalem. He had proclaimed Christ as the Saviour of the world, and His word as the absolute truth. A tumult had ensued in consequence of his preaching, and he had to place himself under the protection of the government for his life.

In two ways the apostle could have avoided imprisonment: either by forbearing to preach at Jerusalem, where he knew he would meet with opposition, or by hushing the differences between him and his Jewish hearers. Both courses human policy would suggest in our day in the interest of unity in the church. You can maintain a specious unity and peace with certain people, if you never touch on certain doctrines of Scripture, or certain essentials of a consistent Christian conduct, which Christ and his apostles inculcate. Again, a certain harmony can be patched up between people by what is called a compromise. Each side agrees to drop certain claims and to meet the other side half-way. The differences are allowed to stand, and each side may hold its own views about them, provided only that it does not insist on their adoption by the other side. That this was not the apostle's method for establishing or keeping unity among Christians is proven not only by his bonds and his ultimate martyrdom, but also by the charge which from his prison he sends to his readers, to "walk worthy of the profession wherewith they have been called." Unity by suppression or avoidance of the truth and unity by compromise are thus judged by the known fate of the holy confessors and martyrs of Christ. Such politic measures to effect union without real unity are worse than the bitterest warfare and the saddest division. For they amount to a practical denial of the truth, and raise God's people systematically in indifference to Scriptural teaching and living. W. H. T. D.

"The Weeping Prophet"

SATURDAY, November 9. Jer. 1:6. "Then said I, ah, Lord, I cannot speak, for I am a child." God told Jeremiah that he had, from his birth, called him and sanctified him as a prophet to the people. Jeremiah, being but a young man, hesitated about accepting the call. The Spirit replied to him, "Be not afraid of their faces; I am with thee to deliver thee. I have touched thy lips and put my words in thy mouth, and thou shalt speak whatsoever I command thee."

Why was Jeremiah called "the weeping prophet?" Why did he write Lamentations? Was it not because of his great devotion to his countrymen, who he saw had fallen into idolatry and infidelity? He also beheld the judgments that were impending. He was compelled to become a preacher of unwelcome truths and was considered a gloomy croaker, a misanthrope, ever prophesying evil. Jeremiah was truly the prophet of a broken heart, crushed by the burdens of his people's sins. But for forty years he spoke what God gave him. Unlike Peter or Luther, he had a sensitive and a delicate, diffident nature; preferring seclusion rather than publicity, where he could weep and pray for the redemption of Israel.

Like other prophets, he did not behold the deliverance which he had hoped to see, but he built better than he knew. Great glories were on the near horizon. His sorrowful life had accomplished more than he realized. He plowed deep, he wept sore; he scattered the good seed of the kingdom broadcast, and now the golden harvest belongs to him forever. Tears are wiped from his eyes; solitary no longer, no more prisons or banishment. His rejoicing will be throughout eternity. "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted; and they that hunger shall be filled." E. W. C.

Agony and bitterness,
The searing mark of tears;
Plans and dreams all unfulfilled
Through the aching years—
Weariness and broken heart,
Visions built on air—
But, through all, a soul that knelt
To the Lord in prayer!

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

Reconstruction After the War

OUTREACHING thinkers—and they are by no means scarce—are everywhere occupied with the great problems that will demand attention when the world-war is ended. In every important line of business the situation will be materially changed. Wider markets, access to lands and peoples unreached by us heretofore, opportunities for unrestricted world-trade, new openings for capital in varied enterprises—these are among the things that in the near future will attract our business men. As a nation, we shall have leaped far ahead in a material sense. Our ships will be on every sea and in every trading port, and our activities will circle the globe. In international affairs, too, America's influence will be in the ascendant. And the Nation's spirit of justice, righteousness and fair play will make itself felt beneficently in all lands. We shall be the great creditor-nation of the globe.

So much for the material side of the situation in that new world toward which so many are looking forward—or in the "New Era," as others designate it. But while all the world is eagerly looking ahead, and bravely planning, to reconstruct the colossal ruin the war has wrought and, by its League of Nations, to assure the reasonable reign of law and security, has the Church no summons to reconstructive work in the great spiritual field to which she will soon have access? Or shall she simply be contented to cling to the methods of times past and gone?

In this issue of the Christian Herald we begin the publication of a series of expressions from leaders in the religious field, under the title of "The Church After the War." Among the contributors are representative names in many different denominations, all of them eminent in Christian scholarship and deeply interested in the Church's progress. In this open forum they can give free expression to their views on the vital topic which is absorbing attention throughout Christendom at the present time.

We hold that the opportunity which will be open to the Church when the war closes can be made one of the most glorious in her history. If the Church of Christ in America accepts the challenge of the "New Era" and applies to the work before her all the ability and energy and spiritual resources at command, such an impression will be made upon the spiritual life of the reconstructed world as will be worthy of this high mission. We are living in an age in which unity is the key to success. We find this illustrated in every sphere of human activity. Surely, when all around us we see this principle in application, the Church cannot afford to stand aloof when she might lead, and when by lifting up the beacon light of a great and glorious united Christianity she might help to win the nation to Christ and to advance His Kingdom throughout the world. The letters we print today deserve the earnest consideration of every thoughtful American. They will be followed by others in subsequent issues.

Enormous Food Importations

THE United States is ransacking the world for foreign foods to take the place of the void caused by the response to the demands of the Allies for our wheat, corn, meats, fish, butter, cheese and milk which we are sending to them in great quantities. Our exportations of fresh beef in the fiscal year 1918 were 370,000,000 pounds, against 6,000,000 the year before the war; of corn, 41,000,000 bushels, against 9,000,000 in 1914; of canned salmon, 111,000,000 pounds, against 88,000,000; of cheese, 44,000,000 pounds in 1918, against 2,500,000; of condensed milk, 53,000,000 pounds, against 16,000,000; of sugar, 576,000,000 pounds, against 51,000,000, and vegetables, $37,000,000 value, against $6,000,000.

As a consequence of this outflow of the foodstuffs of which our own people were in the past accustomed to utilize a large share at home, sundry food articles are being brought in increased quantities from all quarters of the world, from the reindeer herds and whaling seas of the far north to the cocoanut groves of the tropics, and from the soya bean plantations of Manchuria to the cassava plantations of South America. Tapioca, for example, produced from the root of the cassava plant grown in Latin America, Africa and the tropical Orient, has amounted, in the imports of 1918, to $5,500,000, as against $1,500,000 in 1914; eggs, dried, frozen, etc., imported chiefly from China, amounted in 1918 to 14,500,000 pounds, against 2,500,000; rice, coming chiefly from Japan, amounted to 456,000,000 pounds in 1918, against 270,000,000; beans imported in 1918 aggregated over 4,000,000 bushels, against a little over a half million in 1916, and dried peas a couple of million bushels, against 500,000 in 1915.

America the World Center

WHEN the great war is ended, whatever else may be the results, the United States will unquestionably be the world center of finance and commerce, if not also of literature, politics and art. This is not only because Europe is being shattered, weakened and demoralized by the ravages of war, but more because of the high character and ideals

STRIKE DELAYS CHRISTIAN HERALD

YOU will have noticed that this issue of the Christian Herald will have come to you many days late. It is not the fault of the publishers of the Christian Herald. It is a condition that is being felt by all the weekly and monthly publications of New York, and it was brought about by a strike of the Press Feeders' Union. This strike was referred to the National War Labor Board which, at the present writing, has the matter under consideration. This notice is being inserted so that our readers will understand the reason for the delay, and will be patient, knowing that it has been impossible so far for us to prevent it. We expect the Government will adjust the matter immediately. Of course this condition will last but a few days longer, so please be patient, even if the next issue should also be somewhat delayed.

of the American people as so nobly proclaimed by President Wilson and so fully demonstrated by our unselfish part in the conflict.

America's moral and material domination of the world was bound to come in time; the Europe-shattering war has only hastened it. In all its precious traditions and in its present attitude the United States has set up for its citizens the highest standard; it has made the greatest demand of civic duty upon its people that any country has ever made. Our Nation at its beginning was based on the rights of mankind, and in great moments in its history, as when Lincoln emphasized "government of the people, for the people and by the people" and when President Wilson declared that the whole "world must be made safe for democracy," that high demand constantly has been reiterated and that high ideal steadily maintained.

We all of us have moments in our lives when there seem to rise up in us visions of what our own lives might be and some such vision, such illumination, has come to us as a people in the present crisis.

This vision will abide and the citizen of the United States should always keep it before him; he should hold over the splendid vision of the republic not only prosperous, not only dominant, but pure, virile, true to its traditions and an example to all the liberty-seeking peoples of the world.

The Hohenzollerns Must Go

THIS, we judge, is Europe's interpretation of the President's answer to Germany's appeal for peace. With the sternness of the accusing finger of Fate, the only path is indicated by which Germany may hope to reach the peace her people so wildly crave. They must dismiss the Hohenzollerns, boots and baggage, from the infallible Kaiser down to the end of the list. They have ruined the nation they ruled, and brought it into everlasting disgrace. They have deceived the people who trusted them. They have aroused the whole civilized world against Germany by their violation of every law, written or unwritten. And now they must go!

Some eighteen months ago, in May, 1917, a shrewd and sensible German who, unlike the mad Kaiser, did not claim to be a prophet, foresaw the fate that was in store for his country and had the courage to utter a warning. This man was Dr. W. Muhllon, who at one period was connected with the German Foreign office, and at the time of which we write was a director of the great Krupp armament firm. Dr. Muhllon, however, happened to have a sense of honor, and there were transactions in which he had to assume a share of the responsibility, at which his conscience revolted. Three years later, Dr. Muhllon's conscience troubled him so sharply that he severed all his business relations and went off to Switzerland. There he wrote a letter to Von Bethmann-Hollweg in which he made certain revelations which are now given to the world. In that letter he said:

Since the first days of 1917 I have abandoned all hope as regards the present leaders of Germany. Our offer of peace with no indication of our war aims, the unrestricted submarine war, the deportations from Belgium, the systematic destruction in France, the torpedoing of English hospital ships have so discredited the governors of the Empire, that I am profoundly convinced that they are forever disqualified for the task of elaborating and concluding a just and sincere international agreement. They may change their personal views, but they cannot remain the representatives of the German cause.

The German people will only be able to atone for the grievous sins committed against its own present and future, against that of Europe and all mankind, when it is represented by other men with a different type of mind. To tell the truth, it is only just that its reputation throughout the entire world should be as bad as it is.

As a man and as a German who desires nothing but the welfare of the sorely tried and deceived German people, I turn my back for good and all on the present representatives of the German Government. And my one desire is that all independent men should do the same and that many Germans may understand and act.

These are the sentiments of a German concerning the Kaiser and his militaristic advisers. It is difficult to conceive of a stronger arraignment of the "world rule or ruin" cabal that has disgraced a throne, laid half of Europe in ashes and sacrificed millions of lives. No make-believe prophet, but an honest man, Dr. Muhllon foresaw the national disaster and disgrace. It has fallen as he predicted. Germany cannot now escape the responsibility for her crimes as a nation, but she can, even at this late hour, perform one signal act of reparation to her own people and to the whole of mankind, by ridding her soil forever of the Hohenzollerns.

Important Notice

To Readers Whose Subscriptions Are About to Expire

THE Christian Herald gladly complies with the government regulations to prevent the waste of paper, and we now print each week only sufficient copies to cover the actual needs of our subscription list. This means that we have practically no copies left over when the mailing of the weekly issue is completed. Back numbers cannot be furnished on new or renewal subscriptions.

The government has also requested us to discontinue mailing the Christian Herald at date of expiration. This provision will also be put into effect shortly. Subscribers should send in their renewal several weeks before date of expiration. Unless you keep your subscription paid in advance, there will be a break in the regular receipt of the Christian Herald. The date of expiration is always printed on the wrapper of each copy of the paper.

Uncle Sam's mail men are overworked, and mail are somewhat irregular. The Christian Herald, however, is mailed with clock-like regularity. War operations have the right of way. Be patient and cheerful. We are winning the war. But keep your subscription paid in advance.

The First Frost

JACK FROST is the great epoch maker of the seasons. No event of the whole year comes more modestly, yet asserts greater majesty, than does the first frost.

He comes stealthily in the night and steals away before the morning sun, but all nature betrays him at the blushes of a maiden tell of a tryst with her lover. Like Aladdin in the myths of old he robs the weeds in purple gowns, he sprinkles all the fields with gold, he makes the forests flame with blazes red as blood. At his magic touch the drowsing moisture of the air is turned to mystic wine.

The spirit of the time is one of work, ambition, planning—the busy harvesting of the golden treasures of the summer. It is now the wisely industrious husband man is rewarded and the sluggard is disconsolate.

Just as the gorgeous blandishments of nature tempt us to strain our vision to the far-off hill and wood so does the spirit of this season lure the mental and spiritual vision to brighter things beyond the narrow bounds of commonplace and self. We cannot shut our eyes to the lessons of the endless cycle of the seasons. We cannot doubt that good seed, well sown, must blossom in some bright springtime.

Light Patriots in the Home

Prepared for the Christian Herald by the United States Fuel Administration

THE American home has undertaken the responsibility of saving fifteen million tons of coal this present year.

In 1916-1917 we mined 50,000,000 more tons of coal than we mined during any year of highest coal production previous to the war. This year we will mine 50,000,000 more tons than at. This achievement, accomplished in the face of depleted labor at the mines and congested railroads, sets apart among the belligerent nations, with all of whom coal output decreased during the first two years of war. Let our troops be pouring into Europe rapidly, and the task they are performing is so colossal, that in order to make victory swift and sure we must save 50,000,000 more tons than we mine even such gigantic achievements as our miners are now performing. These tons will be saved in industry and in homes by the observance of certain scientific methods which the United States Fuel Administration is advocating.

It may seem incredible that 15,000,000 tons of coal can be salvaged from the waste that goes on in the furnaces, stoves and lighting systems in our homes, but such is actually the case. For years we have been paying larger bills and wasting more fuel than was necessary. The war will make a stronger appeal to us for economical management than did our pocketbooks. For the sake of doing our part in this righteous conflict we must be willing to apply modern efficiency methods and to take finite pains to save waste; the United States Fuel Administration stands at our right hand to show us how this is possible.

Almost all kinds of lights consume fuel. Electricity, unless it be produced by water power, is generated by the consumption of coal. The manufacture of artificial gas requires coal and oil. Kerosene is a war commodity and must be used by us with constant regard to the fact that it is needed in larger amounts than is produced.

It is not necessary that we should work without sufficient light in order to press our patriotic enthusiasm for light-saving. The Government especially warns us to be careful about this, for there was never a time in the world's story when all human beings needed to have their senses in such fine working order as at present. As a matter of fact we shall have better light and lower bills, at the same time that we are conserving coal by following the Fuel Administration's very simple commendation in regard to house-lighting.

Let our first rule of saving light be to turn out the lights every time we leave a room unoccupied. One of the most fruitful sources of waste in the house is in failing to put out an unneeded light. This is particularly true of gas, and constitutes the great argument for the chain-pull by-pass, which makes it as easy to turn gas off or on as electricity. The habit of extinguishing lights when leaving a room for even a few minutes is the very crux of light economy.

Next, the patriotic householder who wants to join the great army of fuel savers should go over the house and remove every carbon filament bulb from every electric light fixture. For these she should substitute tungsten bulbs varying in power from 15 to 60 watts according to the size of the room, the lightness of its color-tones and the purpose for which the light is to be used. Tungsten bulbs give twice the illumination at half the cost of carbon filament bulbs, which means, too, that they conserve coal.

If the house is lighted with gas, incandescent mantle burners should be purchased and put on all lighting outlets to take the place of the flat-flame burner, which gives poor light and consumes much fuel. Five incandescent mantles substituted for open-flame burners which are in use four hours a day will save approximately one ton of coal or equivalent fuel in a year. To make the steel required by one 3-inch shell requires eighty pounds of coal. One ton of coal, therefore, will produce the steel to make twenty-five of these shells. Shells and human lives are balanced against each other in this war. The more shells we can send to General Pershing the fewer men he will need to sacrifice, for shells perform a part in warfare which, if they are lacking, men must undertake. By pondering these grim facts we can see the necessity for taking infinite pains to save even the least amount of coal. There are approximately 20,000,000 homes in the United States. Even an infinitesimal amount of fuel saved by each one will amount to a great deal by the end of a year.

The next improvement to be made in the lighting equipment of the house is in the addition of the chain-pull by-pass on all gas fixtures. By the use of this little appliance a gas jet can be lowered to the merest spark and yet can be raised to full brilliance without having recourse to the usually lost and always dangerous match.

In the evenings families should gather in one room for work or play, so that the same set of lights that serve one may serve all. Here they may work round one table on which is placed an efficient reading-light. The chandelier or other central ceiling light should be used only for general illumination and can either be turned out or used in part when all the occupants of the room are using the reading-lamp. Side-brackets are seldom put in a room for any purpose but that of decoration. Unless they are the only means of supplying a good reading-light they ought not to be used during the period of the war. If they are to be employed for near work they need a shade over them which will throw down and concentrate the light rather than diffuse it. Better still, a reading-lamp may be attached to one of them.

The question of shades should be carefully studied. There are many that are decorative in the room but do not distribute the light in the most advantageous way. If a silk shade is used, one of pale yellow, lined with highly glazed white satin, is best. Opaque shades are bad, and so are those made of dark silk, which absorbs the light.

Kitchens and pantries need good lights, not only because the work performed there requires it, but because light is a discourager of dirt. Stair-landings should have good lights near them, for dark stairs are dangerous for the unwary. The hall light need not be left burning all the evening. Gas lights with a chain-pull by-pass and all electric lights can quickly and easily be put on or off according to need.

To those of us who can serve our country only "back of the front" there is a real and deep joy in putting into practice the various household economies which have been brought to our attention from time to time by the Government. It is true that we can not immediately touch or see the results as we can when we have knitted a stocking or raised the money for an ambulance, but we know nevertheless that our labor and economies will provide shells for our husbands, our sons, our brothers. Will any American ever forget his pride and satisfaction when it was announced a little while ago that we had saved wheat enough to feed our Allies and our soldiers in Europe? Let us work for the day when the announcement can be made that the 20,000,000 homes of the United States have saved voluntarily not only the 15,000,000 tons which are their burden, but a much larger amount even than this, so that when the hour comes for the great spring drive, there will be guns and shells and tanks enough to carry us on to Berlin.

Eagle Brand restores Pumpkin Pie to its Rightful Place.

What is Thanksgiving, without the old-fashioned pumpkin pie—toothsome, succulent and satisfying?

Eagle Brand in pumpkin pie holds a delightful surprise in store for you. Of course it saves sugar, for Eagle Brand is "the milk and sugar too." But Eagle Brand does something else. Just as in coffee it adds a refinement to the coffee flavor itself, so in pumpkin pie it enriches the natural flavor of the pumpkin.

Eagle Brand brings a flavor to your desserts that milk and sugar used separately can never achieve. Convenient and economical, it has many uses—in cooking, in candy-making, and for table use in coffee and cocoa. Write for booklet "Borden's Recipes."

—the new alternative food product for cooking and baking

Hebe (pronounced He-be) in ancient mythology was cup bearer to the gods on Mount Olympus. Buoyant, beautiful, appealing, she served the nectar to them, and typified youth, health and happiness.

HEBE today presents a new alternative food to the American housewife—a product, that will help her economize in her cooking without sacrificing quality—and help conserve dairy products.

Hebe is a compound of evaporated separated milk and edible vegetable fat, the latter pressed from the white meat of the cocoanut and highly refined. Separated milk, largely neglected for use by the human family, and cocoanut fat are high in food values and Hebe retains the nutritive qualities of both, scientifically combined—nothing is added.

Hebe has been tested and approved by expert chefs and domestic science teachers. Thousands of housewives are using it in their cooking and baking with excellent results.

BBREAD mixed with it rises quickly and has a texture of which the cook is justly proud. To muffins, biscuits, griddle cakes and the like Hebe adds a tempting flavor. Soups, stews, gravies and creamed dishes made with Hebe are delicious. It enhances the flavor of coffee and helps to make splendid cocoa and chocolate.

Hebe is produced in modern condenseries—is plainly labeled and sold for just what it is. Every can is sealed airtight and sterilized, so that the housewife gets it from the grocer in the same pure condition in which it left the condensery.

Let us tell you more about Hebe or answer your questions. Send for booklet containing the Hebe story, recipes and other useful information. Address

Jacob Deceives His Father

International Sunday School Lesson for November 10

Gen. 27:1-45

The Fruits of Falsehood

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE twenty-seventh chapter of Genesis is a story of deception from start to finish, with little or the credit of any of the parties concerned. To us as Christians perhaps the most repugnant part of the whole is that it was suggested by the wife and mother of the victims, even by Rebekah. Our ideals of home life are shocked, just because we have come to now and appreciate the Christian home and true Christian motherhood. Like father, like son! So to us it is dreadful to find his mother putting Jacob up to his contemptible trick on his old blind father. It reminds us that bad example in the home is more fatal than anywhere else, just because home influence is so direct, so formative. Doubtless in ancient Oriental life such incidents were more common. Are we entirely free from self-seeking, even from acting a false part, in our homes to-day? To a large measure we are free. What we seek to do now is to carry out the sincerity and the unselfish service of true Christian homes into business, into social life, and even into international relationships. Our terrible world-misery today is caused by lying trickery and self-seeking in the great world-families of the nations.

The Growth of a Lie

The worst thing about a lie is that it leads to lying! One can seldom stop with one lie—one usually finds oneself launched on a series, with perhaps the laying of a deceitful part permanently added on the soul. Jacob's mother made the suggestion that Jacob impersonate Esau, and secure his father's blessing before Esau's return. Jacob had no qualms of conscience about the matter—he was only afraid he might be found out! A man who is only honest through fear is not an honest man. Honesty is the best policy," but if it is only policy then the character that plays honesty as a card is morally but little above the cheat. In order then that he might not be found out, Jacob had to cover his hands with skins, for he was without. So he became a hypocrite, which means a mask-wearer, or one who mutilates a part. He went on to act a despicable lie, covering himself in false arguments also, and doubtless trying to disguise his voice, though with little success. Finally he reached what he seems the necessity of invoking the name of God as an assurance to his blind father! Then at last, perhaps most pitiful of all, he gives his father the false kiss, the act of devotion in the midst of treachery. So it goes ever; sin cumulative, and lying brings further slity of words and acts, till it reaches even to blasphemy and betrayal. There is always fear in falsehood! Now his heart must have trembled as he added sin to sin! What terror prompted the answer to his father's query as to how he had found venison so quickly, "Because Jehovah thy God is with me good speed!" Then that classic dietment from his victim—"The voice of Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau"—how it must have crested that guilty soul! Says Luther, "I should have dropped the dish!" But then Luther was a straightforward man, quite unlike this trickly dissembler. There is no rest in falsehood. There is no comfort in a lie. It brings forth fear, and guilt, and shame. The man of honor and truth alone knows the blessed sensation of a mind at peace with itself and God.

"Perish policy and cunning!
Perish all that fears the light!
Whether losing, whether winning,
Trust in God and do the right."

How the Lie Affected the Family

This colossal lie broke up the chosen family and wrought misery for every member, the innocent as well as the guilty. We must remember this last since it is far worse than many a thoughtless child imagines. The sin of man, even in the home, does not stop with bringing suffering at last upon its perpetrator. It hurts the most guileless as well.

Esau's easy-going good-fellowship was changed to bitter hatred of his scheming brother, until his heart plotted even murder. His "bitter cry" when he heard of his wrongs was too late according to Jewish beliefs, even Isaac believing that the blessing, though obtained by fraud, was irrevocable. So his natural recklessness was aggravated and his worse traits brought to the front.

The Fruits of a Lie

Jacob himself was forced to flee for his life, and embarked upon a succession of difficult journeys and hard tasks, toiling for others instead of for himself and his doting mother. He was destined to be made a victim of the trickery of others, even to the extent of having to be paid exactly in kind for his own trick. For we all remember how he served Laban seven years for Rachel, and was then married to her sister disguised to look like Rachel! That was poetic justice with a vengeance. He spent the best years of his life in exile because of his sin.

Rebekah, his mother, lost her spoiled favorite forever. She was left to live with a deceived husband and a cruelly wronged elder son. She paid a penalty which has often been the lot of too fond mothers who have stooped to dishonorable means of advancing their loved ones; while Isaac, tricked and disregarded, smarted under the sense of having been made a tool by his own family, concerning whom he had been both loyal and in general considerate.

Falsehood wrecks homes. In a Christian family absolute candor and good faith constitute the only standard for happiness. Many a family has been ruined by one lie persisted in like this one.

Many a home is the scene of self-seeking instead of service. And it is in the home that the attitude of a soul toward life is developed. From Rebekah's the sons went out to grasp and to deceive. From countless humble families, then and now, the children go forth with the conception of life which Christ sets forth: to share and to serve.

The Futility of Falsehood

How inevitably self-seeking and falsehood fail to secure anything really durable and worth while! They are like Jacob's lies; they hurt all concerned. The road to happiness is straightforward along the highway of truth. Our boys and girls are frequently tempted to wander in the bypaths of deception. Almost unthinkingly they find themselves off the right way by the misstep of a thoughtless lie. Let us teach them the necessity of prompt confession. Let us show them how the lie grows like a rank jungle weed. There is no greater insult known than for a man to be called "liar," because it goes to the fundamentals of character and intercourse. Yet what is a liar but one who tells lies? Tell the children plainly nay, rather let them state it from this lesson story, that of all falsehoods the most contemptible is that told to father or mother in the home. The lad who looks his father in the eye and tells the whole truth will scarcely go far wrong.

Truth is one of the watchwords of the New Testament character, so wonderfully different from the general practice of the ancient East. Peter, John and James agree in reiterating it. Says John, "I have not written you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and because no lie is of the truth." Truthfulness needs all the re-emphasis we can give it in our classes this week. Like John, we ought to feel that every lie is a blow at the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Your Tooth Brush Can be Ten-Fold More Effective

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You Omit the Film

Ordinary brushing, as millions know, fails to save the teeth.

Teeth still discolor, still decay. Tartar forms and pyorrhea starts. From time to time, accumulations must be removed by a dentist.

The trouble lies in a clinging film which is constantly formed on the teeth. That is the cause of most tooth troubles. And that is what you largely fail to reach.

This film is what discolors, not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So that film is the teeth's great enemy—the one which you must combat.

Dental science had for years sought a way to fight it. Now that way is found. Clinical tests have proved this beyond question.

It is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent, and we urge you to see what it does.

Try This Way Once

That film is albuminous, so we now apply pepsin to it—the digestant of albumin. The object is to dissolve the film, in crevices and elsewhere. Then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth.

A harmless method has been found to activate the pepsin. Five governments have already granted patents. That method is employed in Pepsodent alone. And many tests have proved its efficiency on film. It is endorsed by many able authorities.

You can quickly see that Pepsodent does what nothing else has done. One week will give you a new idea of what teeth cleaning means.

Send the coupon for a One-Week tube. Use it like any tooth paste and watch the results. Note how clean your teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Do this for your teeth's sake. Compare the results with the old ways. You can judge for yourself. After that week you will never return to old methods, we believe. Cut out the coupon now.

New Foods for Old

Conservation "Over Here" and Destitution "Over There" Create Ready Acceptance of Alternative Foods

TIME was—and not so many years ago—when the average American man or woman looked mightily askance at the new product to eat or to cook with. The glance of suspicion was turned especially upon any food which was offered to take the place of any of the old stand-by class.

The history of alternative foods shows the resistance they had to overcome.

Over a quarter of a century ago one concern brought forward a compound of cottonseed oil and oleo-stearine—a product of beef suet—for shortening and frying. Chemists and food scientists knew that cottonseed oil could be refined and purified into a wholesome cooking aid. But it took many years to make the public believe it.

The trouble was that it was looked upon as a substitute, and the word "substitute" had a black eye then as it has today. Baking powder was and is an alternative food product, but we have forgotten the days of saleratus and soda and sour milk biscuits.

About the first successful alternative food product of recent years was the late Mr. Post's cereal coffee, which was frankly offered as a substitute for coffee itself, and which found acceptance among the large class of people who do not believe coffee to be healthful for them. Yet even this beverage required educational publicity of the most strenuous sort.

Two of our principal foods have been so used since time immemorial. They are milk and oil. The Old Testament alluringly tells of lands that flowed with milk and honey and with wine and oil.

Vegetable fat (olive oil) was probably the original cooking fat. Butter was a delicacy, perhaps in common use only by royalty and the very wealthy. When Jael slew Sisera, as a crowning feature of the cozy little supper she served him before she drove a nail through his head, she "served him butter in a lordly dish."

As civilization advanced and the population of the world increased, two food problems grew more and more complex. They were, and are, milk and cooking fats. In the old days everybody kept a cow and raised a few pigs. The cow furnished the needed milk; the hogs were butchered in the fall and the leaf lard was rendered.

Cities grew and spread out over the farms. City people could not keep cows, nor could dwellers in the larger towns. The local milkman thus became an institution, with his big can of milk and the ladle with which he would fill the family pail or pitcher. But the problem grew too great even for that, and then came the great milk companies, with their refrigerator cars and their wagon and bottle service.

Then came evaporated and condensed milk, supplying the soldier, hunter, trapper and explorer first, but soon evolving from the emergency class as it became recognized by the housewife as a clean, sanitary, wholesome product.

The population of the world increased, and the cow population, if it did not decrease, at least did not keep pace with the demand for milk. The same condition was to be observed in the cooking fat field.

A few years ago a cooking fat was put on the market without apology, without claiming to be just as good as lard or butter or anything else. It was a pure cottonseed oil product and it was offered under a coined name as a vegetable fat cooking product. It was accepted instantly and today enjoys a big sale. The housewife buys it for itself, without regard to whether or not it is lower in cost than lard. Cottonseed was a waste product until ways of pressing and using the oil it contains were discovered.

Within a few years another vegetable fat has been finding its way to our tables in the form of oil. This is the fat of the coconut. The white meat of the coconut has always been a delicacy. Dried and shredded, it has been used in cake icings, pastry and candies, and we have always liked its flavor. Properly refined, coconut oil is a pure fat of recognized food value.

Coconut and other vegetable fats came into their own with the introduction of nut-margarins. Everybody knows the instant wave of popularity which characterized these products—alternative foods in the truest sense.

All alternative foods contribute to economy, because they utilize waste products, by-products, or materials which heretofore have not been used as they could be for human food.

There is not enough lard produced to supply the demand. Therefore we turn to vegetable fats for cooking. There is not enough butter churned to supply the tables of this country, therefore we buy and eat nut-margarin and oleo-margarin, and we use these margarins for cooking where we formerly used butter.

The public accepts the alternative food when it knows it is honestly made, properly labeled, a product of real food value and furthermore an economy. Every housewife in the land, high and low, rich and poor, today is looking earnestly upon the economical side of the purchase and use of foods.

One of the biggest wastes in this country is skimmed milk. The term "skimmed milk" is generally a misnomer. It should be called "separated milk." We think of skimmed milk as something that can either be fed to animals or thrown away. Yet skimmed milk contains all the food elements of whole milk except the fat, which has been separated from it and made into butter.

There is not enough milk in this country today; fresh milk is getting higher in price; canned milk is climbing with it. Because we see canned milk on the shelves of all the grocery stores we imagine that an enormous part of the fresh milk produced in this country must be condensed or evaporated. Of the 84 billion pounds of milk produced in this country last year less than 3 per cent. was condensed or evaporated, while 3.7 per cent. was made into ice cream, 41 per cent. was used for butter-making, and from this 41 per cent. there was left as a by-product 10 billion pounds of skimmed milk which according to the United States Department of Agriculture was either fed to stock or wasted.

Thirty billion pounds is fifteen billion quarts. Every quart of that skimmed milk contained at least seventeen per cent. of food that could have been diverted to human uses. It separated milk was a waste product as far as the human family was concerned, until the inventive minds of students of food possibilities turned to the question of alternative foods. The problem of reclaiming for human consumption the food values in the neglected skimmed milk apparently has been solved in the latest of the alternative foods to be introduced. This is a compound of evaporated separated milk and coconut oil. With the animal fat removed from all milk it became separated milk, a by-product. Skimmed milk had no market. Yet the food elements were in it. The problem was to replace the animal fat with a vegetable fat which should have a food value and which could be combined with the separate milk in an appetizing way. Here again the scientific mind was called upon and there was invented a process for introducing that of the coconut into the skimmed milk so that the minute fat globules are permanently entangled with the milk solids and a perfectly balanced ration is created.

This newest of the alternative foods steps right into its own place in the kitchen, principally as a cooking and baking medium. Long and careful experiments were made by food chemists, by chefs, by domestic science teachers before the product was offered to the housewife, because your modern food producer wants to be a Davy Crockett and be sure he is right before going ahead.

What will be the next alternative food? This is hard to say, and the what with our war-learned knowledge of the fact that we can pleasantly change from the old-established foods and the time-honored ways, there is nothing so radical for us to contemplate, provided it is not a "substitute" and provided it fills its own place in its own way. Then we will not look upon it as an imitation or a makeshift but, as in the case of alternative foods mentioned as a new, economical, satisfactory addition to the list of things we want to cook with and eat.

A Soldier's Spiritual Battle

ONE of the very helpful pages of your excellent magazine is "Adventures in Neighboring." Reading what the missionary in Mexico said of the 91st Psalm prompted me to offer one of my experiences in the Civil War as a testimony to the value of the Word of God to every one, especially to soldiers on the battle field.

On the third of June, 1864, was the bloody battle of Cold Harbor, in which the Union army lost 7,000 men in twenty minutes. The 36th Wisconsin was in the corps of "Hancock the Superb," who made the first attack at four o'clock in the morning. I was assisting the surgeon on the field, giving first aid to the wounded. We were kept busy all that day, and when I straightened up to rest and rub my aching back, whichever way I looked I saw the wounded, the dying, or the dead. As the evening shades were lengthening I lay down in my tent completely exhausted, discouraged, homesick, and on the verge of despair. Readers of Pilgrim's Progress will remember the desperate attack

Apollyon made upon Christian when he found him greatly wearied and depressed. So the cowardly arch-fiend, seeing my undone condition, pitched upon me. It seemed as if another person was saying to me, "Now you see what a nice fix you've got yourself into. Why didn't you stay at home? If you hadn't been such a fool as to volunteer you would have been safe at home now, but here you are in a fix you can't get out of. You're no better than the thousands who were shot today. Your turn will come one of these days. You'll find your faith isn't worth a row of pins. You'll be done for one of these days, sure as fate. Nothing can save you."

At this point thoughts of home reminded me of the letter from my father that came the night before, and I only had time to read a little of it. I began reading it, and when I came to the words, "Read often the 91st and 121st Psalms," I said, "I will read them now, before it gets dark." I began reading the 91st Psalm, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." The devil said, "Oh, that sounds very nice, it was only true."

Then I turned to the 121st and read on with increasing interest to the seventh verse. "The Lord shall preserve thee from all ill; he shall preserve thy soul." A great flood of light burst upon me; the devil was gone. I was at peace. I said to myself, "God will preserve my body as long as he sees fit, but whatever becomes of my body, he will preserve my soul, and that's me." From that moment I felt safe in God's hands and rest that he would give the victory to the right. No doubt, at some time, the devil attempts to wreck the faith of every believer on the Lord Jesus Christ; but we have the promise in 1 Cor., 10:13, that God will always make a way of escape from temptation. And let me suggest to all that they put those two blessed psalms together in the chambers of their memory, that together they may nerve the heart in every duty, trial or danger.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

When the Siren Sounds

THE idea of everybody's devoting a minute a day, at high noon, to a prayer for our country's cause has appealed to the popular imagination. Congress has endorsed it. The Rotary clubs are promoting it. Religious leaders, Protestant, Catholic and Jewish, advocate it. The Red Cross is to observe it in all its meetings. The newspapers have reported it. The motion pictures have featured it. Church bells, fire bells, and factory whistles, in any communities, call the people to pray. In Washington a great siren, which was formally and solemnly dedicated, sounds for the duration of the prayer minute. Every Christian with a sense of duty appreciates the possibilities of this idea. It thrusts religion into the thoughts of all the people. It advertises the place and power of spiritual forces. It creates thought and discussion upon unseen verities. It introduces the people to the idea of our common reliance upon God.

This simple usage creates a tremendous opportunity for the churches, pastors and religious organizations could put themselves aggressively behind the daily observance of the Victory Prayer. Placards should be posted all public places calling upon everybody to pray at noon. In stores and homes, signs should be placed saying—"In this establishment we pause a minute at noon to pray for Victory." Little cards, to the same effect, could be used by individuals to hand to the person with whom one may be conversing when the noon hour strikes. The religious leaders of every community should call upon the editors of local papers to publish a daily reminder of the Victory Prayer. The ministers themselves might arrange to supply for every day a fresh form of prayer, brief, definite and popularly phrased. Such a department, two or three inches long, would not occupy a tenth of the space given every day to news of sports.

To alert persons, a hundred methods of promoting the Daily Victory Prayer present themselves. This is an unusual opportunity for buttressing the religious sentiment in our land, and for turning the thoughts of all the people to God, in whose hand alone is victory and guidance.

WILLIAM T. ELLIS, D. D.
Swarthmore, Pa.

Mrs. A. M. V. asks the prayers of the League that the Lord may help her find a wandering son, who has not been heard from for nearly a year.

Mrs. F. B. W., who praises God for bodily healing, asks still another sign of his goodness in the cure, if it be his will, of a serious malady from which she has suffered for twenty years.

J. C. V. asks the prayers of God's children for a son-in-law who is a good man but an unbeliever in Christianity, that his eyes may be opened and that he may accept Christ as his personal Saviour.

Mrs. J. L. W. is afflicted with cancer. She has two children in heaven, but wishes to live for her one 12-year-old daughter, and that she may do some work for Jesus.

Mrs. E. H., who praises God for many answered prayers, comes to the Prayer League with a request for prayer for her wandering boy, who has lost faith in his mother's God. She also prays for the blessing of God on a sick daughter.

Mrs. W. E. G. asks the prayers of God's children for the salvation of her husband.

Thirteen ask for the conversion of husbands and six for that of sons; forty-two ask for the conversion of friends and relatives, including Mrs. T. S., who asks in addition to the saving of her sons that they may stop drinking; One of His Followers, that neighbors may be saved and see the light; E. D., that brother and wife may be brought nearer to God; R. W. B., "that sister and I may have strength given us to be strong in faith"; A Dear One, for a lad who is going to utter ruin; N. M., "that I may be delivered from a thorn in my flesh"; E. J. P., for sound conversion of two friends, for a brother in the service, and for the reconciliation of husband and wife; a Mother, that son and his wife may be brought back to an interest in the church and what it represents.

Twenty-two ask for blessings for self. Fourteen ask for the restoration of their hearing or that of relatives and friends.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. E. M., Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. M. O. C., Imperial, Pa.; Mrs. C. W., Oil City, Pa.; S. E. B., Edgewater, Colo.; Mrs. J. D. S., Marrowbone, Ky.; A Reader, Marion, N. C.; Mrs. A. A., Youngstown, Ohio; M. M. H., Coatesville, Pa.; Mrs. E. N., Warren, Me.; Mrs. M. F., Billingsville, Mo.; J. W. K., Harlan, Iowa; Mr. S. P. B., Mont.; M. S., Cameron Mills, N. Y.; E. What "America's Answer" Means

"AMERICA'S ANSWER," the U. S. Official War Picture issued by the Division of Films of the Committee on Public Information, is not the ordinary press-agented film play. It is a picture of the great drama of the war, mastered by U. S. Signal Corps photographers, by direction of General John Pershing. It is purely a government enterprise. No individual has any profit interest in the production. The picture has been made and it is presented for public consideration, not to make money—although it must necessarily produce a revenue in order to meet the expenses involved—but in order to show the millions of contributors to the several Liberty Loans, the purchasers of Thrift and War Stamps, taxpayers, and those who have so generously given in other ways for the needs of the war, just how the great tasks have been expended, and what, in a physical way, has been accomplished in France during the first year of America's participation in the struggle for Democracy.

It shows the wonderful 3-mile dock somewhere in France, built on swamp land by American soldiers, and now being used to expedite the landing of troops and the handling of the stupendous volume of supplies with which the sea, from the United States to the coast of France, is being bridged; it shows one of the mammoth refrigeration plants established behind the lines, a great plant with a capacity for 10,000,000 pounds of meat, and capable of producing a million pounds of ice daily; it shows the assembling of American locomotives by our soldier mechanics; the building of railways; the leveling of French forests to secure needed timber; the erection of hospitals and the building of a great dam, in order to create a reservoir to supply one of the largest hospitals with water; it shows how American soldiers live in camp and on the fighting lines; what they eat, how daily tons upon tons of bread is made; how worn clothing is renovated and repaired by French women in the service of the American army; the utilization of old hats and old shoes in a wonderful salvage department; the sanitation of the soldiers' uniforms by machinery; the endless stream of trucks used to transport supplies to the front; camouflaged guns; acres of shells and other ammunition; the American Aero Squadron; and, finally, the actual fighting, in which our soldiers have won undying fame.

"America's Answer" is a picture that every American and every non-American should see; it is one's duty, but also one's privilege, to see it. The government's Division of Films has done no better work for the stimulation of loyalty and the accentuation of the spirit of giving than the assembling and presentation of this most illuminating war film.

Don't Wait for Weather Like This

DECIDE NOW to protect your car this winter with Johnson's Freeze-Proof.

Purchase your supply early from your dealer and read and follow the directions carefully. A little time spent now cleaning the radiator and putting on new hose connections will save you unlimited time, trouble, worry and expense during the winter months.

JOHNSON'S FREEZE-PROOF

is the logical anti-freeze preparation. It is inexpensive—does not evaporate—is non-inflammable—easy to use—and guaranteed. One application will last all winter unless the solution is lost through the overflow pipe or leakage.

Truck and fleet owners will find Johnson's Freeze-Proof a great time and money saver. Your trucks will always be on the job and in the coldest weather it will be "Business as Usual" for you.

Farmers will find Johnson's Freeze-Proof a utility product—for automobiles—tractors—gas engines—trucks—and electro lighting and heating plants.

The present high price of alcohol—its low boiling point—quick evaporation and inflammability, make it impractical. Use Johnson's Freeze-Proof, then forget there is such a thing as a frozen radiator.

One package will protect a Ford to 5° below zero and two packages to 50° below. See scale on package.

Germany Spars for Time to hold this line to protect the withdrawal of the forces retreating from Laon and to prevent an outflanking of the lines in Champagne, already cracking under the steady French and American pressure.

On the Argonne front, the Americans took the village of Grand Pré by a surprise flanking attack, and eastward across the Aire they captured the commanding position of the Côte de Chatillon near the Meuse, from which they could dominate the German positions north and northeast. The crest of this height changed hands several times in furious fighting; but when the fighting was over, the Stars and Stripes were firmly planted there, and the doughboys had established their first line well beyond the northern slopes of the hill.

BUT it was not alone the fighting that indicated better news ahead. From London came news of the declaration of its independence by Hungary, while from Berne came word that Austria was to be transformed into an association of federal states, the states to be built about the German, Austrian, Czech-Slovak, Illyrian, and Rumanian peoples of the present empire, questions concerning Bukovina, Roumania, Bosnia, Herzegovina and Poland to be settled later.

Further, from Germany came rumors that Germany did not consider President Wilson's note a flat refusal, that she was practically ready to yield on every front and would make a reply, probably at once, in an endeavor to bring the discussion to a fruitful issue. The German press, while angry at the President, and accusing him of attempting to make himself a dictator, nevertheless appeared to recognize that Germany must submit to his terms or die in refusing.

Still further, there were reports that, in line with the President's statement that German armies were destroying towns and country wantonly while their government sought peace, the order had gone forth to the commanders to avoid any unnecessary destruction. Whatever may have been the truth of these rumors, the fact was obvious that Lille and Ostend and numerous French and Belgian villages were evacuated by the Germans on the 16th and 17th of October without any of the looting and destruction which had until then marked their exit from places they could no longer hold.

Following the enemy northward and eastward the Belgian, French and English troops in four days liberated more than 800 square miles of Belgian territory, and on October 19 the Belgian sentries had replaced the Germans on the Dutch border north of Bruges; 15,000 German troops were pinned in a little corner of Belgium between Holland and the channel. To avoid being taken prisoner they crossed over into Holland and were interned. On October 20 Belgian cavalry patrols had passed Eecloo while the French were pressing in the direction of Brussels and the British having swung across the Lys in full strength had pressed on from Lille and were apparently about to take Tournai. South of this point the British forces pressing eastward from Douai and Le Cateau, with whom American divisions were fighting, were faced along a 40-mile line by 40 German divisions which were fighting desperately to prevent the forcing of the Valenciennes-Hirson main line of railway, which if cut would put in jeopardy the whole German line eastward to Verdun. The German line on October 20 ran from just before Valenciennes southward to the Forest of Ardennes, east of St. Quentin and La Fère; from here it ran eastward along the heights north of the Aisne to the district north of Grand Pré, where the Americans had captured the Kriemhilde line and were pressing on irresistibly toward a new line, the Freya, several miles farther northward.

In spite of desperate resistance the French on October 18 and 19 drove the Germans from important positions on the heights north of the Aisne, driving them from Vouziers. Before abandoning the submarine bases at Ostend and Zeebrugge the Germans did their best to remove their ships and mater apparently succeeding in getting their ships safely home.

In Serbia, Serbian troops on October 19 had driven the Germans back more than 45 miles north of Nish, and had captured positions within 30 miles of the point on the Danube where Serbian, Roumanian and Bulgarian territory join. The French troops had also entered Montenegro. The Austrians announced that they were evacuating all occupied territory in Serbia, Montenegro and Albania. Following up the Austrian withdrawal the Italian forces, on October 15, occupied the important port of Durazzo.

The fighting along the whole western front in the week ending October 20, in rain and mud, the French winter having set in. In spite of difficulties thus developed the Allied troops for their way ahead.

The fighting of October 21 in France and Belgium saw the Germans more resisting Allied pressure along the whole front, the line of combat running in a fairly straight line from Solesmes east of Cambrai to the Dutch border at Eecloo. In spite of the German resistance, however, the Belgians pressed closer to Ghent from which they were seven miles distant. South of Ghent the French forced several crossings of the Lys and further south, in hard fighting, the French and British forced the Germans over the Scheldt along its course as far as Tournai. The British were in the outskirts of Tournai both they and the French were over the Scheldt in several places, the engineers having performed prodigies of valor in the construction of bridges under the fire. South of Tournai the British were at St. Amand and had pushed to within one mile of Valenciennes.

South of Le Cateau the American troops forced the crossing of the canal and the French drove further northward from Laon. In the Verdun district the Americans driving northward toward Stenay and the new German Freya line were met with desperate counter-attacks in such force that small salients in the line had to be abandoned temporarily; before the day the Yanks went forward again, a regiment of engineers threw down its picks and shovels and taking rifles to aid in the capture of hill north of Cunel.

In Serbia on the 21st French forces reached the Danube near Vidin, 50 miles south of the Hungarian border and forced an Austrian monitor ashore.

Reports to the Belgian Relief Commission on October 21, showed that the victorious advance of the Allied armies had released 1,500,000 civilians in northern France and 800,000 in Belgium from the German yoke.

Familiar Talks With Contributors

HERE is a gossip flavor that appeals to the woman editor in the task that falls into each month of gathering up floating threads of correspondence and weaving them into a smly web. It is the next best thing to the face-to-face conference for which I often long. Today we have several queries with which we will deal before entering upon a more leisurely chat:

1) Food Administration restaurants (so-called) serve meals in which substitutes for wheat flour are used, at a lower rate than when wheat flour is used. Show me how it is done when substitutes are no cheaper than wheat flour.

2) Can you give me information how to use substitutes for sugar in cooking and at the table?—O. R. P. (Pennsylvania).

1) At the present cost of oatmeal, barley and rice-flour, it is not practical to use them in the same bulk as wheat-flour and save money in the product. Corn-meal is cheaper. I wish you had specified to what substitutes you refer, and whether these are wrought into bread, or into cakes, etc.

2) The syrups now sold in place of sugar are usually labeled with instructions as to the proportionate value they bear to sugar. The Food Administration Bureau advises this. I may lay down, as a general rule, the fact that liquid sweets, containing less saccharine than the dry sugar on account of the admixture of water, must be used more liberally in making cakes and puddings. A little practice will soon guide you in measuring the ingredients. But consult the printed information upon cans of "karo" and the like.

As you probably know, our summer fruits in this state last until late in the autumn. Our pines are particularly fine this year, and we are following your advice—underpinned by the urgent admonitions of the Food Administration—heaven bless it! and preserving and serving what we do not eat. A late issue of orders from the said headquarters urges us to try all we do not eat, or preserve, or jam, or pickle. I write now to ask for a really good recipe for plum conserves. May I have it so?—(Mrs.) W. C. M. (California).

I am sending one which has the endorsement of a notable housewife—a venerable Mrs. Rundle in the matters of which you speak. You may safely try it.

Plum Conserve

Five pounds plums; four pounds sugar; one pound raisins; one-half pound English walnuts; three oranges.

Wash the plums; cut or chop the raisins. Remove the yellow peel from the oranges in thin pieces; add it to the plums; take off the white, inner peel and throw this away. Slice the oranges thin; put these and the broken walnut meats with the plums and boil all together slowly for one hour.

Put up in tumblers, pouring paraffin on the surface of the conserve when it is cold and firm. B.—Save the stones.

ALREADY we are beginning to think of Thanksgiving:

I used to mix mashed potato with our pumpkin for pies, when we could not get carrots, which are the best substitute for pumpkin. I know of. We found the mixture of potato quite as good, in the opinion of some of the family. And, as we are urged by the Food Administration to eat potatoes from patriotic motives, we are going to experiment with them again.

Housewives who are looking for better substitutes know that cheap beef suet—"tried out" and thus purified—is fine in baking scalloped potatoes? It is savory, and has not the let "tallowy" taste. We use it in divers other ways with like results. The crust made with it is in constant use with us. We wet the dough with warm water, and keep it warm until it rolled out. We mix barley flour with wheat in the crust.—E. M. D. (Illinois).

You speak of mixing home-made pastry with warm water. I take it that you mean hot water. Some of the best pastry-makers I have ever known always wet up the "shortened" flour with this. It is especially good for water pastry.

PROPOS of your reference to the patriotic potato, our next letter is but one of a thousand proofs of the zealous obedience on the part of American women to the directions of our fine Food Administration, and to other branches of the government that have to do with the daily fare of a patriotic people that, in every walk of life, lends diligent heed to lawfully appointed authorities.

Since reading the article upon the use of potatoes as part of the bit we housekeepers can offer to the sacred cause uppermost in all our minds just now, I have made it a point of conscience to use more than ever before, and they have always been a standing dish in our family fare. My dear old mother considers it a special providence that our crop of potatoes is larger this year than ever before. Not one is thrown away. Can you tell me of a meatless potato soup which is really nourishing and palatable? We live on a farm and have plenty of milk. Can this take the place of stock in the soup?—(Mrs.) J. H. G. (Ohio).

I think you will find this recipe both patriotic and palatable:

Creamed Potato Soup

Boil and mash, smooth and soft, enough potatoes to make a full half-pint. As you mash, beat in hot milk to make a rather stiff batter.

Meanwhile, make a roux by stirring together in a saucepan over the fire two good tablespoonfuls of butter, or a substitute, and one of flour. Mix this gradually with a pint of scalding milk, in which have been cooked a slice of onion and a stalk of celery. These must be strained out when they are soft. Season with white pepper and celery-salt to taste.

Stir over the fire for two minutes and add a teaspoonful of finely minced parsley. Cook for a minute and serve.

AND still another voluntary tribute to the virtues of the dry yeast so often commended in the Corner:

I was much interested in an article which appeared in the Corner a while ago about dry yeast. One writer says she sets the sponge raised with this over night.

This yeast has been in use in my family for years, and at no time has it been found necessary to set the sponge over night.

I make my sponge at noon, using a dry yeast cake, softened with lukewarm water and flour enough for a very soft dough. In three hours or thereabouts it is ready to be molded into a stiffer dough, and set for the last rising. —PRACTICAL HOUSEWIFE (Pennsylvania).

I am glad to see that the Corner advocates the composition of savory dishes which require no meat. As the prices of flesh-foods are frightfully high already, and we are threatened with a steady rise of these during the advancing winter, we housemothers can serve our families as well as our country, by setting our wits to work in devising ways and means of feeding our flocks with food that tastes good, is wholesome, and does not transgress any of the wise rules laid down for replenishing the camp tables of the boys Over There. It is surprising to the ingenious cook to discover how many delicacies that deserve the name can be, as we say, "tossed up" without calling upon the butcher. I offer, as a sample, one which my boys have nicknamed to suit themselves, having seen me make it in twelve minutes one evening when their father telephoned that he was bringing a man home to supper.

I may add that their manner of tossing it down was as active as my tossing it up. And it is but fair to confess that, meaning to make tapioca-custard next day, I had, by rare good fortune, put a cupful of tapioca in soak several hours before.

"Rapid Rabbit"

One pint milk; four tablespoons tapioca; one cup cheese—grated; one egg well-beaten; one-half teaspoon mustard; one-half teaspoon salt; pepper or paprika to taste.

Scald the milk in a double boiler, and when it is hot, add the tapioca. Cook ten minutes; then add the grated cheese. Stir constantly till the cheese is melted, add the well-beaten egg mixed with a little cold milk, the mustard, salt and pepper. If desired, this may be turned into a baking-dish and baked until brown.

It goes without saying that I did not bake the "R. R." on the occasion of which I have spoken. I served it upon crustless slices of toast—which, I frankly confess, (again!) were made by my daughter while I was busy hurrying the rest of the dish.

It was a decided success. The boys liked it so well that they have begged for a repetition again and again. If it is the main dish at dinner, I use two eggs.—Mrs. S. D. F. (Minnesota).

Letter and recipe go well together. May we ask for the tale of other compositions? They lend spice to our chats, besides being eminently suggestive to others of equal aspirations.

By Calories—Not By Pounds

Compare food cost by calories, and you'll use more Quaker Oats. The calory is the energy unit used by governments to measure food.

On this basis, at prices current at this writing

Meats Average 8 Times as Much.
Eggs, Fish and Fowl
Cost 8 to 10 Times Quaker Oats

That is, for the same calory value. Yet these are all major foods. Pound for pound, Quaker Oats has twice the calories of round steak. Every cupful contains 280 calories—as much as four eggs.

Every dollar you spend for Quaker Oats saves at least $7 if used to displace meat, measured by the calory basis.

You have known the oat as the marvel food, well balanced, rich in minerals. But its wealth of nutriment makes it also the money-saving food.

Make Quaker Oats your breakfast. Mix it also with your flour foods. Use it to save money, to save wheat and meat, to add flavor and nutrition.

It is one of the greatest foods you have.

Quaker Oats

The Best One-Third of Oats

We use just the queen grains—big, rich and flavory—in making Quaker Oats.

We get but ten pounds from a bushel.

Thus you get oat flavor at its best. You get it without extra price. All oat foods are made doubly inviting when you use this premier grade.

Quaker Oats Bread

1 1/2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)
2 teaspoons salt
2 cups boiling water
1/4 cup lukewarm water
1/2 cup sugar
1 cake yeast
5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water, let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in 1/4 cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour.

Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes. If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour.

This recipe makes two loaves.

Quaker Oats Pancakes

2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1 1/2 cups flour, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon soda dissolved in 2 tablespoons hot water, 1 teaspoon baking powder (mix in the flour), 2 1/2 cups sour milk or buttermilk, 2 eggs beaten lightly, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 or 2 tablespoons melted butter (according to the richness of the milk).

Process: Soak Quaker Oats over night in milk. In the morning mix and sift flour, soda, sugar and salt—add this to Quaker Oats mixture—and melted butter; add eggs beaten lightly—beat thoroughly and cook as griddle cakes.

Quaker Oats Muffins

3/4 cup Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1 1/2 cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 4 level teaspoons baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, 1/2 teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar.

Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter; sift in flour and baking powder, mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

Learn Paragon Shorthand in 7 Days

See For Yourself-Send No Money-Just The Coupon

To prove to you absolutely that you can not only master PARAGON in 7 days, but in one evening's study of the first lesson learn enough to write a thousand or more different words in Shorthand, we will mail you the complete Course on 7 days free trial. If, after making this test, you are not thoroughly satisfied and do not wish to keep it, simply mail it back to us and you will owe nothing and be under no obligation whatever.

SENT ON SEVEN DAYS FREE TRIAL

SEVEN days! Does it seem to you incredible? Do you doubt it? Frankly, many of the most brilliant and successful Paragon Shorthand writers were just as skeptical in the beginning. And just as we urged them, we now urge you to lay aside your doubts long enough to make the test at our expense.

Paragon is the simplest and most efficient and most easily learned system of shorthand in the world. It will equip you in almost no time to take a fine position in business. Whatever may be your business or profession, you will find a knowledge of Paragon Shorthand a priceless aid to efficiency, and an instrument for advancement and achievement. You can use it for dictation, taking down telephone messages, speeches, conferences, sermons, lectures, lessons, court testimony, etc.

See How Perfectly Simple It Is

The entire System consists of:

1. The Paragon Alphabet—26 characters, each of which can be written mechanically, with a single stroke of a pencil.

2. 26 simple word signs.

3. 6 prefix contractions.

4. 1 general rule for abbreviations.

THAT IS ALL. Speed comes easily and swiftly with practice. Now prove this—to yourself.

Below, at the right, is a lesson that will teach you the first 5 characters. Try it. See how little time it takes you to master it. Then consider that you have already learned 5 out of the 26 whole characters!

Now do you doubt that you can learn Paragon in Seven Evenings?

This is our Home Study Course. We will send it to you for free examination and study, to use just as if it were your own—without asking you to send a penny in advance, or obligating you in any way. The new price to introduce Paragon broadly is

Only Five Dollars

This is exactly the same Course that the inventor has been teaching for 25 years—personally by mail—at a regular fee of $25 with examinations after each lesson. The author has now arranged his whole Course in Seven Simple Short Lessons for wide distribution at a popular price of $5. With this Course you can teach yourself at home—in seven evenings—with the seven lessons and an ingenious self-examination system devised by the author.

Remember that Paragon Shorthand is an Efficiency Instrument of the Hour

Never before have American business and the Government at Washington felt so keenly the shortage of capable shorthand writers. You see Uncle Sam's appeal on the screen of the movies, in the news columns of the daily papers, on posters in public buildings. Big business houses are looking everywhere for shorthand writers and are ready to pay any salary within reason to get the service they must have. Salaries are steadily advancing—and yet the demand for shorthand writers has not been supplied.

This Is Your Opportunity and "Paragon in Seven Days" is your key. Thousands of young ambitious men and women who have failed to learn the old complicated forms of shorthand, have mastered Paragon with ease. They have since become Court Stenographers, Reporters, Assistants to business heads, and in many cases big executives of prominent concerns and institutions. Thousands of grateful letters in our files attest to this fact. Here is a sample letter, from J. Martian Hamley, Official Court Reporter, Ninth Judicial District, Lake Providence, Louisiana:

"I have been using your Paragon System of Shorthand for the past eleven years, and have been engaged in every kind of stenographic work. With it I am able to do any kind of work with as great rapidity as the occasion may demand. I was taught this system by mail in seven lessons."

We Who Have Given

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A CERTAIN American hero, executed as a spy at the time of the Revolutionary War, said bravely, as he faced his executioners:

"I would that I had another life to give my country!" And his words have echoed down to us across a century, and we have thrilled to them—as we will always thrill to brave words. And today as I saw the photograph that is reproduced on this page and read the sentence printed under it, I thought of him again. And I could imagine his hand—a fine patrician hand it was—stretching across the years to touch the work-hardened fingers of little me.

For—"I have given my six children to my country," said Mrs. Haines, "and I wish that I had six more to give!"

Mrs. Haines is not American born. She came from Germany at an early age, came to a new land with nothing but a firm conviction in her mind to be a credit to that land. She married and raised a fine family—five boys and a head, just as Mrs. Haines is smiling and I've heard more than one of the say: "Yes, they're all that I have but I wouldn't want to keep the back!"

I received a little letter from a grandmother a few days ago. After reading the letter I could picture her, a fine old lady in black silk with a white tie pinned at her throat, and I can imagine her silver head flung back and her eyes alight behind her heavy-rimmed glasses. For this is the letter that she wrote:

"All of my grandsons have gone war. And I miss them. And I wonder if you can't say, in your magazine, some word of comfort a cheer for us—the grandmothers of the army—to carry close to our hearts. I used to embroider little dresses for the boys that are soldiers now, and later used to make gingerbread cakes a cookies for them. And we held them on our knees and kissed their heads and told them Bible stories. And girl. And then the war came. One by one she saw her sons go off to training-camp, and she smiled, through her tears, to see them go. And now that four of her sons are actually in France and that her only daughter is waiting the embarkation orders that may come at any minute, she is still smiling.

America is Mrs. Haines's adopted parent. But America with its fairness and square dealing and its equal chance has taken the place, in Mrs. Haines's heart, of her mother-land. And with her eyes snapping and her small figure erect she has the courage to say—

"I wish I had six more children to give to my country!"

TO the woman who has not given—to the woman who has sent neither son nor husband nor brother nor sweetheart to take his place in this conflict, the bravery of the American woman who has given seems almost unbelievable. It seems overdrawn, almost. And yet I, who have talked to dozens of these women, who correspond with hundreds of them, know that their bravery is not overdrawn—not in the least. They are all smiling with lifted we miss them almost, if not quite, much as their mothers miss them.

"My grandsons are all gone. I'm proud of them, even though I'm lonely. And I wouldn't wish them not one of them—back again. A yet—can't you give us a word of comfort?"

The grandmothers! During this war there hasn't been a great deal said about the grandmothers! And yet every grandmother cherishes the memory of a grandmother is the better for that memo. Every boy who has had his hurts kissed away by softly wrinkled old lips, every boy who has watched a slender hand wield a cookie cutter or a rolling pin, every boy who has learned his Bible verses at a grandmother's knee, I just that much more courage a strength to gird him as he goes in battle. And every grandmother's prayer, sent out across the darkness of the sea, is an added armor of love that will lie over his heart. Oh, the grandmothers are not forgotten!

And I had a letter, too, from a girl who had been married for just a few months before the war broke out. She had been married to her childhood teeth, and she loved him very early. "He was always my prince," she wrote to me—"the prince that every girl dreams of. And we'd planned our little house so very carefully and laid out our money for years and bought only good furniture—together. And we'd waited until we could afford a real home. And then we were married. "It seemed unfair, almost, that the war should come—then. But he'd had National Guard training, and I couldn't hold him back. They needed him and he could take care of myself—I've been a stenographer for years. And so we waited it over, and then he enlisted. "He went over with the first lot. And he's been unhurt—so far. And when his friends write to me and tell me what a fine record he's making I just want to sing and to tell the world how proud I am! Of course I'm scared of course every letter directed in a strange hand and every telegram that comes has its own special scare—and yet I'm glad, glad that I had him, and that a part of his going was because I wanted him to go!"

AND then, yesterday, I met a mother who had lost her only son, a little under gray-haired mother who had given the great gift to her country. And when I tried to say to her the words that were in my heart, I grew all choked up, and I could only stammer.

A Bright Book on China

PRISM, in a dark corner, is only a bit of glass—dull and uninteresting. It holds that prism up to the sunlight and it will suddenly glaze with a hundred colors, and sparkle like a thousand jewels. And, if you turn it in your hands, the colors will dance and flash and do miracles with each other. China, to Gulielma F. Alsop, is a prism. She has lifted it from a dark corner, and turned it in her hands, and in her new book, "My Chinese Days," she has held it up to the light. And the colors, jewel-like and flashing, lie between the pages of her book. "My Chinese Days" (published by Little, Brown & Co., New York, $2) is the personal narrative of a girl who is a medical missionary stationed in Shanghai. Each chapter is a complete and enthralling story in itself—although she hesitates to use the word "story." For story, somehow, suggests fiction, and "My Chinese Days" is not fiction. The keynote of the book is truth in all of its pleasant or unpleasant phases. No, the book is not fiction. It is China with all of the laughter and heartbreak, the romance and tragedy, that is China. It is the struggle of the old civilization and the new civilization—it is the first half-sleepy murmur of a waking giant. It is not fiction—it is the life of a girl, a young, attractive girl, who is thrown sharply against strange forces. It is a narrative that bathes with love and passion, with birth and death!

Gulielma F. Alsop has told her own story in her own simple words. She has not tried to pile up sensations and emotions and, perhaps because she has not tried, she has succeeded in writing passages that make the reader catch his breath sharply with a feeling of sudden wonder at the complete artistry of a new author.

In "My Chinese Days" Miss Alsop holds a prism to the light. And she has faithfully photographed the colors that have flashed through that prism. And then, with a dexterous hand, she has painted in the shadows, the light, often ghastly, shadows. And the contrast is an intense one.

"You've been so brave—so brave! You've been an inspiration to ever so many mothers because you have been so real and so true! And I can't think of anything big enough to say to you." And I don't think that I'll ever forget the high, glorified look that swept across her face as she answered me:

"It hasn't been anything, this bravery that you talk about. I'm only meeting what hundreds of other mothers are meeting—and in the same way. I'm glad that my boy had his chance—for he did have his chance!" And her head was bravely erect, too, as she said—"Oh, we who have given—we know!"

That's the spirit that is making the women of America stand up under fear and sorrow. That's the spirit that is making the mother of six children one with the grandmothers, and the young wives, and the women who wear gold service stars pinned above their sorrowful hearts. "We who have given. . ."

Oh, friends of mine, I like to think of the women of this country as a sort of an endless chain that is forged of love and welded in the fire of sacrifice. I like to think of them as standing, hand in hand, in a line that stretches through cities and through states—a line that reaches across the whole of a great nation. And I like to think of them with their heads held high and their eyes afire with patriotism, saying brave words and thinking brave thoughts and praying brave prayers!

The table of contents, read over quickly, stirs the interest. "The Mandarin's Bride," "Glowing Needles," "The Wives of Li," and "The Warm Grave" make one anxious to dip into the book. "The Flaming Wind" and "The Sanctuary of the Well" make one wonder and dream. And none of the chapters under those headings—or any other headings—cause the slightest disappointment or disillusionment. They are mysterious—as the East is mysterious. And Gulielma F. Alsop has thrilled to that mystery and has given it to us, that we, too, may thrill.

"My Chinese Days" is, I think, one of the big books of the year. In a war-swept world it sounds a new note—and a fascinating note. It rings with the song of the coolies in the market-place, and the call of strange birds, and the murmur of heavy Chinese rivers, and the sharp clatter of a brigand's knife against the pave stones of a darkened inner court. It is fragrant with the perfume of the East, and it is baffling with the important something that we of the Western world can glimpse but can never quite understand.

"My Chinese Days" is Miss Alsop's first book. It will not be her last! M. E. S.

LIEUTENANT HAROLD SYDNEY MORGAN, of the Medical Officers' Reserve Corps, who had served in Dr. Wilfred Grenfell's ship, the Stratheona, on the Labrador coast, was recently killed in action in France while serving as medical officer in the Royal Irish Fusiliers. Dr. Morgan was born in Pennsylvania, but was at the time of his death a citizen of California. When the United States entered the war he resigned his position on the staff of the Bellevue Hospital in New York and went to France with the Presbyterian Hospital unit. Are You Afraid?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic. Luke 12:1-12

HOW many, many times the fear of men has kept Christians from measuring up to that full stature in Christ which is their ideal! Nicodemus came to Jesus secretly by night, because of the Jews. We have been told that in America there are today thousands of Jews who are convinced of the real Messiahship of Jesus, but who, because of the inevitable separation of family ties, which frank, open confession would involve, follow him secretly. In the days before the secret ballot was adopted in America, many a Christian voted contrary to his conscience because his employer was interested in the election of an unworthy man. It is a mighty poor employee who is so little worth that an employer can afford to displace him because of political disagreement. We knew a fine fellow once, earnest, kind, good, the soul of honor, yet he refused to take any part in a reform movement within the denomination to which he belonged because he had a brother in official position in the church whose position might become uncomfortable if he took radical action. We have known many a testimony to go unspoken because the one who might have testified was afraid to speak before certain others present in the meeting. We have known others to miss the blessing of confession because they feared they might stumble or make a foolish blunder. We are not today, as Christians, called before magistrates to answer for our faith, but we are called before the bar of the unbelieving world, which waits to hear our testimony, while fear ties our tongues. Shall we not here also claim the promise, "The Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say." We are right in fearing that we, alone, in our own strength, might fail. It is quite possible. But we have no right to approach a critical situation merely in our own strength, when the Kingdom is concerned. It is only when we speak or act or move in the power of God that we can expect success, and when we have his spirit present with us, strengthening us, prompting us, supplying in his fulness all our lackings and weaknesses, we have no need to fear. His love casteth out fear.

Frontiers Old and New

Epworth League Topic. Acts 8:1; 4-8, 26-30, 40

PHILIP no doubt thought he was pioneering for Christ in Samaria, but God took him to a wider frontier, took him from crowded meetings to a single inquirer, from a snug town to the open desert; and Philip told the story of the Christ to his one auditor, and converted and baptized him. Out of that conversion came a great Christian Church, the Abyssinian, which, though it lost its power centuries ago, in its earlier years spread the Gospel broadcast through northern Africa.

For two generations the frontier here in America was westward, where men fought prairie sod, timber, Indians and homesickness all at once. Gradually this frontier moved across Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and halted a long time at the Missouri. Then it went forward in the wake of the 49ers by leaps and bounds across Nebraska, Colorado and the states to the westward, until it reached California. There is still frontier country in the Rockies. Every new irrigation ditch marks a new frontier, every new mining camp calls for the missionary. But the frontier no longer exists as a line which may be drawn on the map. The frontier is wherever orderly living has not yet become established. It reaches to the Philippines, and it has moved backward to the eastern coast. The thousands of foreign-born men and women who have settled along our Atlantic seaboard and who have congregated in our industrial centers between the Atlantic and the Missouri have given us a new frontier.

Regarding this new frontier and the changing frontier in general the leader is referred to Chapter 7 of "Christian Democracy for America," the League's Home Mission Study Book for this year, which, with supplemental helps, may be obtained by addressing the central office of the League, 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill.

This Big Flag Sent Free If You Ask At Once

HERE is a wonderful opportunity to secure a big, strongly made American flag at way below the cost of manufacture. It will be sent free for the asking, and you can examine it in your own home if you act promptly.

Every good American should show his colors these days. Let "Old Glory" mark your home as one which stands by our President, our army and our navy. Celebrate our victories by displaying this fine symbol of our national unity. Show your flag on holidays, at home-coming celebrations, parades, reunions, and patriotic occasions. Displaying the American flag is the least that we, who must stay at home here, can do to endorse the men who are leading us to final triumph, and the principles we are fighting for.

To make sure of your flag you must ask for it now. Our supply is limited, and when our present stock is gone it is certain we cannot obtain more at the old, low price at which we contracted for these.

FILL in the coupon printed below and mail it to the Christian Herald. The flag will be sent you at once, prepaid, for examination. If you decide to keep it send us only one dollar within five days of receipt of the flag and one dollar a month for two months, making $3 in all. The illustration is an actual photographic reproduction. Size 4 x 6 feet; double-stitched stripes; brilliant colors.

Upon the payment of your first dollar your subscription to the Christian Herald is entered at once for the period of one year, 52 issues, and you will start receiving it next week. The regular subscription price of the Christian Herald is $2.00 a year, so you will readily realize what a bargain this combination offer is.

This offer will be withdrawn as soon as our present supply of flags is gone. American flags of this kind have doubled in price and we will not be able to replenish our supply except at a big increase in cost to us. Our original order for thousands gave us the advantage of a big reduction in price and we are giving you the benefit of it.

Christian Herald, 4899 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Send me, all charges prepaid, for examination, the large American flag advertised. If I keep it I will send $1.00 within five days, and $1.00 per month thereafter for two months, a total of $3.00, which will pay for the flag as well as one full year's subscription (52 issues) to the Christian Herald. If I do not keep the flag I will send it back within five days at your expense. I incur no other obligation in mailing this coupon.

Questions and Answers

W. C. M., North Carolina. "Will you please allow me to make a suggestion in regard to the fine sermon by Edgar Dewitt Jones, D.D.? I submit that the question as to what Paul's 'thorn in the flesh' was is answered beyond any reasonable doubt in the sentence which immediately follows. Note carefully the words of Paul (II Cor. 12:7): 'There was given to me a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan, to buffet me.' I submit that the last part of this text tells in plain language what the thorn was: 'the messenger of Satan, to buffet me.' Let us analyze each word. First, the messenger. What is messenger? One sent. By whom? Satan. For what purpose? To buffet him. What is meant by 'buffet'? Our Standard Dictionary says: 'a blow—cuff—assault.' Now, we have the complete answer: 'the thorn in the flesh is nothing more nor less than one sent by Satan to blow—cuff an assault' Paul. The object of the messenger was to tempt Paul (see Rom. 7). 'I find then a law that when I would do good, evil is present with me.' It is as though the Lord should say: 'Now, Paul, you have seen, as it were, the very inner courts of heaven, and by the abundance of the revelation might be exalted above measure. You must remember that you are yet human and subject to temptation; and if you should sin, sorrow must follow and it may be some physical suffering. But my grace is sufficient for you. . . . As He says elsewhere: 'I will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able to bear.' Therefore we need not designate any special physical diet such as epilepsy, malarial fever, or affection of the eyes, for the thorn in the flesh is the messenger of Satan to buffet Paul. Whence this source of weakness or liability to sin, Paul would have been as useless to God and humanity as one of our modern prizefighters, who are too holy in their own eyes to sympathize with the humble saint of God who is in the time 'watching' and praying lest he be carried into temptation."

Mrs. Susanna K. M. R., York, Pa., writes: "Thank the Rev. C. E. Wincott of Ottawa, Canada, in the Christian Herald, September 18, 1918, for his beautiful and instructive sermon on 'Recognition in Eternity,' a subject on which many persons are in doubt as to the recognizing of our relatives and friends in the future world." She tells of two experiences in her lifetime of sixty-nine years. "The first came to me when she was nineteen, the second about a year ago, and both of them confirmed her in the conviction that 'we shall know each other there.'" She sends these verses:

My home is in heaven, my rest is not here;
Then why should I murmur when trials appear?
Battered, my dark spirit, the worst that can come
Shortens my journey and hastens me home,
Not for me to be seeking my bliss,
A building my hopes on a region like this;
I ask for a city which hands have not piled,
I want for a country by sin undefiled.

F. D., Landrum, S. C. It is unknown when the first submarine boat was built, but it is said that Alexander the Great was interested in submarine navigation. There is no doubt that types of submarine vessels were studied during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Early in the seventeenth century, submarine boats were numerous, and in 1624 Cornelius Drebbel exhibited a submarine of his own design on the Thames. By 1724 fourteen types had been patented in England alone. In 1775 David Bushnell built his first submarine boat, with which Sergeant Lee attacked H. M. S. Eagle in New York Harbor. Fulton began his experiments in France and America in 1795, and from that time numerous forms of submarines were devised with more or less success. In 1863, larger boats propelled by engines were commenced in Europe, and the navies of the various countries began experimenting with submarines. The United States navy had the submarine boat under consideration for several years. The first boat was ordered about 1895 but was never completed, and seven of the Holland type were ordered in 1900 and one purchased when nearly complete early in that year.

Immoral films in many cases have been blamed, but most of the films shown in this country are now carefully censored. The increase in juvenile delinquency in this country is considered an effect of war, and especially of married women going into industries. This effect has been much more marked in Europe, where the social disorganization has, of course, been much greater.

The army endeavors to place chaplains in regiments containing the most men of their faith, believing not that the chaplains will instill into the soldiers the individual creed of their particular churches, but that they will help the soldiers morally and spiritually.

What dishwashing does to drainpipes

Almost everybody knows what clogs up the drainpipes—the grease from dishes and pots and pans, which hardens and keeps the water from flushing away bits of waste from the sink. Gold Dust, when used for dishwashing, not only dissolves the grease on the dishes, but keeps your sink and drainpipe free, unclogged and sanitary.

Your stove will like this hint

Wherever there's a stove there's bound to be drippings—especially greasy ones. Because Gold Dust is such a gentle, effective, grease-dissolvent, most housekeepers keep a package handy. Try it on the zinc, tin or galvanized iron under your stove. Try it on top of your stove where grease has splattered from the skillet. Try it on the drip tray on your gas range.

To sweeten ice box and refrigerator

Ice boxes and refrigerators need frequent cleansing, need to be kept always in a sweet, sanitary condition. Gold Dust does this to the very best advantage, because it so thoroughly dissolves the grease. One housekeeper says she always uses Gold Dust for this purpose, because Gold Dust so completely cleanses, rinses off so easily—no danger of "soap left behind" in nooks and corners.

How to clean your meat chopper

If you've had trouble cleaning this useful kitchen helper, try a tablespoonful of Gold Dust in a dishpan of hot water. See how quickly and thoroughly Gold Dust dissolves the grease—how fresh and sweet it leaves your chopper. On baking day, too, Gold Dust makes a quick "clean-up"—bread mixer, pans, rolling pin, spoons and all cooking utensils thoroughly cleaned in record time.

"Dusting" isn't always enough

Jardinières, vases and many ornaments of crystal and china often are not washed because they do not look dirty. But Gold Dust (a tablespoon to half a pail of hot water) will bring back to them an almost forgotten freshness. That is because Gold Dust quickly dissolves the thin film of oil or grease, which in this oily age, settles on everything. See how this little task will "freshen up" the appearance of your room.

How to clean mops and brooms

After mops, brooms and brushes have done their share of the cleaning, they need a bit of cleaning themselves. The grease and oil with which they come in contact lodge in the mop and bristles. Try dissolving a tablespoonful of Gold Dust in a pail of hot water. Swish the mops and brushes up and down in this water. They will come out fresh and purified because Gold Dust so thoroughly dissolves the grease.

Cut glass and grease

What keeps your cut glass from sparkling? An invisible film of oil or grease lodges in the deep cuts. To effectively remove the cause of this trouble try a tablespoonful of Gold Dust to a dishpan of water. Apply with a brush. You will find that Gold Dust gently and effectively dissolves the grease. And this recipe will keep your cut glass sparkling.

Fresh, sweet, dish towels

After one or two dishwashing sessions your towels refuse to respond—no matter how careful you are of them, no matter how clean you wash your dishes. What is the matter? Grease. You can't feel it or see it, but it is there in the towel. A gentle effective grease dissolvent like Gold Dust takes hold of this trouble. A tablespoonful to a dishpan of water, a moment's swishing up and down, and out come your towels spotless and greaseless.

Help for baking day

Mixing bowls, rolling pins, spoons, pans, are obstinate to clean when they get "stuck up." One woman made this discovery: Grease left by shortenings used is 9-10ths of the trouble. She looked around for grease-dissolvents. Gold Dust, being the most effective and gentlest, dissolved that 9-10ths of the trouble. It shortened the work of cleaning up after cooking.

A modern idea in dishwashing

If you want to get rid of drying your dishes with a towel, try this: Use a tablespoonful of Gold Dust to a dishpan of water, wash all dishes of one kind together, scald with boiling water in a wire dish drainer. It is because Gold Dust so thoroughly dissolves the grease that the dishes come out clean and sparkling.

Now for your linoleum, oil cloth and matting

Of course it's grease mostly that makes the trouble. And when you get rid of the grease, your linoleum, oil cloth and matting are fresh and bright as the day they were bought. Try a tablespoonful of Gold Dust to a pail of water and watch the grease disappear. For Gold Dust has been proved the gentlest and most effective of all grease dissolvents. And it leaves only the fresh odor of cleanliness—no soapy smell of harsh kitchen soaps.

Well-kept, pretty china

In any water—hard or soft—and for all kinds of dishes, there's nothing like a tablespoonful of Gold Dust to a dishpan of hot water. That's because Gold Dust so gently and effectively gets rid of the grease, leaving a sparkling cleanliness. Many women prefer Gold Dust to the white soaps because it acts so much more quickly and thoroughly.

For a clean, sanitary bathroom

Even in the bathroom there's a bit of oil, a bit of grease. But Gold Dust quickly gets rid of dark circles and rims in wash bowls and bath tubs—because Gold Dust so quickly dissolves the grease. And, you'll find, Gold Dust cleans gently, without scratching or marring the surface of porcelains, enamel, tiling or nickel-plated fixtures.

Are you missing any of the new uses for Gold Dust?

Sparkling mirrors and windows

Your everyday plain or "pressed" glass will quickly respond to this treatment: Dissolve a tablespoonful of Gold Dust in a dishpan of hot water, and use a small brush. Gold Dust dissolves the thin film of oil or grease, and your glass will sparkle like diamonds. Mirrors, windows, glass doors and set-in glass of all kinds come out from their Gold Dust bath clear as crystal.

For pure, sweet waste receptacles

Garbage cans are so necessary—yet so disagreeable unless refreshed every day with a good cleanser. One housewife says: "After the can is emptied I put in a tablespoonful of Gold Dust, add hot water, swish it briskly about with a small brush—and behold! a can fresh and sweet as when new. Gold Dust purifies because it so thoroughly cleanses."

Religion at the Battle-Front

Glimpses of the Minds of the Brave Men Who Are Facing Death for World-Freedom and Righteousness

THE solace of religion, easing the hardships of war, is sharply illustrated in two letters from members of the United States Marine Corps serving with the expeditionary forces in France. These letters are now a part of the archives of the Marine Corps, where the material is being gathered from which the history of the Marine Corps in the present war will be written.

Religion, in fact, is playing a strong part in the lives of the men who are fighting in France. Especially is this true of the marines, who worship as they fight with all their heart! And just how much of a place religion can be is illustrated in the following letter from Private Reid D. Cranford, 23d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marines, to his mother, Mrs. W. Cranford, Davidson, S. C.:

"Would you ever have believed, Mother, that my nerves would have stood up as they have, being constantly under shell fire for a month? But I have been as calm now just as well as can be. Do you know how I have stood it as I have? By constant prayer and reading of the Bible. My, you have no idea what a comfort it has been to me to read God's Word and to be in constant communication with Him by prayer. I feel His presence with me all the time, and I am not the least bit excited even when a shell hits near, for I have His peace with me. I pray: O Father, I commit myself into thy keeping; do for me as thou knowest best, and all will be well.

"Then, that wonderful 14th chapter of John! My life is spared you may be sure I am going to aim at the higher life. To live for God and for you, my dear Mother, is all I want. If God sees fit to take me, I am perfectly resigned to his will, and have no fear at meeting him, for I am trying with all my soul to live a clean, upright life, and think I will be ready if he calls me.

"Deepest love to all; your son,

REID."

THE second letter, from First Lieutenant M. H. Silverthorn of the Marines, to his wife, Mrs. Marie Silverthorn, 3632 Columbus Avenue, Minneapolis, Minn., carries with it a graphic picture of war, and an illustration that even war can have its higher side and its benefits in the fact that it brings home to the fighting man the deeper belief in religion that oftentimes is neglected in the rush and scramble of daily life:

"DEAR MARIE, MOTHER AND FOLKS: I am sorry that I have not had an opportunity to write sooner, but such is the case. The month of June is a month that will always be vivid in my memory. It will always be a month that, though I live to be a hundred years old, whenever I recall it I will have to thank God that I am now writing this to you; and a pang of deep sorrow will always pierce my heart when I think of some of my bosom friends, men young in years, but men from the ground up, who have made the supreme sacrifice, and with a smile on their faces and their eyes lifted to God, but still plunging forward in that seething mass of hell, have met their end like true Americans. It is a sight that will always be vivid, and an experience that has changed me over night from a youth seeking adventure to a man who has shaken dice with death, who has seen that grim monster reach out his cold, scaly hand and pick out so many brave men; but, thanks to your prayers and mine, and thanks to the dear Father, who sent his Guardian Angel to protect me, I am still alive.

"If there is any person who does not believe there is a God, let that man go over the top just once. It will do more to convince him than a thousand years of religious meetings.

MERTON."

WHEN the resumption of acceptances of men for the Marine Corps came recently, after a month's cessation owing to the new draft laws, the first man to be accepted at the San Francisco office of the United States Marines was a minister. Daniel Stevens is his name, and he was formerly pastor of St. Paul's Episcopal Church at Grand and Mapleton Streets, San Francisco. He joined the Marines, he said, because he "wanted more action."

"I belonged to the National Guard of California," said the minister, as he underwent the physical examination. "As I am a minister, I am not subject to the draft; but it is my sincere wish to see action, and to see it quick. And I am hoping that within a short time I shall be able to get a few Huns for myself."

The Rev. Mr. Stevens will take his training at Mare Island, California.

Arrived in France, religion is not forgotten. The minister waits while the band plays the first lines of the hymn

The President Says "Surrender!"

PRESIDENT WILSON did not long withhold his answer after receiving the official copy of Germany's latest note. Basing his decision upon the unofficial wireless copy of the Berlin note received October 21, and on his conferences with the Allies, the President awaited the delivery on October 23 by the Swiss Chargé, Mr. Oederlin, of the German text and Berlin's official English translation. Finding these not at variance in any essential degree from the version first received, the President authorized Secretary Lansing to forward the note he had prepared. The official copy was at once delivered to the Swiss legation and the text was made public late in the afternoon.

President Wilson's Reply to the German Government

Department of State, Washington, D. C.,
Oct. 23, 1918.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 22d transmitting a communication under date of the 20th from the German Government and to advise you that the President has instructed me to reply thereto as follows:

Having received the solemn and explicit assurance of the German Government that it unreservedly accepts the terms of peace laid down in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses, particularly the address of the 27th of September, and that it desires to discuss the details of their application, and that this wish and purpose emanate, not from those who have hitherto dictated German policy and conducted the present war on Germany's behalf, but from Ministers who speak for the majority of the Reichstag and for an overwhelming majority of the German people; and having received also the explicit promise of the present German Government that the humane rules of civilized warfare will be observed both on land and sea by the German armed forces, the President of the United States feels that he cannot decline to take up with the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated the question of an armistice.

He deems it his duty to say again, however, that the only armistice he would feel justified in submitting for consideration would be one which should leave the United States and the Powers associated with her in a position to enforce any arrangements that may be entered into and to make a renewal of hostilities on the part of Germany impossible.

The President has, therefore, transmitted his correspondence with the present German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that, if those Governments are disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated, their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such an armistice as will fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government has agreed, provided they deem such an armistice possible from the military point of view. Should such terms of armistice be suggested, their acceptance by Germany will afford the best concrete evidence of her unequivocal acceptance of the terms and principles of peace from which the whole action proceeds.

The President would deem himself lacking in candor did he not point out in the frankest possible terms the reason why extraordinary safeguards must be demanded. Significant and important as the Constitutional changes seem to be which are spoken of by the German Foreign Secretary in his note of the 20th of October, it does not appear that the principle of a Government responsible to the German people has yet been fully worked out or that any guarantees either exist or are in contemplation that the alterations of principle and practice now partially agreed upon will be permanent. Moreover, it does not appear that the heart of the present difficulty has been reached. It may be that future wars have been brought under the control of the German people, but the present war has not been; and it is with the present war that we are dealing. It is evident that the German people have no means of commanding the acquiescence of the military authorities of the Empire in the popular will; that the power of the King of Prussia to control the policy of the Empire is unimpaired; that the determining initiative still remains with those who have hitherto been the masters of Germany. Feeling that the whole peace of the world depends now on plain speaking and straightforward action, the President deems it his duty to say, without any attempt to soften what may seem harsh words, that the nations of the world do not and cannot trust the word of those who have hitherto been the masters of German policy, and to point out once more that in concluding peace and attempting to undo the infinite injuries and injustices of this war the Government of the United States cannot deal with any but veritable representatives of the German people who have been assured of a genuine Constitutional standing the real rulers of Germany.

If it must deal with the military masters and the monarchical autocrats of Germany now, or if it is likely to have to deal with them later in regard to the international obligations of the German Empire, it must demand, not peace negotiations, but surrender. Nothing can be gained by leaving this essential thing unsaid.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration,

(Signed) ROBERT LANSING.

World Winning Gospel Temperance Work

THE National W. C. T. U. in the call for its annual conference (at Evanston, Ill., November 12 to 15, 1918) issues a new and rousing proclamation.

In this timely clarion call to Christian temperance advance, the white ribbon leaders appeal to "all churches and all organizations of men and women to unite in securing world-wide prohibition by 1925."

The National W. C. T. U., now that Federal prohibition is so well assured, looks forward with triumphant energy to "the next thing"—the winning of every nation and the placing of prohibition in the organic law of the whole world, "invoking the guidance and blessing of Almighty God and the cooperation of the men and women of all lands who love their fellow men."

The national and state leaders reviewing the national and world-wide field find much cause for rejoicing, and much opportunity for hopeful activity. During 1918, Texas has gone dry (the twenty-eighth prohibition state); and the prohibition law has gone into operation in Alaska, Indiana, Michigan, New Hampshire, Montana, New Mexico, Porto Rico, the Island of Guam, the territory of Hawaii and the Virgin Islands.

All the recent liquor-abolishing acts of the President, the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, and the Congress of the United States (as safeguards in wartime to make for national strength and efficiency) are sources of great encouragement to the patient, hard-working gospel temperance women of the W. C.

T. U. These acts are being watched by leaders in many lands, with a view to their emulation, among these countries being Japan, New Zealand, South Africa, Mexico, France and Great Britain.

Rapid strides toward prohibition are reported from South Africa, where the missionaries and the White Ribboners are opposed to beer-selling to the black men; where soldiers are being safeguarded; and the sale of liquor to women is forbidden.

Camps and transports are dry in New Zealand, where the new six-o'clock closing bill is the entering wedge to full prohibition.

India reports a decrease of liquor shops and a new dry area that has been established around Calcutta University.

Japan is also watching the American prohibition movement. The Sunrise Kingdom has its own "Frances Willard" in the person of Mme. Yaji Kajima (now eighty-six years of age and recently re-elected president of Japanese National W. C. T. U.), who now also urges a campaign of social purity; Japan's "Neal Dow," Nemoto Sho, is equally active in the good work of the Gospel temperance reform among the Japanese.

The republic of Mexico has added a dry state, Yucatan; and Bermuda has established shorter hours for the sale of liquor.

The war problem of grain for food or for liquor has lessened the production of liquor; many countries, including Sweden, the Netherlands (where the temperance organizations are rolling up petitions for legislation as a step toward prohibition; and Germany (where beer is said not to taste like beer any more).

Both President Poincaré and Premier Clémenceau of France are personal total abstainers and endorsers of the temperance instruction campaign going on there. Scientific temperance instruction is enjoying increasing vogue in many lands, including China, Burma, Japan, India, Italy, South Africa, Australia, Switzerland and several South American republics.

A great impetus has been given to pledge-signing in Great Britain by the fact that King George has become a total abstainer and that no liquors of any kind are served at the royal tables. Hull, England, recently voted out the liquor traffic. The war has brought a great increase in temperance sentiment throughout the United Kingdom (the drink bill of 1917 being $1,295,000,000). Great war prohibition parades have stirred enthusiastic response. Protests from Canada, where prohibition now is the vogue, and from the United States, against the use of food materials for beer and other alcoholic drinks, have had their good effect. Six million new women voters will take part in the political life of the country.

In all lands the world around, there are present urgent needs for the ripe experienced service of the W. C. T. U. of America, which in all its plans goes forward with the essential powers of organized foresight and of persuasive, persistent consecration to the highest welfare of humanity.

The Puritan and the Cavalier

By EDWARD S.
VAN ZILE, L.H.D.

THAT joy of life, that spirit of youth, that love of pleasure that is characteristic of the Cavalier had to be reckoned with, had to be combined with the Puritan's devotion to self-restraint, simplicity of existence, abstinence from frivolity, in a way to make the Y. M. C. A. appeal to all sorts and conditions of men, to attract the Cavalier because he offered him satisfaction for his high spirits and the Puritan because it satisfied his longing for clean and simple life. One of the miracles of all the ages is the manner in which the Y. M. C. A. has solved this difficult problem, and, without making any concession to subversive influences, has adapted its activities to the many-sidedness of human nature, drawing to itself the enthusiastic support of both the youth who goes through life with a song on his lips and his more serious-minded comrade who finds his joy and consolation in prayer.

Since a year ago, I have been in the front line trenches before Rheims, with the Boche less than a quarter of a mile away. I have been many times under fire, have been gassed by a submarine, have felt that my last moment was at hand as a German taube sailed over my head. I have seen men wounded, blinded, suffering all kinds of agonies for the glorious cause of Civilization against Barbarism. In memory the past twelve months is to me like a panorama that has shown me man in the most noble moment of his career, rising to heights of heroism and self-abnegation that he has never reached before, and giving in death, the glorious death of self-sacrificing youth, the lie direct to the materialists, to the Haeckels of the day, who assert that the human soul is a mere figment of man's imagination.

COULD any man with a heart in him undergo such an experience as I have had without warning toward every agency that aims to make the distance of our fighting heroes more endurable? My only son, my only brother and three sons-in-law are in the American Army, three of them in France. My oldest son-in-law is in charge of a Y. M. C. A. officers' club at Liverpool, England. When my son joined our regulars some years ago and went into Mexico in a cavalry troop of General Pershing's army, I received my first proof of the fact that without the activities of the Y. M. C. A., life for an American soldier would be on a lower plane than it is, might indeed become well-nigh unbearable. It was my good luck last Autumn to be located at the Hotel Plaza d'Athenée, Avenue Montaigne, Paris, almost next door to the Y. M. C. A. general headquarters. My conviction as to the necessity of the Y. M. C. A. was strengthened by what I saw, heard and felt at that old Napoleonic mansion on the Avenue Montaigne, where I witnessed the detailed workings of a gigantic uplifting enterprise dedicated to the difficult but splendid purpose of keeping American youth untarnished by the evil influences that are raised to the nth power in wartime in a pleasure-loving capital city. The average American boy is a healthy-minded specimen of vigorous young manhood, but Paris, even with the Hun menace overshadowing it, is not without its dangerous allurements, its seductions and temptations, its historic tendency to mingle license with gaiety.

The service that the Y. M. C. A. in France has rendered to our American soldiers, far from home, easy marks for the poisoned arrows of nostalgia, craving outlets for the unrest begotten of a strange environment and the proximity of war's worst horrors, can not be too highly praised. What I saw in France of the influence exerted upon our boys by the Y. M. C. A. convinces me that—except for the unequivocal stand for right and cleanness of Pershing himself—to that organization is largely due the credit for the fact that no foreign soldiery has ever had so high a record for good behavior, good health, good spirits and good nature as our American nightly by the personnel of the Y. M. C. A. on both sides of the Atlantic have appealed to me as, perhaps, the most astonishing exhibitions I have witnessed in a year replete with marvelous sights. The effectiveness of our fighting forces is dependent upon the intensive activities of an organization that, by following the flag, makes possible the triumphs of that flag.

A few weeks ago I had an opportunity to visit the Great Lakes Naval Training Station near Chicago. Here, as at Camp Dix, Fort Slocum and in France, the imperative necessity for the existence of the Y. M. C. A. centers was made clear to me. At the Great Lakes Station were gathered, on that beautiful July day, over forty thousand tars in embryo—sturdy, bronzed, wide-awake young Americans, displaying to the eyes of a keen observer all the splendid qualities and the characteristic defects of our national make-up. When a democratic people, devoted to the cult of individualism, endeavors in two short years to fashion its youth in the stiff mold of military and naval discipline, it essays a well-nigh-impossible task. The very qualities, acquired and hereditary, that makes the American soldier or marine a reckless, irresistible fighter render him extremely hard to army has won among the French. What the outcome of the practically sudden advent of over one million young, vigorous, rather dare-devilish Americans to a land passionately grateful for their coming, a land populated by a race infinitely more Cavalier than Puritan, would have been had there been no Y. M. C. A. huts as centers from which radiated influences making for poise, restraint, common-sense and cool-headedness, it is difficult to imagine. But fortunately the huts were there, with a small army of tactful, devoted, wise and sympathetic men and women, understanding human nature, and the outcome has been an achievement that will forever glorify those four letters—Y. M. C. A.—letters that, in this connection, might stand for Youth Maintained Clean and Aspiring.

FROM the Avenue Montaigne, Paris, to Camp Dix, New Jersey, is a far cry. It was my privilege to deliver the Memorial Day address at Camp Dix on the 20th of May last. After a long, hot journey I found myself, in the early evening, confronting a throng of a thousand young men in khaki. During the ensuing three days I spoke eight times to gatherings of "rookies," five hundred in each group, and on the last evening of my stay again faced a thousand men in the main hall. The thought that I carried away from Camp Dix was that as a nation we have at last obtained a melting-pot—the army—that actually melts, actually fuses the varied elements of our polyglot people. And this new and efficient melting-pot is performing its invaluable task in Americanization largely through the efforts of the Y. M. C. A. I was amazed and delighted at the scope of the work being accomplished at Dix.

The care of soldiers is simplified for nations whose military forces are largely homogeneous. In America the obligations devolving upon such an organization as the Y. M. C. A. are almost fatally complicated by the fact that the American army more nearly resembles the Tower of Babel and the confusion of tongues for which it stood than any gathering the world has ever known. About the only races not represented at our great camps are the prehistoric. I have come to the conclusion that the sine qua non of all the virtues for the Y. M. C. A. as a body, and for its individual workers, is Tact. The manifestations of tactfulness displayed daily and manage. A French officer remarked to me in Paris that when they were ordered to capture one trench the Americans took three.

WITH such material demanding wholesome restraints, it is apparent that worldly wisdom, sympathetic diplomacy, a mingling of firmness and broad-mindedness are demanded of the Y. M. C. A. men and women whose duties throw them daily and nightly into the closest personal contact with high-strung, impetuous, often extremely unsophisticated boys from all parts of our broad land. At the Great Lakes I witnessed repeated episodes illustrating the variety and difficulty of the problems hourly, almost momentarily, presented to the Y. M. C. A. officials, and the amazing patience, skill and tact displayed in the solution of those problems.

As I look back upon the cumulative evidence I have collected, I find that the conviction grows upon me that one of the basic reasons for the world-wide success of this organization at mankind's most awful crisis lies in the fact that the civilized peoples of the earth are engaged at present in the waging of a religious war. Our fight against Hohenzollernism and all the reactionary evils it represents is in reality the greatest of all crusades. If not the long-predicted Armageddon, it is nevertheless an armed struggle to a finish between the Powers of Light and the Powers of Darkness. The most appropriate battle-hymn today for the knightly warriors of the Entente is "Onward, Christian Soldiers." The conflicting ideals underlying and responsible for this most stupendous of all conflicts make of it a war to the death between Corsica and Galilee, between Cæsar and the Christ, between the spiritual death that despotism begets and the life of the soul that springs from human freedom.

"I come to bring not peace but a sword." These words of the Christ are in harmony with the spirit he displayed when, at the risk of his early life, he entered the synagogue at Jerusalem and overthrew the tables of the money-changers. In devoting its energies to maintaining the morale of our fighting troops in this crusade against the cohorts of Satan, the Y. M. C. A. is demonstrating anew its raison d'être as a Christian Association. The Great Crusade! To preach it, to fight it, to sing it—these are the duties devolving upon us all.

Nations Take Steps Toward Peace

LEAVING no interval beyond that necessary for a Crown Council and a gathering of military chiefs and political leaders, Germany, on October 27, replied to President Wilson's note of October 23. The text of the reply was as follows:

"The German Government has taken cognizance of the answer of the President of the United States.

"The President is aware of the far-reaching changes which have been carried out and are being carried out in the German constitutional structure, and that peace negotiations are being conducted by a People's Government in whose hands rests, both actually and constitutionally, the power to make the deciding conclusions. The military powers are also subject to it.

"The German Government now awaits proposals for an armistice, which shall be the first step toward a just peace, as the President has described it in his proclamation."

(Signed) SOLF.

This note, which was supplemented by another along similar lines received in Washington October 30, came on the same wire which brought word of the acceptance by the Emperor of the resignation of General Ludendorff, as First Quarter-master-General of the German Army.

On October 28 Austria sent the reply to President Wilson's note of October 19 printed on this page in which she accepted all the views expressed by the President and declared her willingness to negotiate a separate peace.

Count Andrassy, Austrian Foreign Minister, on October 29, sent a note to Secretary of State Lansing urging him to intercede with the President in the interest of speedy consideration of Austria's plea for peace.

Although not officially so announced it was the impression in Washington that the Austrian plea would be referred to the Allies.

And with all this, Norwegian sources reported German U-boats traveling homeward flying white flags at their mastheads.

There were also rumors that Prince Max was urging abdication upon the Kaiser. "The Nuremberg Frankische Tagespost was reported to have declared editorially that the Kaiser must quit his throne in obedience to Wilson's command, and 'end his life somewhere or other as a private individual.'"

Emperor William was reported, on October 28, to have no idea of abdicating, having declared, "I will not abandon my sorely tried people, but, if necessary, I am ready to become something like hereditary President of a German republic like the kings of England and Belgium and Italy"; but on October 30, he was said to have declared to a number of members of the Reichstag, "If the moment comes when the interest of Germany demands it, I should abdicate, but the moment does not seem to have come yet."

In the Reichstag on October 2, Friedrich von Payer, German Vice-Chancellor, said, "We need confidence not merely at home; we need the confidence of foreign countries, even the confidence of our enemies. For we want peace and we need it. Our enemies distrust our sincere intention to conclude a peace of justice. They mistrust us mainly on the ground of many events in the past, concerning which we can not take it amiss of them if they have certain doubts. We have, therefore, no use for anyone in the Government who still favors a peace of force more than a peace of justice."

Now that the prospective peace of force has been reversed, and it is Germany which is to feel the heavy hand

Austria Accepts All Conditions

BASEL, Oct. 28 (Associated Press).—The Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister yesterday instructed the Austro-Hungarian Minister at Stockholm to ask the Swedish Government to send the following note to the American Government, dated Oct. 28 at Vienna and signed by Count Julius Andrassy, the new Foreign Minister:

In reply to the note of President Wilson of the 19th of this month, addressed to the Austro-Hungarian Government and giving the decision of the President to speak directly with the Austro-Hungarian Government on the question of an armistice and of peace, the Austro-Hungarian Government has the honor to declare that, equally with the preceding proclamations of the President, it adheres also to the same point of view contained in the last note upon the rights of the Austro-Hungarian peoples, especially those of the Czecho-Slovaks and the Jugo-Slavs.

Consequently, Austria-Hungary accepting all the conditions the President has laid down for the entry into negotiations for an armistice and peace, no obstacle exists, according to the judgment of the Austro-Hungarian Government, to the beginning of these negotiations.

The Austro-Hungarian Government declares itself ready, in consequence, without awaiting the result of other negotiations, to enter into negotiations upon peace between Austria-Hungary and the states in the opposing group and for an immediate armistice upon all Austro-Hungarian fronts.

It asks President Wilson to be so kind as to begin overtures on this subject.

Fourth—The Reichstag will control the appointment and promotion of army and navy officers.

President Wilson's note was hailed in all Allied countries as a ray of light military material and Allied occupation of Metz, Strassburg, Coblenz, and the Krupp works. In connection with this it became public, on October 25, that Colonel House and Admiral Benzo had reached Europe on a special mission in connection with the preparation for peace, being commissioned to facilitate the formation of a unified basis of peace terms for all the Allies.

London reported, on October 28, that the Versailles Conference had agreed on an outline of peace terms and that the question now lay with the military leaders who were framing armistice regulations. It was said that the provisions for an armistice and the Allied basis of peace would be sent to German simultaneously, and that the armistice would be such as would "break Germany's sword irretrievably." If Germany should accept, peace might be achieved before this paper reaches its readers.

Although there were rumors that Hindenburg also had resigned, the American Intelligence Service, on October 28, made public a dispatch from the German Commander to the army in the field in which he urged them to hold fast, saying:

German soldiers, be vigilant. . . . In this hour the Fatherland relies on you for its prosperity and for its safety.

Conditions in both Germany and Austria grew more complex day followed day. The German workers in the Rhine district, faced with possible invasion, were demanding peace and threatening the throne. In Hungary Count Kaolvi had declared an organized opposition against the opposition of King Charles a new republican government based on equal secret suffrage of both sexes, which had declared its independence, had recognized the Czech, Slovak and Jugo-Slav Governments, and had announced its intention to secure a separate peace for Hungary. Austria had abolished the military censorship, and Austrian royalty, grand dukes and such, was sending its money to Switzerland and seeking, not without rebuffs, places of safety for its persons.

A Week in the World's News

AUSTRIA BREAKING UP. Advice through Switzerland, on October 23, reported that a Central Executive Committee had been elected by the national council of Slovenes, Croats and Serbians at Agram, which had adopted a declaration of principles including a reunion of these peoples on national basis without reference to the present frontiers and the creation of sovereign state on the democratic basis. The committee rejected the plan for federal states proposed by the recent imperial manifesto. It was reported that the German-Austrian deputy in the Austrian Reichsrath had united for the organization of a German state of Austria, and had declared for access to the Adriatic for this state. The Czecho-Slavs in Bohemia were also reported to have refused to accept federalization as proposed by the Austrian Government and to be sticking to their demand for complete independence. Austria on October 23 yielded authority in Bohemia to the Czechs, while a movement was gathering force for the uniting to France of Austria and German Poland. Swiss sources reported on October 2 that Austria had published orders for the demobilization of the Austrian Earthquake damage in Mayaguez, Porto Rico. Shocks on Oct. 11 did great damage, estimated at $1,000,000, to government property throughout the Island, while churches suffered to the extent of $500,000, the private loss not being estimated. Many hundreds of lives were reported lost. Further shocks on October 24 increased the damage.

and will ask that it be footed up and paid. Belgium also has an account. Justice may need to call in equity to aid her and even then it is hard to see where Germany can hope for much comfort unless mercy, too, sits in judgment, and the Hun has been merciless.

The reference in the German note to changes in the constitution placing the military forces under control of a people's government evidently was based on a bill introduced and reported for passage in the Reichstag which provides that—

First—War can only be declared with the sanction of the Reichstag and Bundesrat.

Second—The chancellor can only remain in power while he possesses the confidence of the Reichstag.

Third—The chancellor will be responsible for the political actions of the Kaiser and the chancellor and the ministry will hold office subject to the action of the Reichstag and Bundesrat.

The Wide, Wide World

DICK WARD has made the great decision, but not Dick only; the fine fellows of his unit are with him in this decision, and next week we will see them, under the leadership of Chaplain Hunter, almost miraculously restored to them, and the guidance of Dr. Ward, planning to go into all the world. But there are complications, which Dr. Sheldon handles with skill and fidelity.

The Church After The War? It is a broad question, a deep and wide problem.

Last week we quoted the opinions of many leaders of denominational thought on this subject. Their judgments were strangely in agreement. Next week the sincere expressions of other men, like-minded, will be laid before us.

Mrs. Wilson has some new china. Next week Abby Gunn Baker will tell us about it. Y. M. C. A. work in France is hard and dangerous and takes grit and gumption. Next week we will go with a secretary to the gun positions near the front.

Italians Crush Austrian Line and Break Through

MILITARY writers have, for a month or more, agreed that the logic of the Austrian situation augured an attack in force by the great Italian army and the British, French and American divisions in line with it. But the Italian army did not strike. Apparently Marshal Foch was not ready.

On October 25, although the weather was already turning against them, the Italians and French struck northward against the Austrian positions between the Piave and the Brenta, along the southern edge of the Asiago plateau. The British struck eastward across the Piave at the Montello bend, taking some strongly garrisoned islands in the river with 700 men of the garrisons.

The French took Monte Sisemol on the Asiago plateau, with some 800 prisoners. The Italians crossed the little river torrent north of Monte Grappa and captured Monte Trassolan and Monte Pertica, with over 1,800 prisoners. The total of prisoners was about 10,000. On the following day the Austrians made desperate attempts to retake the lost positions, but though the lines fluctuated somewhat, the Allies, at the close of the day, had maintained all their gains, had driven the Austrians back in places and had taken 2,000 more prisoners. On October 27 further Austrian counterattacks cost them large losses in killed and 500 men taken prisoners and the British and Italians crossed the Piave east of Montello, breaking down obstinate but futile Austrian resistance.

The Italian crossing of the Piave developed further on October 28, the enemy being defeated in a bitter battle, losing 33,000 men and 201 guns to the victorious Italians. On October 29 the battle was joined on a 37-mile front from the Brenta to below Montello on the Piave. The Italian and British troops were across the Piave along a wide front which was being readily extended against obstinate opposition. The important railway center of Conegliano, five miles east of the Piave, was in Allied hands and the Italians had captured the heights of Montebelluna and had entered Susegana. In the mountain front further progress also being made. American troops are in reserve on the Piave line.

Along the battle-line in France and Belgium the week saw little change in positions but much hard fighting. The Germans apparently planned to stand on the line on which they had taken position as we closed the story in last week's issue. With a materially shortened front, the losses of the past three months were somewhat neutralized, and the German army, for so long in headlong retreat, reappeared as an effective fighting force. The artillery concentrations were nearly as great as in the early days of Foch's offensive and liberal use was made of high explosive and gas shells.

But with all this evident intention on the part of the Germans to stand fast, the Allies made gains all the way along the line from the Meuse, where General Pershing's men were pushing back 28 German divisions to the neighborhood 15 miles from Maubeuge and were within 18 miles of Mons where the contemptible little army first stood across the path of German ambition.

FURTHER south between the Oise and the Aisne three French armies, continuing the pressure that had driven the German back from Laon, finally forced him to relinquish key positions on his second line, the Hunting Line, which ran from the Oise eastward to the Aisne along the little Serre River and along the north shore of the Aisne with Rethel as its central key. It was a quadruple line of trench systems, with concrete dugouts and before each trench system five lines of barbed-wire, each 20 pivot of his line and every yard he loses here brings him measurably nearer defeat. All during the past week the Germans heavily counterattacked the American troops both east and west of the Meuse. Some of the counterattacks forced our boys to give ground, but new attacks always re-won ground lost. Thus the lines swayed in deadly combat throughout the days, and as the week ended the American troops were in possession of Briailles and the wooded heights commanding it, and were in touch with new German Freya line, some four miles north of the Kriemhilde line, now entirely in American possession. Since they attacked in this sector the Americans have taken 20,000 prisoners and 127 guns, and according to careful computations have caused the Germans not less than 70,000 casualties. Our boys have been firing 150,000 shells a day from 1,000 cannon and in a month have gained 18 kilometers, about 12 miles, over rough, wooded, ravine-cut, almost impregnable country against a desperate enemy whose skill and military acumen have been combined to make nature's obstacles tenfold more terrible. Yet 40,000 engineers built roads through quagmires under hellish fire, and founded one on captured shells laid end to end across the swamp, while they threw bridges over wire fields too dense to cut.

GENERAL MARCH, Chief of Staff, stated in Washington, on October 26, that the Allied troops since the initiation of Marshal Foch's series of continuous drives on July 18, had retaken 7,000 square miles of French and Belgian territory. Although the joy of the inhabitants of recaptured towns and villages is unbounded, and their welcome to the Allied troops one unbroken ovation of victory, the housing, feeding and re-establishing of these thousands of repatriates is a big problem. The Germans leave them with nothing, either to eat or to work with. First they must be fed, and the Allied military authorities must see that they do not hunger until the Red Cross is ready to take over the job. Then their houses must be made wholly habitable again and finally they must be given means of livelihood. Various committees are working with the Red Cross in meeting and conquering this problem, but it is one that will grow with victory, and it will be still with us for many months after the peace is signed.

Over the top and beyond in Flanders. Belgian advance guards following up the Boche of Valenciennes, where General Haig's men, with some American divisions, in some of the most furious fighting of the war, overcame both serious natural obstacles and the best fighters Germany could muster, and steadily and inexorably drove their lines deeper north and south of the city. In a forward sweep on October 25, General Haig's men, Americans aiding, swept forward over a wide front and took between six and seven miles of the Valenciennes-Le Quesnoy railroad, with nearly 10,000 prisoners and more than 100 guns. This attack was the culmination of a week of steady, grueling, dogged and persistent fighting which, with moonlight, did not cease for a minute in the twenty-four hours during three terrible days. The British artillery nullified German orders not to give ground, and the tanks continued to do the impossible, as a matter of course. The British reached the outskirts of the Mormal forest about feet through. Back of this line the Germans had concentrated every available gun, since further giving of ground here meant the loss of vital communications.

Consequently, the Germans fought here as hard as they have fought anywhere since 1914. But the French fought harder, and, on October 26, they broke through on a ten-mile front from the Aisne westward to Quentin le Petit, took Banogne in the center of the Hunting Line and Mortiers, its western bastion, which gave the French a bridgehead position north of the Serre. On October 29 the Germans were in retreat along a 40-mile line from Guise around the point of the salient to the positions north of Rethel.

In the Meuse sector, where General Pershing's first army has been steadily hammering the Boche, further progress was made, although the Hun did everything he could to prevent it. The Americans are attacking the eastern and that the Bolshevik troops following the German evacuation were engaged in excesses which had caused two delegates to be sent to Copenhagen to appeal for American, French and British help. The peasants in Northern Russia were reported, on October 23, to have joined with the Allied armies in driving back the Bolshevik troops in the neighborhood of Vologda.

The tanks have become the nightmare of the German armies. A British war expert discussing the work of the tanks recently declared that each squadron of 36 tanks saved at least a thousand casualties every day they were in action, and it has been freely stated that the British, French, Belgian and American armies by use of tanks were enabled to drive back the German hordes with less men than the Germans were using to resist the action, the great bulk of the Allied armies being thus rendered mobile, ready for use in any promising corner of the field.

Losses by submarine and marine risks in September, 1918, amounted to 151,593 gross tons of British shipping, the smallest monthly sinkings since August, 1916.

Secretary of War Baker in a letter addressed to the President, on October 23, stated that the total number of American soldiers sent abroad since May 8, 1917, was 2,008,931.

The Belgian government has already begun to tabulate the bill which will be rendered to Berlin at the peace conference. On October 21 the amount was said to be nearly $2,000,000,000, representing Germany's levies upon towns and individuals and the supply of raw materials and machinery taken by Germany.

The Belgian government, on October 23, announced that it had decided to move its Administrative Departments from Havre to Bruges. It was stated that Belgium would never consent to return to the state of guaranteed neutrality which was violated by Germany, but would be satisfied only with complete independence.

On October 23 it was estimated that the Germans had at their command on the eastern front 196 divisions, six of them Austrian, of which 30 were in general reserve, whereas at the beginning of September they had 200 divisions, of which 35 were in reserve. This would indicate an absolute loss in seven weeks of an equivalent of 4 divisions. Not only this, but the divisions still existing are much below full strength, and the steady pressure of the Allies has evicted the customary resting of divisions, placing all of the enemy's men under a terrific strain.

Copenhagen dispatches, of October 23, reported that the German troops were evacuating the Russian districts east of the line specified at Brest-Litovsk

WE know that you want the Christian Herald, that you welcome every issue. But to maintain the present standard of your paper and meet constantly rising costs of paper, postage, printing, engraving and everything that enters into the process of production, it is inevitable that the subscription price should be advanced. The new price will be $2.50. To get the present low price subscribe now.

The Kaiser's Cross

THERE have not been wanting in Germany during these four years of her war against civilization and humanity, strong and earnest voices that rose in protest against her choice of the course that was leading the nation to dishonor and defeat. They were voices that could not be stifled by imprisonment, nor silenced by newspaper suppression. After each attack, they arose again in still louder protests, warning the German people and their rulers that they were heading to national shame and ruin.

Maximilian Harden, editor of Die Zukunft, was the leader among these war-time prophets. Loyal to the best interests of his country, his repeated warnings that the government's course must end in disaster were mocked and derided by the time-serving official press. He was thrown into jail among criminals, and the government gag was applied in the confiscation of his paper. From every such experience he emerged stronger, bolder, more resolute than before in the application of his inexorable criticism of the government and its methods in the war.

Since Germany's morale went to pieces—or, as Ludendorff expressed it, she had "lost the game"—Harden's voice has risen to an even higher key. At a recent public meeting in Berlin, which the police did not seek to molest, he was permitted to speak with the utmost freedom. It was now Germany who stood alone against the world, he said, "and when a fortress can no longer hold, it is no dishonor if the commander surrender. The Kaiser must take up his cross of concluding quickly the necessary peace, and accepting whatever is hard. Let the Kaiser declare himself ready and let him fit himself with new Germany as her first citizen. She must make sacrifices; the emperor also must make sacrifices. He must first adapt himself to the new Germany and content himself to represent the nation. Then he must bear his own part of the cross, concluding rapidly the necessary peace. He must take upon himself the task of accepting the onerous conditions involved. He must withdraw German troops to the empire's frontiers and henceforth demand that the Reichstag assent to a declaration of war."

Hard words, these, and bitter for the "Supreme War Lord," as well as all his sabre-rattling adherents, to pass unresented; but times have changed. Germany's "impregnable defenses" have been swept into the rubbish-heap by the mighty blows of those enemies whom she held in contempt less than a year ago. Her "shock" battalions are decimated; her mighty armies are in flight; her great generals now confess the war lost, and even her allies have abandoned her. Yes, Harden spoke the truth! The fate Germany had hoped to force upon her enemies has overtaken herself. She must surrender!

Will the Kaiser take up the cross and leave pride, ambition and autocratic authority upon the altar of sacrifice, to save what remains, in order that a new and free Germany may rise—a Germany in which the voice of the people will be heard and where their will shall dominate? Unfortunately, there are no evidences of such a change of heart on the part of the one man who, above all others, is responsible for the war and the desolation and suffering it has brought into the world. The cables tell us that "he has lately become extremely devout and spends hours every day in prayer." It may be that he now sees that he has been fighting against God and against justice and righteousness, and that it is time for him to show the works of repentance. He can now realize the truth of the Scripture where it says: "Ye lust and have not; ye kill and covet and cannot obtain; ye fight and war; ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss." His dream of world-power has passed now, and as Maximilian Harden has warned him, and as the growing demands of the German people are urging, he must take up the cross and carry it before the whole world in the spirit as well as the attitude of repentance.

Peace Talk and Food Danger

THE inevitable result of the peace talk, unless our people are warned, will be a relaxation in food production and conservation under the false belief that impending peace will put an end to our national food obligations.

Should peace come tomorrow, the food obligations of America will be immensely increased rather than lessened. The withdrawal of Bulgaria from hostilities means 4,000,000 more people clamoring to us for food, and we should always be willing to exchange food for the right kind of peace. Besides Bulgaria, there are in Poland, the Balkans, parts of Russia and certain other portions of Europe a total of 180,000,000 people threatened with starvation. At present we are unable to send them supplies; but with the coming of peace this huge population will be added immediately to America's food guardianship. These stricken people, plus the Allies, represent about 300,000,000 human souls—nearly three times as many as our total population.

The recovered territory on the Western Front, while heartening from a military standpoint, is even now making the food program subject to constant revision and brings added responsibilities. Those people must be supplied with food immediately.

The coming of peace will not add one pound of food to our supply. There will be greater demands for food over a considerable period after the war than now.

The President's Note

SPEAKING not for this nation alone, but for all of the Allied Powers who are fighting alongside of us in the great war, President Wilson has sent to Germany's note a reply that is so clear, so thoroughly logical and so conclusive, that it admits of no misinterpretation. He practically tells the German people that they must democratize their government in order to secure peace terms, and that, if the United States must deal with the monarchical autocrats in regard to the future status of the German Empire, we must demand, in behalf of all the Allies, "not peace negotiations but surrender" on the part of Germany. He concisely reviews the position Germany now occupies in the negotiations: she has expressed a readiness to accept without reserve the terms of peace set forth in his published addresses; she has promised to follow the humane rules of civilized warfare, and by every rule of honor among nations she is obliged to these acceptances, but he directs attention to the fact that there is as yet no government in Germany responsible to the German people, and the present war and the plans for its conclusion have not yet been brought under the control of the German people. The Kaiser still remains the sole military head of the nation; he and his autocratic following are still the masters of Germany. Until they cease to be so, and until the change is made evident to America and her allies, we must demand, not peace negotiations, but surrender. There can be no negotiations unless the determinative power in Germany is absolutely changed.

This is the right setting for the note and one which must meet general approval in all the Allied countries. If the Kaiser and his followers cling to their crumbling authority, they must fight to the bitter end. Such a decision on their part would doubtless involve Germany in a chaos of revolution.

Our brave troops and those of our Allies are giving their lives for freedom and democracy. Their victorious progress will go on until the power of Germany is finally beaten down and Kaiserism compelled to yield. This is the logical result of Germany's attitude, unless she accept the inevitable now.

The Success of the Loan

THE clock-like precision with which the people of the United States put over the $6,000,000,000 Fourth Liberty Loan is finely emblematic of their spirit in all matters pertaining to the great war and the purposes after. It is the spirit of determined, methodical winning of purposes worth while.

The largest loan in all history has been accomplished without even a ripple on the financial surface and without serious sacrifice on the part of any one. The next loan, when it comes, will be met with the same zeal, energy and organization.

Although in the midst of the Loan drive peace seemed to be in sight, this fact was no great deterrent to subscriptions. Indeed, these billions and the more billions to come will be needed in peace no less than in war. Whether used in the continuance of war or in the establishment of peace, American billions upon billions will help to maintain American supremacy and American ideals of freedom and democracy for all the world. Never before has the power of money been so well understood. Never before has there been so much money at a nation's service. Never before has there been such unselfish and righteous use of money for the political liberation of mankind.

If Your Paper Comes Late

A STRIKE among the pressmen of New York has delayed the mailing not only of this issue of the Christian Herald, but also a portion of the previous issue. This will explain the reason for the non-receipt of the Christian Herald at the usual time. All the publications printed in New York are similarly affected. As this is being written, there is a prospect that the trouble may soon be amicably adjusted.

When the Christian Herald does not arrive promptly, please wait at least a week before complaining. These are troublous times, and although we do our utmost to mail the Christian Herald promptly, delays similar to this—which are due to causes wholly beyond our control—are liable to occur. We therefore ask the indulgence of our readers during this trying situation.

The United War Work Campaign

ON November 11, the nation will begin the greatest campaign for funds for Christian work ever launched in any country. Seven organizations each doing a needed work for our boys, none overlapping any of the others, will ask us for $170,500,000, to be used, every penny of it, in keeping our boys free from sin and in giving them recreation and opportunity for healthful, happy and safe use of their spare time. Originally planning to serve their needs before the nation individually, the seven organizations were brought together into this United War Work Campaign by the express request of the President, who uninfluenced by any special interest surveying the whole field of the nation's life, saw clearly that seven campaigns between two Liberty Loan campaigns would exhaust the nation physically and muddle it financially. The United Campaign presents the best case for immediate and adequate giving ever laid before the American people. It would naturally be expected that with Protestant, Catholic and Jewish organizations all ministering to the soldiers at home and abroad there would be some duplication, but there is practically none. Every Y. M. C. A. hut is open to the Catholic priest to celebrate mass or to the Jewish priest for his service and every K. C. and Jewish hut is open to the other two organizations for their special service. Companies of entertainers, moving picture films and all the paraphernalia of service to the men on the front are used in common by the three organizations. There is no conflict, no overlapping, only mutual and growing respect and cooperation. The work of the Salvation Army, of the War Camp Community Fund, of the Y. W. C. A. and of the American Library Association supplements the Y. M. C. A. activities.

With all of these organizations, which in 1918 might have found no common ground for united effort, all now in 1918, pulling together harmoniously and enthusiastically for the one great cause, there is still an undercurrent of criticism based on misunderstanding and falsehood, which if uncontrolled may compromise the whole undertaking.

To what extent enemy agents may be responsible for rumors we cannot say. But there have been rumors that one organization had forced the united campaign. This is entirely untrue. There are also rumors that Protestant money will be used for other than Protestant purposes, and that one organization has so organized its share in the campaign that it will secure its complete fund whether the others contribute or not. This also is untrue. The constitution of the United Campaign is so drawn that, should the amount realized be less than the total sought, each organization participating will receive only its pro-rata share and no more. Gifts may be designated to go in whole or in part to any one or more of the seven organizations. The sum of designated gifts will be a part of each organization's quota, but will not increase it. The campaign is so organized that all stand together and all must win together.

We urge every member of the Christian Herald Family to give to this United War Work Fund every ounce of strength and every dollar which sacrifice and love for our boys and the cause can make available. It is God's work; it is the Nation's cause; it is insurance for victory, and it is for those who stand for the sons of our hearts, true-hearted, brave and fine, kept thus by the Y. M. C. A. and the organizations associated in this campaign.

What the Bluebird Said

WILLIAM HILLMAN, who graduated in the 1917 class of Columbia University as editor of the Spectator and is now an officer in the United States Army in France, wrote the following letter to his little brother, six years old: "Dear Henry: In France there are many bluebirds. I have seen them flying over the fields, and many are seen quite tame near the streams. I caught one the other day, a lame little bluebird that had been injured in some way. It could not fly very far. I picked it up and comforted it, and, Henry, would you believe, this is the story he told me: 'My name is Nestor, and I am king of the bluebirds. I was born in the fields not very far from here just before the crimson sun set to rest in the west. My mother, who was very dear to me, told me some time after that just as I was born she could hear the voices of angry men in the distance going to war. He told me how I wept when I learnt that they were killing each other and now I vowed that I, bird of happiness, would bring peace and ease to them. I was young then, but the dream has allowed me since to heal the wounds of the stricken people. When I came of age my first decree was this: that the birds of my race would have forever one mission, that of bringing happiness to man. And so, for these last few awful years, I have traveled from field to field and hut to hut and hill to hill, singing soft songs to tired men and women, whispering beautiful things to them, plucking the rainbow for gifts for their children, stealing the gold from the sun for their daughters. I have kissed their eyelids at night, lulling their sleep with the sweet dew of the poppies. I have shed fragrant scents on them, and all the while they slept on fighting. But I have not lost heart. I have hurt myself this morning, and now am resting. As soon as I am stronger I will go on still singing, still screaming, still hoping and helping.' I put the little bird down and in a few minutes it flew away. I do not know where it went. I thought I heard it singing this morning. Perhaps you may see it and hear its song. Look for it, Henry, and let me know if you do. I'll be by, with love. Your brother, BILL." In the midst of the pains and sorrows of our time and of the world, the Holy Spirit, heavenly dove, speaks the words and extends the ministry of comfort, in answer to this prayer: "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever." (John 14:16.)

Cleaning London Slums

SOME five years ago a committee was appointed by the county council of London on the "housing of the working classes." It recommended that the sum of $17,500,000 be expended in cleaning slum areas in the city, the sum to be spread over a period of seven years in equal instalments of 2,500,000 each. A recent report of the committee indicates that about 10,000,000 had already been expended, with the result of cleaning fifty-five acres of slums and providing new and sanitary dwellings for more than 160,000 persons. The committee further recommends that the first step in the present scheme be the building of houses on sites ripe for development and on sites adjoining unsanitary or overcrowded areas, renting them to the families at a figure they can afford, and tearing down or repairing the unsanitary and dilapidated houses vacated. The estates not in the council's possession are capable of accommodating 17,000 persons. This slum-cleaning is largely in the East End, where the poor people live. London has three distinct parts: the Center, where the sanitary construction of tenement houses and cheaper housing of families, in the interest of God's poor, who are unable to provide homes for themselves. And all under the teaching and inspiration of Him who said: "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air recently to a home on East Seventy-eighth Street, New York, where she was taken ashore by some sailors. Children must have playthings. God put the play element in the young of the lower animals and of the human family. Grown people who can play now and then as well as work live longer, are happier, and make others happier. We do not know how far back to go in the thousands of years of Chinese history to find the first doll. The doll is the symbol of motherhood, an instinct so deep and divine that it manifests itself in the little girl who counts a baby the sweetest thing in the world and calls her dollie her baby to love and care for. This instinct is universal and is seen in the life-size doll of the rich on Fifth Avenue, that has eyes that open and shut, as well as in the empty bottle of the poor little girl of the East Side, which she dresses up with the neck for the head and the rest for the body. We have found no record of dolls among the Jews, but we have an account of the playful instinct in children. We venture to say that the little Jewish girls had either toy dolls or a piece of wood or stone that they called their "baby" as they played in the streets, for the prophetic pictures of their joys to come says: "And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." (Zech. 8:5.)

River Under Lake Michigan

JUST off the bluff on which is situated Juneau Park, Milwaukee, there has been discovered a great river flowing at the bottom of Lake Michigan, pushing its course swiftly as the Gulf Stream travels through the ocean. The world was astounded a half-century ago, when the enterprising Chicagoans went several miles out into Lake Michigan, sank a crib, and drew water for the city supply from the pure water at the bottom of the lake. The people of Milwaukee are talking of going out into the lake and tapping the river of pure water flowing along the bottom and never reaching the surface. Human life is a lake through which flows a river of purest water which gives life and health. It has its source in the city of God, and its course by Sinai and Calvary, where the drops of blood from the cross, containing the life of the Son of God, color it and make it efficacious. The Psalmist refers to this divine stream: "There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God." (Ps. 46:4.)

Dried Sweet Potatoes

SWEET potatoes, reduced by a process of drying from a weight of fifty-six pounds to eleven pounds with a trifling loss of food values, are to be shipped to our soldiers in France in large quantities. This sweet potato product will keep under the same conditions as brown sugar, which it resembles, it is asserted. It may be served like a cereal with milk or cream, as a hot beverage like cocoa, or it may be used for making custard pies or puddings, or preserves, the product providing much of the sweetening necessary. To the masses of our people the saving of fats and sweets for the Allies and our soldiers was a surprise. They thought fat was the least desirable portion of meat, and that sugar was a luxury. The doctors knew, however, how much physical power the fats and sweets produced. There is this ancient estimate put upon them: "Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet." (Neh. 8:10.)

Victory Siren Unveiled

IMPRESSIVE ceremonies commemorated the recent installation of the first "Victory Siren" in the nation on the roof of the Evans Building, in Washington, D. C. The Victory or Angelus Siren sounds each day the signal for noon-day prayer for victory for our nation and our allies, and for a peace everlasting. Little Miss Irene Elliott Moore unveiled the electric siren, which thus sounds its call to prayer. In the tremendous mechanical preparations necessary to organize, clothe, feed, arm and transport an army to secure the victory there is the temptation to overlook the divine guidance and help, without which no success can come to our cause. It was said that drilled men would win the war, and that food would win the war, and that the Liberty Bonds would win the war. It is true that men, food and money will win the war, but it must not be forgotten that God, who founded our nation and saved it, who is our real King, is guiding our leaders and inspiring our soldiers and sailors and bringing to us the glorious victory. Let the siren at noon each day sound loud enough to call a whole nation to its knees in thanksgiving for what God has done, and in prayer for complete victory and peace everlasting. Let it call to each preacher in his pulpit on Sunday, to tell the people that it is God behind all and over all to whom we have to look for victory, and ask them to pray that one of the victories may be the destruction of materialism and mammonism that brought on the war, and the universal establishment of Christ's Kingdom of truth, righteousness and love. The prophet thus sees God giving success to his people in battle: "So shall the Lord of hosts come down to fight for Mount Zion." (Isa. 31:4.)

money is made, and adjacent to it the West End, where the wealthy and fashionable people reside, and the East End, where the working people toil, and where so many are submerged in poverty and misery. For twenty or thirty years successful work has been done in bettering the condition of the East End, and the action of the county committee in its tenement house reform has been remarkable and commendable. The large cities of America by legislation and municipal action have instituted great reforms in the have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." (Luke 9:58.)

Oldest Doll in the World

FRENCH sailors are responsible for bringing what is claimed to be the oldest doll in the world to America. This ancient doll is the mascot of a French battleship that is now at an Atlantic port, and it is asserted that she was the plaything of a little girl in China several centuries ago. The little old lady made her first social visit

TRUE GREATNESS

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Luke 9:48. "Whosoever shall receive this child in my name, receiveth me; for he that is least among you all, the same shall be great."

IT IS necessary to go back a few spaces if we are to approach these words in a true spirit of interpretation. And perhaps we had better begin here. "Then there arose a reasoning among them, which of them should be greatest." It is amazing what things we can talk about in the presence of the awful and the appalling. I have heard men indulge in loose frivolity amid the most glorious scenes in the upper Alps! It is surprising what strange fields the conversation can take even when we are returning from a new-made grave.

It seems as though the terrible in life soon loses its impressiveness, and we are away in the heedless shallows again. Here is the Master, who has just been uttering one of the darkest words which ever fell from his lips. Whilst the disciples were "wondering every one at all the things which Jesus did," he quietly said to them, "Let this saying sink down into your hearts; the Son of Man shall be delivered into the hands of men." And whilst the echo of the word is lingering in the air, and when we should have thought they would be almost paralyzed with fear, "there arose a reasoning among them which of them should be greatest." I say it is a case of flippancy by an open grave.

AND Jesus, perceiving the reasoning of their hearts." Here we have an impressive example of the sensitive correspondence of Jesus. He is not dependent upon what we say, or upon what we do, for a knowledge of our lives. He can read the innermost movements of the secret thoughts. And, whilst this ought to be very sobering, it ought also to be exceedingly inspiring. It is a most helpful thing to know that the Lord has an early perception of what is going on in the secret places. He does not come in too late! Things have not "gone too far." He discerns a thought before it generates a deed. He knows when the most inward thing begins to go wrong. An expert motorist told me the other day that he can "feel" when anything in his machine begins to go wrong; it is even so in our relationship to Christ. He can feel when a motive is out of order, or when a wish has become perverse, or when our thinking is moving along perilous ways. "He perceived the reasoning of the heart." And so he instinctively recognized the central thought and ambition in the hearts of his disciples. That ambition was crooked and perverse, and he began, as he always began, to straighten and correct it.

When the Lord begins to minister to the life, his first work is to put wrong thinking right. Nothing final can be accomplished if the fundamental thinking is vicious or untrue. Now the disciples have got a wrong conception of greatness, and their conception has been perpetuated as a popular error to our own day. They imagined that greatness consisted in a certain position, when in reality it consists in a certain disposition. They conceive that greatness means nearness to the throne, while in reality it means likeness to the King. They reason that greatness means the possession of authority, while in reality it means the readiness of service.

*Dr. Jowett's sermons appear on the first Wednesday of each month in the Christian Herald.

Their conception was all external, and had to do with the outer living, and not with the inner life.

AND now the Lord will correct this. He will tell them that greatness is found not in ostentatious prominence, but in a certain deep and secret relationship. The primary question which can be put to any life is this: To what are you related in the spirit? Not, whose blood is in your veins? but: whose life is in your soul? What is your lineage in the region of the heart? It was along these ways that Christ was continually leading when he talked to his disciples. He would never allow his hearers to remain in a merely superficial relationship. He abode in the depths, and into the depths he desired to lead all men. He would never allow undue emphasis to be placed even upon his own home relationships. "Behold, thy mother and thy brethren are without, desiring to speak with thee." The Lord immediately led the hearer into the deeper things by quietly saying, "He that doeth the will of my Father, the same is my mother and brother." And so it is here in the words before us. He tells them that greatness consists in no outer relationship, but in a spiritual kinship.

Now let us see what steps he will take. First of all, he took a child, and sat him by him. And now mark the extreme points of his speech. "Whosoever shall receive this child . . . receiveth him that sent me." On the one hand there is a little child; on the other there is the eternal God! And now I am getting my eyes upon greatness as Jesus conceived it. The height of all greatness is to receive God. The greatest man is the man most God-filled and God-possessed. What a sublime conception! It is independent of place, applause, money, or worldly fame. We become really great just in proportion as we become filled with God. The statement knows no exception. We have the proof of it in common life.

It is true in my own calling. The greatness of the minister is in proportion to his God-possession. A man may be endowed with a rich collegiate equipment, and yet he may stand before an audience perfectly impotent; while some illiterate local preacher, who knows nothing about ancient languages, and can scarcely speak his own, stands before a congregation, and the wind of the Spirit breathes through him, and everybody recognizes that they are in the presence of a great man. It is even so in civil council, and in the national senate. The God-filled man has his own enduring place, and every other form of greatness is vain and empty.

It is here that we find the secret of the immense power which belongs to the Society of Friends. Numerically they are only a small company, and yet in influence they pervade the whole land. There is no noise about their goodness; they do not cry, nor lift their voices in the streets; they are just filled with God, and their greatness receives the thankful recognition of the world.

NOW, then, are we to receive God? Well, we must first of all prepare the way of the Lord. I remember that, when the king of Norway visited England, I was crossing the city of London when his procession was expected to pass on the way to the Guildhall. Oxford Street had been prepared for the royal visit, and all the traffic had been turned into the back streets. But this is not the way in which we are to prepare "the way of the Lord." He loves to come through the ordinary traffic. He mixes up with men's ordinary trades. He does not ask that our ordinary duties should be put in the back streets, but just asks that he may be allowed to visit us when we are engaged in humble duty and quietly earning our daily bread. And what would he like us to be doing when he comes? Here comes in the significance of the child. "Whosoever receiveth this child receiveth me!" He does not desire we should be intent upon the great things, but devotedly concerned with the everyday small things.

Anybody can receive a child, and anybody therefore, can receive the Lord. It does not take the learned man to be gracious to a little one and therefore it does not require that we be learned before we entertain the King. Silas Marner opened his door to a little foundling and God slipped in! And that is most literally true. No man can lay a kindly hand upon a little child without at the same time lifting up the latch and letting in the Lord Jesus. We begin at the very humble end, but the lowly road has glorious issues.

But I think it means more than this. I think that this little child is just a symbol of all lowly ministries. The disciples were looking for greatness in sovereignties and kings' houses. "No," said Jesus, "greatness is just God-possession, and you become filled with God while you are faithful in lowly service. God enters in by the humble door." It does not matter who it is to whom the services are rendered, whether to master or child, or the humblest beast; again I say, while we are serving, the Lord slips in. "Whosoever shall give a cup of cold water, he shall not lose his reward."

How humble the ministry, and yet how glorious the effect! The cup of cold water is a symbol of kindness, of cheery words, of grateful recognition, of hearty handshakes, a word of eulogy, a "thank-you!" All these are cups of cold water, and while we are giving them we receive the King himself. "Inasmuch as ye do it unto one of the lowest of these my brethren, ye do it unto me."

REVELATION

MOONLIGHT, pale, fragile and pure as a moonstone,
Spread like a luminous blessing on waters of silver;
Night like a temple of dusk closing about me,
God and I alone in the silence. . . .

Twilight and stillness—moonlight, and waters of silver,
And you, perhaps, fallen after the carnage of crimson,
Staring eyes turned to the moon in her background of sapphire,
Beautiful body outstretched where the poppies are nodding,
Roar of the battle receding, blood clotting thick on your bosom.
I in my temple of dusk, stillness and starlight around me,
Stand face to face for a moment with the God of love and of battle!
Soldier of mine—He knows. From the backward rim of creation Mankind has died for mankind to maintain the life of the spirit.
Did He not give Himself that we might know the meaning of freedom?

Like Him are you in the fulness of a great sacrificial devotion.

Peace—all is well mid the poppies!
You, too, have given your utmost.

Fearless Before the Threatening Host

SUNDAY, November 10. Ps. 27:3. "Though a host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear." It is a marvelous triumph of grace when we can stand before an advancing army of adverse circumstances and not be afraid. We have passed far into the secret place when the massed antagonists do not trouble us any more than a single bee. The fact of the matter is, we are very prone to be unfounded by magnitude. Mere mass hypnotizes us. We become the victim of its mesmeric fascination. We are distracted. We lose our balance. We see things out of their perspective, and in these matters disproportion is death. We ought to be able to keep a quiet eye when adverse armies bear down upon us. To see them in the larger relationships in which they shrink to a very slender line, to meet them confidently and unperturbed, is a very clear token that we are moving toward them with the magnificent accompaniment of grace. To fear nothing but God is the supreme triumph.

I am very fond of that strong, vigorous, invigorating sentence of John Milton which I long ago marked in his "Areopagitica." "God intended to prove me, whether I durst take up alone a rightful cause against a world of disesteem, and found I durst." I like Milton's interpretation of his antagonisms. He heard the divine challenge in their approach. "Durst thou, or wilt thou retreat?" And Milton's soul answered the challenge with all the sensitiveness and reticence with which a true soldier answers the call of the bugle. The first of all retired into the inner room of his own being, and he summoned all his moral and spiritual resources, and he went forth with fearless heart to meet his foes. "He found I durst!" And Milton's day is the great secret in all radiant triumphs. We must discern the divine Presence on the field of conflict. We must hear the divine challenge in our circumstances. We must see the divine test of our moral and spiritual worth. "Durst thou?" To accept our conditions in this spirit is to face our antagonistic circumstances with a feeling of tonic instead of panic. We are nerved rather than enervated by the menace.

So doth the Lord prove us in the dark and cloudy day. And so is our vigor unveiled in the tempests. We are made manifest by the very enemy who came to destroy us. "The things which happened unto me have turned out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel." The menace leads us more deeply into the treasures of grace. J. H. J.

The Divineness of Duty

MONDAY, November 11. John 4:34. "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me." Duty is a great word in these days. The whole world has been changed for uncounted millions of people within the last four years. Life has been reorganized around a new center. A new voice is speaking to multitudes. A new seriousness has come into men's hearts and shines in their eyes. What is this thing we call duty? What is its authority and what is its sanction? Why should we be inconvenienced by it? Why should a mother give up her son, a wife her husband, a girl her lover—give him up to possible wounds and death, to certain hardship and privation—at the mere bidding of duty? Ah, there we touch the very nerve of life. This is the strongest of all motives. Stronger than the desire for ease or wealth, stronger than love, stronger than the desire for life itself. Does Jesus shed any light on this phase of experience? Nothing but light comes to us from Jesus. He saw duty clearly and his attitude toward it is one of the great secrets of the magic and power of his name: "It becometh me to fulfil all righteousness." "I must be about my Father's business." "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me." All is summed up when we say Jesus recognized in duty the very voice of God. To follow it is to approach God. To obey it is to know God, and Jesus says this is life—to know God. If we take this view of life, nothing is incomplete which accomplishes the will of God, and nothing is complete which fails to accomplish it. C. C. A.

Christian Unity

TUESDAY, November 12. Eph. 4:2. "With all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forgiving one another in love." This is the method which the apostle enjoins upon those who would keep unity in the church. The unity which binds believers into one spiritual body is not effected by human ingenuity, it is a result of the operation of the Spirit of grace in the hearts of individual believers. The Christians are to keep this unity, where it has been once achieved. This requires the utmost patience, gentleness, and restraint. Hearts that have become well tempered by the genial warmth of the Savior's love, hearts which have learnt by many a sad experience in their own conversation how difficult it is for natural man to accept and to retain the divine teaching, and how easy it is even for Christians of long standing to run into error, hearts that can take also a stern reprimand without rancor, and that strive more to win than to defeat a brother—such hearts the apostle requires for maintaining the unity of Christ's flock. For the unity which is desired in the church is a willing, not a compulsory, unity. It is not a unity like that in a prison, where all the inmates keep peace, because they cannot do otherwise, while they would much rather be fighting with one another or unite in throwing off the control of their keepers. It is not a unity like that of ignorant pupils in a school, who obey their master because he keeps them from knowing the truth. It is, in short, not a unity attained by the application of force which reduces men to bondage. It is possible by the employment of this means to attain a union of persons that will have at least the appearance of unity. But at what a tremendous price has such a unity been purchased! It has been paid for with the individual Christian's liberty of conscience, and at the forfeiture of the real life of love and mutual service with which the body of Christ, which is the church, ought to throb. The Sealed Covenant

WEDNESDAY, November 13. Heb. 6:18. "That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation." The Almighty made a covenant with Abraham and sealed it with his oath, saying, "Blessing, I will bless thee." We believe God's promises without his oath. We know that our hope is in his word like an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, grasping the Rock of Ages.

"Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Judah; I will write my law in their hearts." Jesus sealed this covenant with his blood, saying, "Drink ye all of this; for this is my blood of the new covenant." It was a covenant of peace between God and man. By this covenant the sinner becomes a saint, the alien a citizen, the wanderer a son in the Father's house. Christ's promise is, "Come unto me and I will give you rest; I will be Christ in you, the hope of glory." All we have to do is to come with yielding will and trustful faith. The Infinite does the rest. A Scotchman once said, "It took two to convert me—I did everything I could against my conversion, and God Almighty did the rest."

When Christ came to die and to tell the world of his love, we resisted his pleadings and refused his promises, but those who did receive him had power to become the sons of God. As God led Israel to Canaan, so he is leading us to the rest eternal. Our Lord will not fail to be discouraged. He has never wavered in his devotion, never failed in his promises; he pardons, heals, uplifts the fallen and restores the blurred image of the Creator in the hearts of men. E. W. C.

Pillars and Lily Work

THURSDAY, November 14. 1 Kings 7:22. "And upon the top of the pillars was lily work." The main column of each pillar at the entrance to Solomon's temple symbolized strength, but at the top of each pillar were carved flowers—lilies, symbols of beauty. Says the psalmist, "Strength and beauty are in thy sanctuary." Christian character is a union of the heroic and amiable virtues. If strong souls worship God, it is because they owe their strength to him. "Thy God hath commanded thy strength." If beautiful souls worship God, it is because they have grown beautiful in contemplation of him. An Eastern proverb says, "The barren fig tree looks upon the fruitful fig tree and becomes fruitful." Strength and beauty are both the gifts of God. They who think Christianity is entirely passive, noncombative, devoid of vigor, have not seen the leonine Christ: they forget "the noble army of martyrs." They who think Christianity is all action, all challenge, all strife and struggle, forget the ladder of Peter, by which he represents the ascent to heaven. Here are faith, courage and knowledge, heroic virtues; but superimposed upon these are self-control, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and charity, amiable virtues. There is lily work at the top.

Needless to argue, Christianity does develop strength in its disciples. Perpetua in prison, rejoicing as she speaks of the dungeon as her home, and Laurentius at his martyrdom, smiling and saying, "Turn me now, I am quite done on one side," are good illustrations of the strength God gives his servants. Such are the pillars of the church. Equally needless to argue that Christianity develops beautiful traits of character. Francis of Assisi calling the birds and beasts his little brothers, Dr. Barnardo with his passion for helping children of the street, and Elizabeth Fry visiting the prisoners at Newgate are some of the fruits of faith which fosters pity for pain and sympathy for weakness. These, and all like them, are the lily work at the top of the pillars. C. C. A.

The Basis of Unity

FRIDAY, November 15. Eph. 4:5, 6. "One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." The God-made unity of the Church is reared upon the basis of Scriptural teaching, upon the basis of those doctrines which it has pleased the goodness of God to reveal to us in his holy Book. As the Scriptures speak of one God, the Father of all who are called children on earth, as it concludes them all under sin and points them all to one Redeemer, so it binds them all to the same means of grace, and gathers them all for the same heaven. This unity is a blessed fact even amidst the sad divisions that have been inflicted upon the church. Where the truths here mentioned are professed, there is real unity of hearts.

However, this text also implies that the divisions which have torn the church asunder are no small matter. We often hear the differences in teaching between various churches minimized, as matters of small or no importance. If they really are that, it would only increase the shame of the members of the church for keeping up these distressing divisions for paltry reasons. But on close inspection it will be seen that the divisions touch the fundamentals of the saving faith. Accordingly, the unity which is desired for the church cannot be regained whenever it has become lost, except by going back to the very rudiments of the saving doctrine, by teaching again the simple Bible truth, by repeating the old arguments of prophets and apostles, and by gently persuading men with the word of grace, as was done in the days when the Church was first built. The Word on which the Church is to unite is the very means for uniting it. It is both the basis and the instrument of its unity. Through the Word the Holy Spirit operates on the hearts of men, causing them to see the truth, to embrace it, and to profess its teaching with a genuine conviction of their hearts. A union thus effected will actually unite the believers in doctrine and spirit; they will think, speak and do the same things. W. H. T. D.

"None Good But One"

SATURDAY, November 16. Matt. 19:17. "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but One, that is, God." Jesus never denied his deity when questioned or assailed, but, in order to elevate the mind of the rich young ruler from merely human goodness to that of the divine Father, he said, "There is none good in this highest sense but God," knowing that he himself was God, as he often affirmed, when he said, "I and my Father are one"; "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father"; "I that speak unto thee am he." When the high priest at the trial of Christ said, "Tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God," Jesus saith unto him, "Thou hast said; nevertheless, I say unto you, hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven." Was not Jesus crucified under the charge of blasphemy because he claimed to be the divine Son of the Father?

It is said that our Lord contradicted himself when he said, "There is none good but God." But he was simply directing the mind of the speaker away from himself, whom the young man considered only a good teacher, an ordinary human, up to the heavenly Father. Christ did not wish to be called good in the human sense, as unbelievers today compliment him, as being among the best of humans, the climax of manhood, the finest and noblest example of holiness among men. Jesus never denied what John said of him, "The Word was with God, and the Word was God, made flesh to be God with us." The Father testified to the deity of Jesus when he said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

"Good Master" was the way the Jews had of addressing religious teachers; our Lord refused to occupy the position of a finite teacher. He must be recognized as the divine Savior, the God over all and blessed forevermore. E. W. C.

A Story Having for Its Theme the Reconstruction Period After the Great War

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTER ONE

THE town of Bradford was decked with flags and bunting in honor of the homecoming of Ambulance Company 241, in which Richard Ward had served at the steering-wheel of the ambulance, losing his right hand at Château-Thierry. After the celebration Richard and his father, Rev. Dr. Ward, sat in the latter's study and talked about Dick's future, a problem which was complicated by the loss of his hand and his engagement to Requa Randall.

CHAPTER TWO

DICK WARD and Requa Randall had been engaged when Ambulance Company 241 went away. And all during the trying days of their separation they had kept up their correspondence, and Dick was able to look straight ahead and thank the good God that he had been faithful to a pure love which the homecoming had intensified for each of them. Requa was proud of her hero, and Dick had reason to be proud of her absolute affection, for Requa was an only daughter and her father was jealous even of Dick.

"You couldn't have him, or rather he couldn't have you, only on condition that he doesn't take you away," Rufus Randall had said to her one evening after Dick had gone.

"No danger," Requa had said, as she kissed her father good-night.

"What is Dick going to do?" he had asked.

"I don't know. He says he hasn't any plans. Only to get married," Requa said, looking down.

"But he can't get married without some kind of a business," Requa's father had said. And Requa's father was the most practical business man in Bradford.

"I know," Requa had said, somewhat faintly, for she was afraid of her father when he spoke with his business voice.

So when Dick came in this morning, Requa asked, after they had exchanged lover's pledges:

"Dick, dear, what are you going to do, now you are through going to war?"

"I am going to marry you and settle down," answered Dick promptly.

"Yes, I know," said Requa, blushing; "but what are you going to do in the way of a business or profession?" Requa had a little of her father's practical make-up.

"I wish some one would tell me," said Dick gravely. "I'm all at sea about it. I don't want to start in with college, and I don't care for a lot of things the other fellows are going into, and here's this"—he held up his right arm, while Requa looked at it, tears in her eyes.

SUDDENLY Dick laughed.

"Do you know what Dad asked me this morning? Asked me if I had ever thought of being a foreign missionary!"

But to his surprise Requa did not join in the laugh.

"You would make a good one."

"I would?"

"Yes. You like people of all sorts. You are not afraid of any kind of circumstances, you learn languages easily, you can adapt yourself to any sort of a climate, you have perfect health, you are very persuasive."

"Go on," said Dick, as Requa paused. "I never knew all my good qualities until you discovered them."

"There's a lot more I don't think of right now, but you have nearly all the qualifications."

"Would you go with me, Requa, to India, or Turkey, or Africa?" Dick asked carelessly.

"You know I would go anywhere. But father would never consent."

"That settles it, then. Come, dear, help me to figure out my future. What do you think I ought to take up? Dentistry, or a candy shop? The candy business strikes me. After all the shortage of sugar the folks at home have been bearing, they're just crazy for sweets. We could make our fortune in the candy business."

The lovers talked the matter over seriously and half seriously, but when they said good-by that forenoon, Dick went home as much at sea as ever concerning his future.

WHEN Sunday morning came every able-bodied person in Bradford prepared to go to church. There were several reasons for this. One was the

the boys who had been to the war, deprived of all church privileges, torn out of their three great common heritages, church, home and school, now on their return finding themselves hungry for the religious services some of them had not appreciated when they had them, eager to enjoy a genuine, real, heart-satisfying church service again.

AND Dr. Ward's subject gripped them. He had found at last, he said, the one great all-compelling work needed for the new world's welfare, this new world which the great war had created, much of which those who had been fighting for it could not yet understand, because it was so strange and could not possibly know. All he did know was that a brooding silence was over all the room, that many a head was bowed, that lips were moving in prayer, that tears were on many faces that when the service closed after the benediction even, the people did not stir to rise until he himself had come down out of the pulpit, an event this never before had been known.

SUNDAY was always a very busy day for Dr. Ward, as he had preaching appointment in the afternoon at the hospital, and in the evening he was directing the Union Council meeting, composed mostly of the young people of Bradford. He was at this service until nine o'clock, and, going home, went, according to his regular habit, into his little study, jot down in his service book the important items of the day. He was still at work on this which was his last before he relaxed from the Sunday duties, when Dick appeared in the doorway. His father noted his hesitation, closed his service book, and said,

"Come in, Dick! I'm all through."

Dick came in and sat down, a look on his face that his father had never seen. Both father and son had the same habit of coming directly to the subject. Dick said, without any preliminaries, "Dad, your sermon this morning decided me. I've made up my mind to accept that commission to go into 'all the world.' I don't feel fit, but I'm ready to be made so, and want you to pray for me, now, will you, Dad?"

Dr. Ward did not know what to say. For almost the first time in his life he confronted a situation so entirely unexpected that he was not prepared for it. Dick sat there totally ignorant of what was in his father's mind. It was the first time in his life that he had ever asked his "Dad" to pray for him, and the experience he was having must have been something tremendous to force from him such a request. He waited in the moment of hesitation that brooded over his father, looking at him so earnestly and wistfully that Dr. Ward in the sudden tumult of his feeling was near to crying out with a number of questions. But swiftly swept over his heart that here was his lad, the boy nearest his heart, the one he had followed all through his experience with even more interest than that of Albert, his older son, as he had come in and asked for a prayer. His heart smote him as he recalled the fact that he knew very little of the religious life of this boy of his. The had been only brief glimpses now and then in his letters as they had come at very irregular intervals, nothing very definite, and here he was now asking his own father to pray for him, and pray that he might go on a missionary that might take him away somewhere on the other side of the world. It was the last thing he had ever thought of in connection with Dick, but here he was asking for it, and as a direct result, his father's own appeal to the young lad in his own parish.

BUT the next moment he had risen, crossed over the little space between himself and Dick, knelt beside him and begun to pray, with a tenderness and self-forgetfulness that surprised himself. When he had finished and slowly risen to go back to his accustomed seat at his desk, there were tears on Dick's face. He put up his hand to brush them away.

"Thank you, Dad. I needed it. You see, this has come to me suddenly. But I haven't any doubt about it. I know I ought to listen to the voice."

"The 'voice'?"

"Yes, the voice of God which spoke

fact that during the war the five different churches in Bradford had merged into one community organization. Another reason for the general habit of church-going was Dr. Ward's preaching. It was simple, direct, persuasive, comforting, educational and inspiring.

The congregations of the five churches met in the largest building for worship and used the other buildings for various programs of social and community work. Two of the ministers had gradually found their places as community workers, and the other two, who were young men, had taken up special missionary service. Dr. Ward, by virtue of his long residence in Bradford, his influence with the community and his rare gift as a preacher, by common consent had continued as the fittest man of all to bring the Sunday message the people were eager and hungry to hear.

When Dr. Ward rose to preach that morning, he must have felt the intense interest the congregation had in his subject. In front of him sat scores of different from the world they knew when they marched away in Freedom's name. But they would have time now to discover what this new world was and what it needed. And among all its tremendous needs and its new demands for new and in many cases untried ways, there was nothing to compare with the Master's old command, "Go ye into all the world and make disciples of the nations."

If the disciples in every age had only obeyed that command, there would have been no war. If only they had been willing to pay out for this missionary campaign one hundredth part of the money the war had cost, or a tithe as much as they had given to the Red Cross to heal war's wounds, the world by this time had been redeemed. But they must not dwell on that. The one great imperative call today was for volunteers to go into all the world and disciple all the nations, so that another great catastrophe caused by human greed and ambition and hate might never again fall upon the earth.

How well he made his plea Dr. Ward time through you today. You remember I asked me here in this room if I had thought of being a missionary, and I replied I had never given it a thought. But now it all seems very clear. I have heard the voice of God."

Dr. Ward looked at his son with a smiling awe.

"Dick," he said with a sudden turning to know more of his son's life, "surely this is not the first time you have heard that voice. It must have sounded in your heart long before."

"Yes, Dad, We never talked of it much. But we did feel it. An English officer over a company assigned to work with ours was a poet. He wrote of his experiences while in Flanders before he joined us. I learned the verses and they became a part of what I also felt. This is how they ran, as printed in the London Spectator."

Al Dick recited softly as if alone:

"We had forgotten you, O Christ, or very nearly;
You did not seem to touch us very dearly;
For course we thought about you now and then,
Especially in any time of trouble.
We knew that you were good in time of trouble,
But we are very ordinary men.

"And all the while, in street or lane or byway,
You walked among us, and we did not see;
Your feet were bleeding as you walked our pavements.
Why did we miss your footprints on our pavements?
Can there be other folks as blind as we?"

"Now we remember over here in Flanders—
(Isn't strange to think of you in Flanders)—
His hideous warfare seems to make things clear:
We never thought about you much in England.
We have no doubts—we know that you are here.

"You helped us pass the jest along the trenches—
Were in cold blood we waited in the trenches
You touched its ribaldry and made it fine.
You stood beside us in our pain and weakness;
We glad to think you understand our weakness—
Somehow it seems to help us not to whine.

"Think about you kneeling in the garden—
O God! the agony of that dread garden!
We know you prayed for us upon the cross:
Anything could make us glad to bear it
Could be the knowledge that you would to bear it Pain, death—the uttermost of human loss.

"Though we forgot you, you will not forget us—
We feel so sure that you will not forget us—
Not stay with us until this dream is past.
A so we ask for courage, strength and pardon—
Especially, I think, we ask for pardon—
And that you'll stand beside us to the last."

DICK said it all simply, so simply that it sounded more like a personal confession than a recitation; and his father understood.

After a moment of silence Dr. Ward said gently,

"Can you tell me anything more about your experience? I mean, your decision to go into all the world?"

"Only this," said Dick, speaking with a cheerful directness that was entirely free from cant or morbid exaltation over a new and untried emotion. "I feel as if I could do some good work over there in Mesopotamia or Palestine. You know we were ordered into Palestine eight months before the war closed for the hospital and relief work, and some things I saw and learned there—"

He paused in reminiscence of some things he had experienced, things not well to recite, and Dr. Ward understood his reticence. But the little that he had said roused a great interest in Dr. Ward to know more, for this was a new Dick, who had opened the door a little way into his inner life, hitherto concealed, as yet not fully comprehended even by himself.

"Tell me what you saw in Palestine to make you think of that as—"

Dick answered quickly, interrupting, not at all like him, but with an earnest, impressive interest that swept over his face like a wave of intense recollection.

"One day outside the Jaffa gate at Jerusalem a company of refugees came up just as we were going out to our day's work. These people were of all ages, most of them Armenians who had walked all the way from Damascus because they had heard of the American relief at Jerusalem. And as they came straggling up I noticed one of the mothers—she couldn't have been more than eighteen years old—and she was carrying a dirty bundle of what I thought was rags wrapped about some fragments of food. But just as I was passing her she fell down right in front of me. If I had taken one more step my foot would have hit her body.

"We were all used to such sights, but I tell you, Dad, there was something so cruel about it all that I never got used to it. I stooped down and saw the girl had fainted for food. The boys pulled up and I naturally held out a piece of bread. The girl came to, opened her eyes, snatched at the bread and then opened the bundle of dirty rags. Dad, there was a baby there, and the mother pressed the bread up against the child's mouth. I saw, and the fellows saw, in a minute, that it was dead. But that wasn't the worst. There was a spear of dry grass sticking out of one corner of the baby's mouth!

"It made me so sick I had to go out of the circle around that mother and her dead baby and sit down. I've seen some awful things on the battle-field, Dad, that I can never talk about; but this beat all of them. And I wouldn't mention it, only it comes to me now, as it didn't then, that those people over in the country where Christ used to walk and heal the sick and feed the hungry would be a good place for me to work. I believe I could do something over there to help restore the land to the people and give them the Bread of Life they need so much.

"And that isn't all," said Dick after a moment. "I got up from where I had been sitting and came back to where the fellows were. The woman had been surrounded by some of her people and they were all crying out for bread, when what does she do but break away from the crowd around her and make a stagger in my direction. I never felt so done up in my life, Dad. She could hardly drag her feet over the ground, but she came up holding out that dead baby—they had tried to take it away, but she wouldn't let go—and she came right up to me, and dropped it, rags and all, right in front of me and said, 'America! America!'

"Think of that, Dad! I made inquiry, or some one did, and learned this girl had been in a missionary school and had begun to learn English, and then in the massacre her husband, one of the teachers, had been shot, and their house burned and she herself tortured to make her reveal the hiding-place of money. And she died the next day in our hospital, where she was taken that morning. It didn't mean to me then at all what it means now. But I can see her right this minute falling down in the dirt over that bundle of rags falling apart over her baby and crying out, 'America! America!' Why, Dad, I believe I would be a coward or something worse if I didn't volunteer as you said this morning we ought to do and bring America to these poor creatures! It looks like a big enough job for a grown up man!"

AND Dick, to relieve his unusual feeling, got up to walk around, Dr. Ward eyeing him in growing wonder and interest.

But when he finally came back and sat down neither said a word for several moments. Then Dick said, as if he had just thought of it, "I think some of the others were coming around to see you tonight if it isn't too late. You know you used to keep Sunday nights for the Open Door. And we hadn't forgotten. Only I wanted to see you before the others came."

"The others?"

"Yes; there's Bert and Nelson and Connie Clayton and George Ryder and Holmes and Underwood and Blake and one or two more. We have been talking it all over this afternoon, but waited until you would have time to see us tonight. And that must be them now."

WESTERDAY was my birthday, and such a party as I had! We left Nancy on the ten o'clock train. "We" means our doctor and nurse, two French school teachers, and myself, with a thousand little boys and girls. For the war has come close and closer to Nancy, so that the wise prefect and his council decided to send away some of the refugees.

When the storm broke in 1914 the lovely old town was saved as by a miracle but many of the outlying villages were destroyed. Into the Place Stanislas came a flood of women and children, like driftwood washed in by the cruel waves of war. The soldiers had gone, and all these months the refugees have been living in their barracks, until peace let them return. Now, when the enemy trenches are coming into Lorraine, they must go farther away, far enough this time so they will not have to move again.

During our weeks in Nancy we have become good friends with some of these children. We met them coming from school with books under their arms, boys and girls dressed in long coats that covered them up. Most of the boys have suits of French blue, made like a real soldier's, with wax chasseur caps. They hope to be soldiers soon, to fight for France. In front of our hotel they played a wonderful game like hopscotch, jumping from squares to circles. Each space was named—Paris, Nancy, Lorraine, Alsace, and Allemagne—that is, Germany—and woe betide the unlucky youngster who missed and fell into Boche-land!

Does it sound to you like an enormous undertaking to travel with a thousand children? Such an interesting scene as that station was, like a buzzing hive, with soldiers everywhere lending a hand. When the signal was given we filed through the gates all together. There was only one form of "permission" for the children, the cards we helped fill out at the prefecture. I looked around for some whose names I have learned to love—Lucien and Raoul, François, Aimée, Jacques and Yvonne.

That little round-cheeked, scrubbed René—did he go into the Place Leopold to say good-by to René, the duke of Lorraine, the king of Jerusalem and Aragon and Sicily? The lad has played at his feet every day, and often looked up at the royal figure holding aloft the spear, his plumes flying proudly, his fiery steed pulled up at attention. And that dear little Jeanne, on her way to the train—did she stop to stare up at Jeanne d'Are on her horse, where the peasant girl of Lorraine zealously lights anew the spirit of France in the hearts of all who pass? René and Jeanne, and all you others, if the war has sent you away for a time, remember that you too belong to Lorraine and must keep her spirit.

SO we came to the long train that was to carry us on our journey across this fair land of France. There was much excitement—old grandfathers tucking in the kiddies, with last good-bye admonitions; here and there a soldier father, in his winter-stained blue cloak, seeing off his own children along with the others; and mothers whose faces twitched sometimes, but whose hearts must have been lightened, to know that their boys and girls were going to a safer place. For all this time we could hear the never-ending sound of the big guns.

Files of soldiers came, with little canvas bags, each with food for two children. Then hand-trucks with blankets rolled up tightly, which the poilus dealt out. Supervising it all was M. Mirman, the prefect, in a long blue cape that fell nearly to his knees, and a cap whose silver embroidery sparkled in the sun. His daughters were with

Mother: Keep a jar of Musterole handy

Sometimes, in the night, Pain comes to your house. Then is the time, most of all, when you rely on good old Musterole. No fuss, no bother, no worry—no messing about with plasters or waiting for water to heat.

Quickly you go to the Musterole jar. A bit of that clean white ointment on little Bobbie's chest, and lightly you rub it in. A gentle tingle of skin puts Doctor Nature to work, and soon a healing warmth reaches the congested spot. Then comes a soothing coolness, and Bobbie drowses off to sleep.

For coughs, congestions, bronchitis and croup, Musterole is uncommonly effective. It is good, too, to drive away the pains of rheumatism, lumbago and neuralgia.

Musterole relieves — without discomfort.

It is better than a mustard plaster, with all the virtues of the old-time plaster but none of its disadvantages.

Musterole does not blister. And it is easy to apply. Just rub it on. Rub it on—for little Bobbie's cold—for Sister's bronchitis—for Grandma's pains in chest or back. It's an old-fashioned remedy in a new-fashioned form.

Keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole. 30c and 60c jars. $2.50 hospital size.

Jacob Fleeing From His Angry Brother

International Sunday School Lesson for November 17. Gen. 28:10-22

The Inevitableness of God

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE have just studied Jacob's great sin and now we see him the quiet home-lover in flight from the promised land away across the desert. His heart is heavy and his conscience sore and he believes himself to be beyond the love and care of Jehovah. He thinks of his estrangement from God very literally too, for there are abundant evidences in the early narratives of the Bible which show the primitive belief in a God restricted to a certain territory. For example see Naaman begging for two mules' burden of earth from Hebrew land, so that when he returns to Syria he can stand upon it and pray to Jehovah the God of Israel! We marvel that a man could think of God as limited by geography. But we can very well understand the feeling of a great sinner that his sin had driven him beyond the pale of Jehovah's protection. For sin always brings isolation and loneliness of spirit. Especially sins of unbrotherliness, like Jacob's, leave a man at last very much alone.

Then the miserable fugitive fleeing from a brother's wrath, desolate with a conviction that God has forsaken him, experiences that glorious vision of the night at Bethel. What surprise, what awe, and what solemn joy as he realizes that even there in that stony alien land, God reigns and in matchless grace reveals himself to the unworthy wanderer! He learns for the first time that God is everywhere and everywhere merciful! How new such doctrine was then! But how many of us really, really believe it? Or, rather, how many of us have really, vividly felt it, experienced it for ourselves?

God Unescapable

"Whither shall I flee from thy presence!" exclaims the psalmist. He realizes that God is unescapable. The uttermost parts of the earth are just as accessible to him as the land that is called "the Holy Land." Heaven is his and not even hell is beyond his reach and power.

Countless men have learned that this is true for the soul that has tried to leave God out of the reckoning. The selfish accumulator of wealth and pleasure sooner or later hears the dread voice in the night, "Thou fool, thy soul is required of thee." The wicked David, who has taken advantage of Uriah and Bathsheba, hears some Nathan cry, "Thou art the man!" and in utter penitence he realizes that it is against God that he has sinned. The swindler may evade all the judges and jails of earth, but he cannot escape the Judge on high, who will hold him to the uttermost farthing. Though the smallest and least of earth, or as notable as Napoleon Bonaparte, the ungodly man finds at last that he must take God into account!

This is also true of nations. Israel was warned as a nation, "Beware lest thou forget the Lord thy God." The godless nations of history have utterly vanished. In our time another great people has provided cunning machinery of war, trained mighty hosts of warriors, set aside honor and sworn treaties, and set about the most colossal of human schemes for self-aggrandizement. There were many flaws in Germany's gigantic plans, but the greatest of all was this: she left God out of reckoning!

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget!

The Persistence of God's Love

But while we think of God as the Great Avenger, the One Who Will Repay, we forget that he is yet more the Great Companion, yea, rather, the Persistent Lover of our souls, as the mystics called him. He never lets go of his own! He follows us in all our wilful wanderings with the "love that will not let us go." To us worthless, selfish Jacobs he appears in his grace and lets down a ladder whereby we may rise to heavenly places with him. He is the Forgiving Father, whose love had followed the prodigal into the far country and who rushes to meet him when he is yet a great way off. There is a strangely powerful poem called "The Hound of Heaven," written by Francis Thompson, which deserves to be known by all who have felt the tirelessness of God's care, which through all the vicissitudes of life "follows, follows after." Be sure to read it.

Realizing the yearning persistence of God's love Hosea portrays him as the One who had sought and saved Israel from the beginning, and who cannot leave his children to their sins. "How can I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I cast thee off, Israel?" And throughout all the glorious Psalms runs the invincible "loving kindness of Jehovah."

So it was that God came back into Jacob's life, as into uncounted lives that have dwelt upon the beautiful symbolism of this vision at Bethel, symbolism which inspired one of the grandest hymns of all time, "Nearer, my God, to Thee." This vision brought Jacob a sense of forgiveness and of a renewal to him, despite all his faults of the promises made to his fathers.

Our Need of a Vision of God

How sorely most of us need a Bethel vision in our lives, something real, something vivid! One feels a sense of spiritual envy when we read of chosen saints who had such assurance, or listen to some "twice-born" man tell of the crisis in his soul-life. Yet we gain mighty faith by truly apprehending these Scriptural and other testimonies. From the great war they are coming now, the witness of men who found God in the trenches, in No Man's Land, in prison. They are different according to the temperament of each individual, for God reveals himself in many ways. Donald Hankey in the chapter entitled "An Englishman Prays" has given us an experience that deserves to be reprinted in millions. His Englishman had always "said his prayers," and they had helped too. But he had never felt the reality of communion with God. In camp he gradually forgot, yet vaguely missed something, at that. Then, at the front, he did pray that he might not be found wanting. He also asked his uneasy conscience why he should not refuse to take the responsibilities of a sergeant which he had declined. To his surprise he got an answer! A single sentence burned itself on his mind: "Strengthen thy brethren." He was astonished, but bravely took the duty and fathered the young soldiers of his platoon. Then at last he was wounded and left long on the field. He experienced pain, of course, and he kept wondering about the meaning of life of all that he had seen. Finally a great peace came upon him, and he repeated softly, "God, God everywhere," while there came to his soul the message "Underneath are the everlasting arms." Hankey said that he had found a new way to pray, a new faith in the reality of God, and a new kind of courage.

There is something in the fact that men in sorest need have had the richest experiences. "I was brought low and he helped me" is their testimony. Blessing has come out of adversity. We remember Jesus spoke of the blessedness of the persecuted and those who were mourning. Were we wise we would wring a richer tribute from our own misfortunes. We would search through them for God. Or, failing that, we would cease repining and wait for the coming of the Lord. For Jacob found not God, he was found of him who is revealed in Jesus as ever seeking and saving that which was lost.

God's choicest gift is himself, and his greatest promise is the one he made again to Jacob, "I am with thee." I never offers ease and exemptions, but assures us still, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee. Though we forget him, he will not forget us. He comes to us again, just as to Jacob, just when we need him most. He gives a man another chance. O God is merciful.

Sunday School Methods

Help for Armenian and Syrian Orphans

TWO millions from American Sunday schools the coming Christmas for the starving and helpless sufferers in Bible lands!

That is the objective of the Sunday School Section of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee.

For some days in October the representatives of the Sunday school denominational boards, the International and World's Sunday School Associations, have been meeting together in the Metropolitan Tower, New York, to plan this great undertaking.

Can it be done?

One has but to turn to last year's splendid achievement of nearly a million dollars from America's Sunday schools to realize how, even though the preparation for the appeal was hurried and late, the cause itself went to the hearts of America's young people!

Look at this list of contributions from the Sunday schools of the United States and Canada from December 1, 1917, to June 15, 1918, chiefly from offerings at Christmas time or within a few months thereafter:

With 400,000 starving and destitute in the great areas of Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor, Persia, and with whole new regions opened for relief through the advances of General Allenby's and other armies, two millions at the lowest amount that the Sunday schools should be asked to give for the childhood of youth of the Land of the Star.

Clothing, food, work, orphanages—all needed this winter time as never before.

What are the plans for raising the two millions for the Sunday schools?

The secretaries of the denominational Sunday school boards are to circularize the Sunday schools, sending posters, plans and programs.

The International Sunday School Association is to promote a continent-wide visitation of the Sunday schools in a personal appeal each school to co-operate.

A publicity campaign will be instituted the Sunday school, religious and secular put to put the plan before Sunday school workers. A Christmas program and pageant, by Arthur B. Ferris, has been specially written Sunday school and community use the coming Christmas to insure a worthy presentation Armenia's and Syria's needs.

These programs will furnish a full and interesting Christmas program for any Sunday Schools should write to the Sunday School Department, Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee, 1 Madison Avenue, New York. These supplies should not reach them without reasonable time through their denominational Sunday school board.

*This includes an estimate of about 4,000 schools in Canada.

Realizing the Hope of Zion

ZIONISTS all over the world are preparing to celebrate the first anniversary of the signing by right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, British Foreign Secretary, of a document which they regard as their Magna Charta, and the pledge by the Allied Powers that the aspiration for a Jewish national homeland in Palestine will be realized at the end of the war. On November 2, Mr. Balfour, in his official capacity, and on behalf of the British cabinet, made the following declaration:

"His Majesty's Government views with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of the non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country."

This declaration has since been secured in by the French, Italian, Serbian and Montenegrin governments. On August 31, the Zionists were joined by the following from President Wilson:

"I have watched with deep and sincere interest the reconstructive work which the Weizmann Commission has done in Palestine at the instance of the British government, and I welcome an opportunity to express the satisfaction I have felt in the progress of the Zionist Movement in the United States and in the Allied countries since the declaration by Mr. Balfour, on behalf of the British Government, of Great Britain's approval of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and his promise that the British Government would use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of that object, with the understanding that nothing would be done to prejudice the civil and religious rights of non-Jewish people in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by the Jews in other countries."

"I think that all Americans will be deeply moved by the report that even at this time of stress the Weizmann Commission has been able to lay the foundation of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem with the promise that at the dawn of spiritual rebirth."

In preparation for its share of the celebration of this great event in Jewish history, the English Zionist Federation secured expressions of opinion from prominent clergymen of Great Britain, among whom are the following:

The Rev. Alex. Alexander, D. D., moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England:

I think I can speak for by far the larger part of our church membership when I say that I welcomed Mr. Balfour's message with the utmost satisfaction. That very earnest prayers are being offered up by many of our devout people for the fulfilling of Jewish aspirations I know well. The land, and the people to whom the land rightfully belongs, are very dear to us. As a citizen and a lover of free institutions I pray that the Jewish people may soon play a noble part in history as of old.

The Rev. Thomas Phillips, president of the Baptist Union:

Every Christian would like to see the ancient people of God in the Holy Land.

Dr. D. Burford Hooke, chairman, Congregational Union of England and Wales:

I have read the declaration, approved by His Majesty's Government, with keen interest. Not only am I glad to express hearty agreement with it, but still more with the excellent spirit which marks the declaration and thus so greatly enhances its value.

The Rev. Arthur T. Guttery, president, Primitive Methodist Conference:

The liberation of Palestine from the cruelty and shame of Turkish rule and the restoration of Israel—with the sanction and goodwill of the Great Powers—will enrich civilization and restore ideals that have been lost far too long.

The Rev. James Cooper, D. D., moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland:

The Church of Scotland cordially indorses the declaration of the Cabinet in favor alike of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and of the maintenance of the civil and religious rights of non-Jewish communities in a land as dear to Christians as to Jews, rejoices in the prospect of this double honor being given to Great Britain, and prays that it may usher in a day of the richest blessings to the whole Israel of God.

The Bishop of Lincoln:

What lover of Holy Scripture and what friend of freedom can help rejoicing at the prospect of the Hebrew people returning to their own land again? God speed them! They have long been divorced from their land; once more they will become a nation of yeomen farmers, and make the Holy Land fruitful and prosperous and the home of a free and happy people.

the guard was carrying, as prisoners were not allowed to handle their own money.

While Hitchcock was watching his chance to escape, the guard awoke and at once missed the map and money. Snatching his package of food but leaving the map, Hitchcock leaped out of the door and ran directly away from the railroad track. The guard yelled after him, but could not follow on account of the two other prisoners.

As soon as he had placed a safe distance between himself and the railroad Hitchcock began to make his way toward the Swiss frontier, a journey which consumed eight nights, the days being spent in hiding. He knew nothing of the country through which he passed and guided himself by a pocket compass. He avoided the towns, especially as he was in the uniform of a French aviator. His daily rests and nightly walks seem not to have been disturbed by the German watchdog's honest bark, which indicates that the dogs of Germany have probably been doing their bit to stave off the famine with which the Allied blockade has been menacing the Fatherland. On the eighth day he met a girl in the outskirts of a small village and ventured to accost her in French. To his delight she answered in the same tongue and told him he was in Switzerland. He then made his way to Berne, where he arrived on August 30. During his tramp he walked more than a hundred miles.

How Scientists Clean Their Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

The facts stated here have been widely known for some years among dentists and scientific men. But they were not presented to the public until proved beyond dispute.

People who know—by the hundreds of thousands—are changing their teeth-cleaning methods. And these are the reasons:

The old methods proved inadequate. The best-brushed teeth too often discolored and decayed. Despite the wide use of the tooth brush, statistics show that tooth troubles have constantly increased.

Science found the reason in a slimy film. You can feel it with your tongue. It is constantly forming, and it clings. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays.

That film is the cause of most tooth troubles, and the old methods could not end it.

That film-coat absorbs stains, and the teeth seem discolored. It hardens into tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Also of many other serious diseases.

It is therefore best to brush teeth in ways which can end the film.

Four years ago a way was found to combat that film efficiently. It has now been proved by thousands of tests. Today it is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent, and we ask you to test it yourself.

Make This Home Test

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

This is not as simple as it seems. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual method is an acid, harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed barred.

It is now made possible, because science found a harmless, activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method is employed in Pepsodent.

Many teeth-cleaning methods, widely proclaimed, have later been found inefficient. So Pepsodent was submitted to repeated clinical tests, under able authorities, before this announcement.

Today it is proved beyond question. And the object now is to bring it quickly into universal use.

The method is to offer all a special tube for test. Send the coupon for it, with 10 cents. Use it like any tooth paste, and watch results.

Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the film. See how teeth whiten—how they glisten—as the fixed film disappears.

Let Pepsodent thus prove itself. See its unique results, know the reason for them. After that, you will not be content to return to old methods of teeth-cleaning.

Cut out the coupon now.

An Eight-Day Hike for Liberty

A STORY which recalls some of the tales of escapes from prison during the Civil War which thrilled the fathers of our soldiers forty years and more ago is told by Lieutenant Thomas Hitchcock, Jr., of Westbury, Long Island, N. Y., a youthful aviator who was captured by the Germans and escaped to Switzerland and thence to France.

Hitchcock was captured on March 15 after a combat with three German machines in which he was forced to land, after being wounded in the thigh.

"After landing inside the German lines," said Hitchcock, "I fainted twice. The second time I did not come to my senses until I had reached the dressing station. In the hospital I received fair treatment only. There was one doctor for the 150 patients, and the food was not very good."

It took two months for Hitchcock's wound to heal. There was plenty of suffering among the prisoners, but Hitchcock's lot was rendered easier by the arrival of packages of food from France, out of which he saved a little each day for use in an emergency. The emergency came while he was being transported with two other Americans from Lachfeld to Rastadt under charge of one German guard. The three prisoners were watching for a chance to escape and when the train stopped near Ulm the guard fell into a doze. Hitchcock improved this opportunity to snatch a railway map and a package of money belonging to himself which

MARGARET E. SANGSTON

THIRTY-SEVEN years ago Mrs. Lydia Pillars of Bellvue, Kentucky, planted a walnut in a flower-pot. And then she placed the flower-pot in her back yard.

That was thirty-seven years ago. Mrs. Pillars was only fifty then. Now she is eighty-seven, and her hair is white, and her eyes are dim, and her slender hands are wrinkled with age. But the walnut that she planted in a flower-pot has grown strong and vigorous as she has grown old. And now it is a sturdy tree that for years has given its shade in the summertime, and has yielded its harvest of nuts in the autumn, and has stood erectly sleeping—with the promise of spring buried dream-like in its heart—during the winter months. And its work is only just begun!

When Mrs. Pillars planted the walnut, airplanes had not been thought of. People weren't even dreaming, then, of the possibility of a great war like the present one. And yet the little walnut, sending out brave green shoots in the security of the flower-pot, had its part to play in the coming conflict. For, thirty-seven years after it was planted, the government announced the need of black walnut wood for the manufacture of airplane propellers.

Mrs. Pillars is fond of her black walnut tree. What woman wouldn't be fond of a tree that she has watched grow—that she is directly responsible for? And yet Mrs. Pillars is a staunch patriot, and she realizes that her government, to fight and conquer a world's foe, needs airplanes, and many of them! And so she has offered her tree, the tree that she herself planted and transplanted, to her government. And her government has accepted the sacrifice.

ONE day, long ago, a very shabby boy walked unannounced into the office of a certain rich factory-owner. And he said, quite without preface:

"I'm down and out, sir. And nobody will give me work—nobody will give me a chance to make good! If I could get a job of any kind I'd wear my fingers to the bone holding it down! I know"—the very shabby boy's voice grew hard—"I know you can have me thrown out of your office if you want to. Other men that I've asked for jobs have had me thrown out. But—for pity's sake—don't. Give me my chance, instead!"

The rich factory-owner looked thoughtfully at the shabby boy. And perhaps he saw the depths of appeal in the boy's glance, for, though he was very busy that morning, he sent for his secretary and dictated a note to the superintendent of his factory. And then he folded the note into an envelope and gave it to the shabby boy. "Your chance is in this envelope," he said. "And though I'll probably never hear whether you've made good or not—my factory is pretty large—I'm wishing you luck!"

It was a good many years later that a panic swept the country. There were riots in shops and factories, there were shots and curses and state militia called out. And the certain rich factory owner went back and forth from his office with a worried frown on his face. And his secretary came in every hour to give reports that became more and more disturbing.

Finally the workers marched out the factory. They marched out in ugly mood. But there was a foreman among them who marched with a first step and a resolute expression. A

Mrs. Pillars and her tree looking at him could tell that was not a part of the mob.

The rich owner and his secretary watched from a window, as they were frankly frightened. They did not know what might happen, and they were afraid to guess. They saw the mob gathering below the factory, and they did not know what to do. And then, suddenly, they saw the foreman's figure detach itself from the mob and step to the foreground. As they heard the man's voice, they heard the muttering of the mob.

"Fellow said the man," you know I've worked with you a good many years. And I want to tell you that you're wrong in the wrong way. Pick out a couple of men and send them to talk to the boss, and he'll do what you want him to. He's fair."

A chorus of jeers greeted the man. There were shouts of "How you know?" and "What d'yer mean fair!" But the listeners up in the window heard the man speaking again. "He was fair to me," said the man. "When I was down and out he gave me a chance. He didn't have to—nobody else had. But he did. . . ." And the rich man, leaning from the window, heard the story of a regeneration that he was responsible for.

The men listened. And they believed. And they sent their envoys—sent them calmly—to the factory-owner, and was fair. And their particular strike was averted.

THE rich factory-owner didn't know that his good deed was going to bear a great fruit. He never expected to hear again from the shabby boy who had asked for a chance. And yet he gave him that chance—doing a good deed that came back, boomerang-fashion, in his hour of need.

Mrs. Lydia Pillars didn't expect, probably, that the walnut she planted would grow into a big tree. But she planted it, and it is going to be used as an instrument in the salvation of the country—and the world!

An Aged Reader's Gift

MRS. A. J., of Chicago, Ill., writes: "I am eighty-six years old, and have read Christian Herald more than twenty years. It has been a great inspiration in my life. A reading my copy I send it on to the young with my daughter, who is a Christian worker. Please accept this $1 to help the cause along, and may God bless and multiply it, is the sincere wish of yours for the Master." The gift of this aged saint will be sent, with others, to help feed the starving widows and orphans of Syria and Armenia.

SAVE FUEL

and Help Win the War

The Caloric Will Save One Third to One Half of Your Fuel

You learned last winter that an ample fuel supply is essential to the winning of the war. That lesson should be remembered now.

You can help the Government save fuel and at the same time keep your home comfortable in every room, throughout the winter, by using the

The Original Patented Pipeless Furnace

Six thousand of the more than 50,000 Caloric users have testified to the economy, convenience and comfort made possible by this wonderful invention. In their letters, they tell us that the Caloric saves from one-third to one-half of their fuel.

Here is some of the evidence taken from these remarkable testimonials:

H. I. STEARNS, Brookings, S. D., says he kept his eight-room house comfortable all winter, even when the temperature dropped to 30° below, at a total consumption of only four tons of coal.

IRVIN LAMB, Lancaster, O., writes about his ten-room house, "All winter, the coldest Central Ohio has had in my life-time, we burned only six tons of soft coal to keep us warm through all the house."

H. A. VARNER, Enola, Neb., has an exposed eight-room house on his farm. He says: "As a fuel saver the Caloric was a welcome surprise. It took only 4260 pounds of soft coal and three cords of block wood to keep my entire home warm and comfortable all winter."

MRS. W. P. EMERY, living in a large nine-room house near Highland Center, Ia., writes: "The winter before we heated part of our house with a big baseburner and a soft coal stove, and we used over $100 worth of coal. This winter every room was comfortable, coal was higher, and yet our heating cost us only $53."

Have the nearest Caloric dealer demonstrate this coal conserving furnace for you. He will explain fully how it will heat all your house through its one register. He can also refer you to Caloric owners in your section.

Write to us for the Caloric catalog. It describes and illustrates the principles of pipeless heating upon which the operation of the Caloric is based. It also tells how you can take advantage of our free Engineering Service. Send a postcard for this book today.

A special booklet on the proper heating of church buildings will be sent free to any pastor or committee.

AVOID SUBSTITUTES

The vast majority of car owners know from experience the wisdom of getting the Champion Spark Plug especially designed and recommended for their type of car.

For their protection, we suggest this caution—be sure the name "Champion" is on the porcelain as well as on the box. If it is not, you know it is not the genuine, dependable Champion.

Most dealers call your attention to the name "Champion" on the porcelain when they recommend this make of plug.

Hungarian army. Earlier reports had told of the mutiny of a Croation regiment at Fiume and of the revolt of two infantry regiments at Karlowitz in Croatia; 700 persons were reported killed in rioting in Croatia. French troops, crossing the Danube from Bulgaria, were in touch with Austrian troops in Roumania. With her armies in retreat before the victorious Italian troops, it was not surprising that Austria should send another note to President Wilson declaring that she was in process of reorganizing her government in line with his demands regarding the self-determination of peoples. Austria's note was held in all Entente capitals to be the forerunner of complete surrender, and it was generally predicted that any terms granted her would provide for Allied access to Germany across Austrian territory.

CONSCIENCE TO RULE TABLES. The Federal Food Board announced on October 27 that it would not issue sugar cards to households, nor similar cards covering other items of food. But it announced: "Every table should be spread, and every meal eaten this winter with the wants of the world in mind and a war conscience to guide." America must provide during the coming year 10,400,000 tons of bread-making flour and grains, or more than 400,000 bushels. According to the Food Administration: "The substantial part of this saving will come from the conscientious, deliberate saving of 100,000,000 American citizens, male and female, big and little." War conscience will be the moving factor in the new home card soon to be issued by the Food Administration.

TURKEY CRIES "KAMERAD." London advices of October 26 reported that the Turkish minister to Switzerland had handed to the British and French ministers an offer of peace virtually amounting to a surrender. The offer to surrender was coincident with the opening of a new campaign by the British in Mesopotamia in which they advanced some distance up the Tigris valley, while General Allenby's cavalry and armored cars, on October 26, captured Aleppo, 185 miles north of Damascus and the junction of the Damascus and Bagdad railways, cutting the latter and thus severing the communications of the Turks in Mesopotamia. The Turks, on October 29, were in retreat toward Mosul, 80 miles behind the front of that date and were reported to have abandoned Baku and its oilfields.

CHINESE CIVIL WAR ENDED. The new President of China, Hsu-Shih-Chang, on October 23, pardoned Chang Hsun, who engineered the coup in 1917, by which the Empire was momentarily restored. Later cable advices reported that the policy of conciliation adopted by President Hsu had resulted in a cessation of hostilities between the northern and southern armies, and that delegates had been sent by the southerners to confer with the President, the progress of the conference being reported satisfactory to both sides.

STORM SINKS ALASKA LINER. The Canadian Pacific Steamship Princess Sophia, with 268 passengers and a crew of 175 foundered October 25 in a gale in the Lynn Canal, west of Juneau, Alaska, being blown on Vanderbilt Reef and then thrown over the reef into deep water on the other side. Everyone on board was drowned.

BULGARIA STILL HAS HOPES. Bulgaria, which guessed wrong in her choice of partners in the war, and which recently got out on the unconditional surrender basis, was reported, late in October, to be laying her plans to secure from the Allies some of the territory she coveted in Macedonia, Thrace and the Dobrudja. Inasmuch as these territories belong to Serbia, Greece, and Roumania which have been loyal to the Allies, it is not expected that Bulgaria will succeed in her designs.

CZARINA CAUSED DEATH OF KITCHENER. Henry W. Mapp, Salvatio Army Commissioner in Russia, in a address in New York, on October 2 declared that the Russian Czarina through her private telegraph wire to Berlin, had kept the German Government fully informed on all plans of the Allies so far as they were known in Russia, and had sent the information to the German Government which enabled it to sink the ship on which Lord Kitchener sailed to Russia.

HEBREW UNIVERSITY IN JERUSALEM. The foundation stones of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem were laid October on the summit of the Mount of Olives in the presence of General Allenby and representatives of the French and Italian detachments serving in Palestine. The foundation stones were 12 in number, one for each of the tribes of Israel.

WILL RETURN DEPORTED BELGIAN. The German Government informed Cardinal Mercier, on October 22, that as soon as Belgian territory had been evacuated by German troops the Belgians deported into Germany as all political prisoners would be permitted to return.

$6,000,000 FOR THE NAVY. The Navy Department, on October 27, laid before Congress a three year naval building program to succeed the three year naval program just completed and to provide 10 additional super dreadnaughts, 6 battle cruisers and 140 smaller vessels at a cost in the years of $600,000,000.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. On October 22 the German Reichstag was asked for an additional war credit of 15,000,000 marks. When this is granted the war credits of Germany from the beginning of the war will equal 154,000,000 marks or about $36,652,000,000. The United States Government on October 22, placed contracts for motor trucks, chasses, ambulances, tractors, passenger cars, motorcycles, and bicycles amounting to $130,000,000. The order included more than 3000 trucks of all classes, 25,000 chasses, 3600 trailers, over 10,000 passenger cars, 18,775 motorcycles and 25,000 bicycles. The Texas Court of Appeals, on October 23, held a state wide prohibition law unconstitutional as being in conflict with the option feature of the Texas constitution. The Interstate Commerce Commission, on October 24, asserted authority to alter railroad freight rates. The national public health service, on October 24, reported that 44 states the influenza epidemic was subsiding, although it was still serious in many localities. The total of cases of the camps up to that date was 26,275, and pneumonia cases 48,328, number of deaths being 16,174. Reports more or less delayed by distance and the disorganization of communications show that early in September a typhoon in southern Japan did considerable damage. Known loss of life was in excess of 500, while in the prefectures more than 1600 houses were destroyed. Much damage also been done to growing crops. Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, for many years prominent in public school work in Chicago, and superintendent of schools of that city for 6 years until 1915, died, on October 26, of pneumonia. She was 73 years of age and was chairman of the National Women's Liberty Loan Committee. The Administrator Garfield announced on October 27 that the coal output was good and that the country on that date had eight weeks' supply on hand. It was announced, on October 27, that former Justice Hughes' report on the Air Craft Investigation had been completed and filed by the Attorney General. It was stated that the report would be made public within a few days. Former U. S. Senator Eugene Hale of Maine died on October 27, aged 82.

Marion Harland's Corner

Boxes for Our Boys Overseas, and Other Matters

FOR fear of delays in getting word through the Corner, I have mailed the substance of the following. It is given here for the benefit of others who may desire to treat the brave fellows in the field to a taste of home delights:

M. E. V. (New York) asked about cookies to send to our boys "over there" and you gave some good recipes in reply. What I want to know is how can these be sent to the boys? (1) I have a boy "over there" who has never been away from home more than a week at a time, and was sent overseas four weeks after he left home to join the army. I would appreciate something from home that he could get it. (2) Can you tell me if our letters to the boys are censored as theirs to us?—Mrs. W. D. F. (South Carolina.)

(1) In reply to you and to other mothers whose hearts yearn over the absent sons, battling valiantly for country and right, I insert the following note received from an authentic source:

Parcels cannot be sent to soldiers overseas with the exception of Christmas boxes.

These must not weigh more than three pounds each wrapped. Each must be accompanied by a regular application to the donor for the soldier himself, endorsed by the officer in command of his company.

That is, your boy must write to you, asking for the gift, and get the signature of one of his commanding officers to certify that the letter is O. K. When you get your boy's official label go to the nearest Red Cross inspection station. If you live in the country there will be one in your market town or at least in the county seat. At this inspection station you will receive a pasteboard carton 3x9 inches, which must be used to forward your Christmas gifts. No other package may be used, and no larger one can be sent. When you have it packed you must take it back to the Red Cross inspection station, where it will be opened and its contents inspected. It will then be officially sealed and postage attached to carry it to Hoboken. Every soldier in France and everyone on the high seas received a request blank. If your boy does not send his, or if it has gone astray, he can't get a package. If you received no official label you can't get a carton or send a package. You mail a package without the label or without the inspection by the Red Cross it is not sent overseas. Packages must be sent to the Red Cross inspection station by November 15. These rules are War Department regulations dictated by military necessity. Christmas packages cannot be permitted to occupy ship space needed for food and munitions and more soldiers.

(2) Probably not.

AND apropos of home delights, I offer gladly other hints respecting them from a valued member:

You gave us an interesting talk about "Fruit Leathers." My fingers fairly itch to remind you (though doubtless you already know) that pumpkin, reduced to a pulp by cooking, may be dried before a wood fire to an excellent "leather." Spices added give it a fine touch. And also about "Fruit Cheese," which comes along the line of "conserving." An acid fruit, cooked to a stiff consistency—spiced and sweetened to taste may be molded in bowls or jars with straight sides. When it is firm slip the cheese out, cut as many slices as are needed, put the remainder back in the bowl, cover securely for the next time. Sugar, sprinkled over the cut slices, gleams beautifully under the tea-table light.

Years ago my mother made cheese after the manner, which formula she got from Miss Leslie's celebrated cook-book. In this instance she used quinces. Since then I have experimented with apples, peaches, plums, meatines, and grapes, and with good results.—Mrs. R. N. C. (Alabama.)

May I add to the foregoing charming letter that my own mother studied and believed in Miss Leslie's cook-book? Hers was a name to conjure with in the old so long ago. Eggs were twelve cents a dozen then, and the direction to "beat twelve light" for a single sponge cake did not horrify our frugal foremothers. Nor did the accompanying order, "the weight of the eggs in star," cause the hair to rise as it does now above heads intent upon saving sugar for army use. Our Alabama housemother is abreast of the times, as her recipes affirm. She has a "right hand" with sugar and she is on the alert to conserve all "kindly fruits." With fond memories of "quince cheese," I commend her communication to the readers of today.

Will you kindly send directions for freezing ice-cream, as you described it in the Corner? I have tried packing it, and it would freeze all right, but it would be hard and icy, as it was not stirred.—Mrs. K. B. (Michigan.)

I am afraid you overlooked what may be called the crux of the process. When the cream is half frozen, the freezer is opened for the first and only time during the congelation, and the contents are stirred and beaten steadily from eight to ten minutes, or until they are a smooth mass. Close the freezer, and repack with finely pounded ice and salt, covering the top with this, then with a doubled rug to exclude all air. Leave thus for three or four or five hours, according to your convenience, and turn out a solid column of velvety consistency.

As the prices of eggs are almost prohibitive at present, I give a recipe for cake, which I have had proof is excellent for an everyday luncheon and hungry children.

Apropos of Indian corn-meal mush, I was told by a pioneer to stir in the meal just as the water reaches the boiling point, and have found that the meal is then less inclined to lump, if at all. As I make mine in a double boiler and let it stand for several hours on the stove, I am not troubled at all with lumping.

A Good Everyday Cake

One-half cup shortening; one cup sugar, or one-half cup molasses and one-half cup sugar; one cup cold, unsweetened apple sauce; one teaspoonful of soda; two cups of flour; one teaspoonful cinnamon; one-half teaspoonful salt; nuts and raisins ad lib. Mix as you would any plain cake.—A. S. M. (Colorado.)

"And still the wonder grows" how American women, all over our land, are conforming, as one, to the changed conditions of housewifery prescribed by a wise and prudent government. Perhaps the strangest element in the change that has come over our spirits is the eagerness with which we obey orders from headquarters, and this without setting before our households unpalatable and innutritious food. May the good work go on and take such root in domestic management that we may carry into that land of peace (which we trust is not remote) the economies we have learned during the long apprenticeship which we liken to the "swellings of Jordan!"

WE make room for a recent and urgent recommendation of government agents in charge of House and Home Administration. Every item here set down is of value, and each should be transferred to the housekeeper's manual:

As every family has, or should have, on hand a bottle or tube of good glue, the following practical suggestions can be acted upon without delay or expense:

To Put New Life into an Old Broom.—A teaspoonful of glue, mixed in a basin of hot water, poured over a broom and then allowed to dry thoroughly, will greatly stiffen it, and prolong its usefulness and life.

When Shoes Become Barked or Scarred.—Very often a small piece of the leather is lifted or loosened. Don't cut it off and try to cover the place with blacking. Flatten the piece in place with a little glue and allow it to dry. Then apply blacking, and the surface will be as good as new.

For Tears or Rents in Silk.—Another piece of silk or fabric of the same color placed under the tear with a thin coating of glue will bring the edges more firmly together than can be done with a needle. Allow it to dry thoroughly, and the rent will be almost invisible.

A Splendid Way to Keep Rubbers from Slipping.—Rubber overshoes often become so loose that they slip off at the heels, especially in the winter and spring, when the ground is muddy or slushy. This annoying trouble can be entirely eliminated by gluing a felt band around the inside top of the rubber.

To Protect Furs and Woolens from Moths.—It is commonly known that moths very much dislike the odor of ink in old newspapers. Several thicknesses of old newspapers firmly glued together may be made into the form of a bag, and the garment placed inside. After the ends and all joints are firmly sealed with glue, the bag is absolutely moth and dust proof, and your protection from moths has cost practically nothing.

HEINZ Mince-Meat

THERE are many ingredients in really good mince meat. And each of these many ingredients gives Heinz an opportunity to show his resources in procuring the best—choice apples from the wind-swept orchards of Northern New York, Grecian currants—fruity and clean—raisins from Valencia, beef from America's great plains and fragrant spices from the Orient.

With each ingredient good as it can be, Heinz Mince Meat adds goodness to goodness—blending, seasoning, bringing out the flavor, until the result is a triumph.

Heinz Mince Meat is sold only in one and two pound glass jars and tins—never in bulk.

Drop that Cough
SMITH BROTHERS of Poughkeepsie

Established 1879
Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it mops the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold. Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp." The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights. It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers. For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities. It is a protection to those exposed. Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use. Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. In stamps. Making a Thousand Child Exiles Safe him, busily giving out picture papers to the youngsters.

These boys and girls were much excited. They chattered like magpies, full of merriment and fun. It is a great experience, going forth to see the world, with the government giving you the tickets. It's a real setting out into the unknown—a dream adventure come true. They laughed and told us all about it, for they could not hide the keen joy of this journey. It may not be Lorraine, but it is still France!

The whistle blew, last good-byes were said, kisses on both cheeks for every member of the family. Just as the wheels began to turn, the kiddies in the first ear led off with the Marseillaise. French children sing exceedingly well. If only you could have heard that song, as it echoed through the station—

"Allons, enfants de la patrie, Le jour de la gloire est arrivé."

Then, to our surprise, they whistled The Star-Spangled Banner. It went exceedingly well. And ear after ear took it up, so that we left Nancy to "The Land of the Free and the Home of the Brave."

PLEASE look at a good war map and follow our journey. The very names of the stations we passed through are so exciting! Toul, the junction for Verdun, Bar le Due, south to St. Dizier, through the valley of the Marne in the late afternoon, skirting around Paris in the night, to Chartres, then straight up to Rennes, and north to the coast. It is a beautiful country. The Marne winds about so much, like a crumpled piece of baby-blue ribbon. We passed tiny fields like school children's gardens, planted with the most exquisite. And we saw village after village each one a picture, with Gothic spires and Renaissance towers, and houses with brown or red-tiled roofs and cream walls over which vines were clambering.

More than once we saw khaki uniforms. Frequently we saw signs of bombardment: roofless houses, shell holes already overgrown with moss, a thick turf that nature so quick throws over her ruins. And very, very often on the sloping hillsides there were graves, each with the tricolor of France fluttering like a merry signal. All over the countryside the wind lifts the lit weather-stained flags and they wave to each other. There is something joyous in the way red and white and blue flash in the sun.

Our journey was uneventful. Rennes the Red Cross canteen served us a hot lunch, supposed to be breakfast, but we were four hours late.

At four in the afternoon we reached Dinard. Come to meet us at the station were the mayor and hundreds of citizens. We marched our thousand kiddies through long lines of welcoming men and women, all the way up the Hotel Royal, which was taken over as a military hospital and is now to be a children's refuge. Here we are with our six hundred and eighty little girls—a strange sight in these great rooms that were once showy and luxurious. Such happy children as they are! The little boys are a few miles away at another beach called St. Lunaire. None of them is any the worse for the journey. Here they will be so safe and well, ready to go back to Lorraine when peace comes. Yes, they will go home. René and Jeanne and the others, to live for France.

Dinard, near St. Malo, Brittany, France

The Tomb of James the Apostle

THIS is one of four sepulchers in the valley of Jehoshaphat on the east side of the Brook Kedron. It is an excavated tomb with an ornamental portal supported by two Doric columns. The cavern is fifteen feet high by ten broad and extends back about fifty feet. The monks believe that the apostle James took refuge here in the interval between the crucifixion and the resurrection, that he remained there eating and drinking nothing until the Lord appeared to him on the day of the resurrection.

The apostle whose tomb this is supposed to be is not the brother of John, but James, the brother of our Lord. Tradition says that he was about ninety-six years old at the time of his death, and that he suffered martyrdom by being thrown from a pinnacle of the temple into the valley, after which he was stoned, being finally dispatched by a blow on the head from a fuller's pole. The same tradition declares that he was buried near where he fell, thus identifying the structure pictured on this week's cover as his tomb. Another tradition, however, places the site of his burial in a tomb on the Mount of Olives. Whichever may have been his resting-place, his name has clung to the edifice in the valley of Jehoshaphat, which there was preserved for seven centuries a chair supposed to have belonged to the martyred apostle.

AT the annual meeting of the Moody Bible Institute, held October 16, two new trustees were elected, William Albert Harbison and Mr. Bryan Y. Craig. Mr. Henry P. Cromwell, president of the Quaker Oats Company and chairman of the Vice Committee of Fifteen, was re-elected president, Mr. E. K. Warren, president of the Warren Featherbone Company, vice-president, and Mr. Craig, secretary. Dean James M. Gray reported 5,651 students in the day and evening classes and the correspondence department; also that a new departure had been made in the evening classes for the special benefit of Chicago people. The period of study had been extended from three to four years. Business Manager A. F. Gaylord reported the present worth of the Institute to be $1,598,645. The gross operating income for the year was $454,329 and the books closed with a deficit on the current expense account of $27,925, caused largely by war conditions; but encouraging efforts were now in progress looking toward its liquidation. Both faculty and students are represented at the front as combatants as well as noncombatants, some of whom have yielded up their lives in the cause. Also several of the faculty and students are giving their services to religious work in different training camps.

THERE has been called, by the Anti-Saloon League of America, to meet in Columbus, Ohio, from November 19 to 22 inclusive, a conference of the temperance forces of America to consider the situation, lay the plans and form an international organization with the foundation that has led to success here. Delegates from England, France, Scotland and Mexico have been appointed and are on the way. In addition to these, a church in neutral nations is planning to have representatives here. It will be an epoch-making conference. Great leaders of the movement in this land are taking an active interest in plans and will have part in the program. Every friend of this cause should, if possible, arrange to attend this conference in November. Rev. E. J. Moore, D. D., Assistant General Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America, Westerville, Ohio, is secretary of the Committee on Arrangements and Program. Communications relative to this conference addressed to him will receive prompt attention.

Wants to Help Palestine Orphans

YOUR editorial of July 24, under the heading "Our Opportunity in Palestine," called my attention to what has been in my mind several months. Find enclosed a postal order to you for $30 to pass on to Major Waters your staff to be used as a nest-egg in starting homes for orphan children in the Holy Land which it could have been $3,000. My prayers with this small contribution. Being left an orphan in infancy, now an aged widow alone, also a semi-invalid all my life, having found the promise always sure: "I will relieve the fatherless and widow," I send it partly as a thank-offering after getting a settlement without loss where one-third of income was at stake. In these days of high prices would have been a calamity indeed. Please withhold my name and sign

Young People's Topics for November 17

The Urgency of a Great Errand (Win My Chum)

Epworth League Topic. Matt. 22: 1-5, 8-14

WE are all servants of a King, and we are sent out into the highways to bid whomsoever we find to the wedding supper of the Lamb. We are to compel them to come in. But how shall we convince them that there is to be a feast, unless our faces show the joy of the festival and unless we wear the garments of a guest? The garment of our daily living will either add force to our invitation or make it ineffective. There is something more than worldly wisdom in placing as the first goal of our active Christian life the winning of our friend. No one knows better, no one can more certainly appraise the workings of the alchemy of grace in our hearts. If the love of God is so mellowed and transformed us that our chum will seek the same power for his own life, then there is no conflict with sin too difficult for us, no sin too hardened for us to help toward salvation. And who should we more naturally seek to bring into touch with our Saviour than the one who has been nearest to us, almost part of ourselves, the one who has shared our plans and hopes and questionings and opinions? Chums don't always agree, but their very differences drive them together. I will not be downhearted, therefore, if at first your friend does not follow you willingly to the wedding feast. Keep patient and persist in the invitation; live your faith and let the spirit of Christ shine through your life, and the time will not be long in coming to a decision. Your chum won, it will be easy to go on to other victories.

Reforms That Need Our Aid

Christian Endeavor Topic. Amos 8: 4-10

THERE have been reformers who were not Christians, but no true Christian can fail to further real reform. The reference chosen for this topic will probably set most leaders on the trail of the profiteer. The Food Administration is already hot on this trail, and we hope that in the world to come there is reserved for the profiteer a place especially well calculated to accumulate misery. There has never been any defense for the man who took his neighbor's living, either in usury or in excessive prices. The war did not produce the profiteer, it only gave him opportunity and called attention to him. But the elimination of profiteering, while a matter of present urgency, is a matter of the moment. There are greater reforms that await our hand. In spite of over 142 years of living together as sovereign states united into a nation, there is still sectionalism among us. All of us do not as yet think of the nation in terms of unity. The middle states are reluctant to build a navy or deepen harbors, while the coast states are slow to encourage the development of inland waterways. The North does not yet appreciate the power of the new industrial South, and this same Southern industrialism is slow to accept the experience of the North regarding child labor and compulsory education. The new system of second-class postal rates is itself a monument to sectionalism, even as it is a potent promoter of it. The needed reform is an early return to a flat rate of postage which will not penalize the Southern and Western reader of Eastern and Northern magazines and papers. In line with the above, the development of compulsory recreation laws, including better common schools, and the elimination of child labor from industry, are two reforms which have gone far but which are not yet completely effected. The reform of our drinking habits, begun twenty-five or more years ago, is nearly complete; but the National Prohibition Amendment is not yet adopted, and Christian Endeavorers can not be active in a better cause than that of ratification.

Another reform which is making progress is the humanizing of the penal laws, so that the man who runs foul of the courts may be rebuilt into a good citizen, instead of hardened into a confirmed criminal. A part of this reform is the giving to each discharged prisoner of a real chance to get a new start in honest employment. Another reform, much needed, is a restoration of the former regard for the Lord's Day. The war is driving people back to God; let us make certain that the Church so adjusts itself to the spirit in which they come that it will hold them and attract others when the emergency of the day is past. There are other movements—the good roads movement, the anti-cigarette movement, the suffrage movement, the movement for the reclaiming of arid lands and the settlement thereon of men who are now fighting the battle of liberty and democracy in France, the movements for better industrial organization, for better housing, for mothers' pensions and old age benefits.

This is only a partial list, but each of these may well challenge the enthusiasm of young life. Each makes for a better nation, and each must be solved in the spirit of the Christ or it will not be solved at all.

Making Democracy Safe Through the Country Church

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Isa. 35: 1

A VERY similar topic to this was treated in the issue of October 9 as the Epworth League topic for October 20. The country church is today making glad the wilderness in a twofold sense. It is bringing a vital message of truth to hungry hearts, and helping to blaze the way toward better agriculture and closer and friendlier cooperation. The church doors that closed on a dwindling company of faithful saints are open again and a growing company is thronging the old preaching-places because the rural church has discovered a new gospel of mutual helpfulness. Nor has this new gospel in any way displaced the old Gospel of forgiving grace, but both together have brought the resurrection. Democracy can never be safe when God is forgotten. Democracy rests on the willingness of each individual to live for the good of all. When God drops out of a life, selfishness, self-seeking, the "look out for number one" spirit, inevitably gain the upper hand. We would not claim that church membership always destroys this spirit (unfortunately, it has more than nine lives); but the rural church of today, with its simple gospel of divine love and human helpfulness, is showing selfish hearts the better light of community spirit, of neighborliness. It takes men of large caliber to serve such a church, and the country is producing the men; but the field is large, and whereas the country parson once starved in penury on a salary paid in parsnips and potatoes, the new community church of today, while not omitting the edibles, is not niggardly in its dole of pence. The new rural church is not only making a better country, but it is helping to turn backward the two-generation-old stream of migration to the cities, which drained from the country its best and crowded the cities with folks whose prosperity never quite made up for the sacrifice of the open country.

THE General Committee of Anthracite Coal Operators have given out some conservation hints which reduced to their lowest terms may be briefly summarized as follows:

Put off furnace heat as long as possible. Raise shades to admit free heat. Banish awnings. Weather-strip doors and windows. Asbestos the furnace. Keep thermometer below 67. Blankets, not heat, in bedroom. Wear heavier clothes. Clean soot from pipes and boilers. Burn wood, oil, coke and bituminous coal. Cook with gas. Drape heavily inside of doors and windows.

Concrete Roads and Gunstocks

When the call came for gunstocks, these black walnut logs—gunstocks in the rough—quickly made the first lap of their journey to the firing line because the concrete roads of Vermilion County, Ill., were ready.

What are the roads of your community doing to win the war? Are they hindering, or are they helping like the concrete roads of Vermilion County?

Everywhere concrete roads are speeding up war—supplying cantonments, supplementing railroads, keeping industry going, feeding the Nation. And concrete roads everywhere are none the worse for this heavy, pounding, speeded up traffic.

Whenever you drive over concrete pavement, tell the road or street authorities that you like it. They will be glad to have you endorse their choice and give you added mileage if you ask it.

Measured by their long life and trifling maintenance cost, concrete roads are the least expensive.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

WHEREVER we look, Comrades in Adventuring, we are reminded that the fall is dying to embers, and the winter is upon us. The flaunting red leaves we gathered in the woods and brought into our homes only a few short weeks ago are twisting and fading. And now it is yellow pumpkins we think about: Thanksgiving pumpkins that speak of home and the sweetest day in the year.

We look ahead, to the Thanksgiving just a brief fortnight away; and we wish—oh, how we wish!—that we could put so many extra leaves in our Thanksgiving table that it would spread and spread (in ever-widening circles) until it had reached a certain trench and a certain lonely young soldier asleep with his head on his arm, dreaming of that very table.

What a jovial thrust in the ribs the home table would give him: the boy whose baby hands beat dents in it twenty years ago! And what a reunion it would be! And then, can't you hear the cry of: "Turkey, and stuffin', and cranberry sauce, an'—say, fellows, come on!" And—that's all. For it's only a dream. Just a dream of yours and mine, Neighbors.

Well, well! dreams soften the heart, if they do bring tears to the eyes. And even if we can't make our old dining-room table do all that we wish it might, we can at least stretch it as far as it will go; which is almost to the walls of the room, with just space for twelve chairs. Yes, we can seat twelve. Twelve; and ours is a little family of three!

It seems like a big order. There won't be salad plates enough; or butter spreaders, or anything! And turkey is so high! And Uncle Sam has bought most of them to take Thanksgiving to France. And it's too late to invite folks now. And we're out of preserves. And anyhow, we don't want to do it. Our boy is in France.

But somehow, we American women never weep long. And when it comes to fooling ourselves with excuses, we're no good at that at all.

So we're on our feet, pretty soon, and whistling. Yes, just that! For we've forgotten ourselves. Now we are really (honestly and truly) thinking of our boy, Over There, and what he would like us to do. We can almost hear him say:

"Sure, mother! Have a real Thanksgiving feed, the way we always do. And say, maybe you can get Paul's aunt to come. He's pretty badly smashed up, and she knows it by now. She oughtn't to spend Thanksgiving in that old house alone. And you might ask old Mr. McAllister, and the Martins, and that deaf old lady living with them, and Billy Mack. He's got a weak chest, and can't get over here, and he's all out up over it. And I guess I'd have Aunt Eunice and Uncle Jim. And of course, Helen. My, that's a crowd! Well, you pick out the ones you can have."

There's a mist in our eyes as we stop at the writing-desk and get off little notes of invitation to them all. Oh, we'll have a "real feed"! We pause before his photograph, on the desk, and smile. And the picture, bathed in the sunset light, seems to grin back.

"Hurrah for you, mother!" it seems to say. "You always were a good one!" Yes, that is how it happens, Neighbors, that we are planning to commemorate this Thanksgiving as we have never observed any before in our lives.

There have been other Thanksgivings: sad ones, happy ones, lonely ones, jovial ones; but none quite like this.

YET let us look back on the Thanksgivings of other years. Perhaps, although they were not quite like this one, they may suggest to us ways of honoring this Thanksgiving: if not for ourselves, then for our community. For you know, not even a table with twelve chairs around it, is going to accommodate one tenth of the lonely, heart-hungry folk in your neighborhood and mine.

A Neighborhood Thanksgiving

We are just a band of farm women in Maine, who, a few years ago, realizing the need of more sociability in our community, organized our "Neighborhood Circle." We meet twice a month, taking our work and talking over matters of general interest or helpfulness. All unkind gossip is barred. Usually each takes her own work, but in a case of need we often unite in sewing for one family.

Two years ago we had a Neighborhood Thanksgiving at the home of one of the members. Each family furnished a cooked fowl. The bread and pastry and cranberry sauce were brought by the different families; and the vegetables were furnished by the hostess. A very long table was arranged in the largest room of the house, and all but the waiters were seated at one time. The host returned thanks for mercies given, especially for the returning health of some present who had been very ill.

In the afternoon, the singing of songs and hymns familiar to all took its prominent part. All enjoyed the day, but perhaps it seemed especially good to the young school teacher far from home, and to an elderly man, homeless and working in the neighborhood. "That," he said, "was what I call a regular old-fashioned Thanksgiving."

Besides this Neighborhood Thanksgiving, our little circle has had a Community Fourth of July Celebration, and several Community Christmas Trees. Perhaps these are not what any one would call great accomplishments; but in a neighborhood which once had its only gatherings at some one's funeral, our Circle has certainly proved worth while.

LUCY HUTCHINS.

FROM this cheery adventure, Neighbors, we plunge into the breezy account of a Community Thanksgiving:

A Thanksgiving Bazaar

Would you like to hear about the Thanksgiving Bazaar given by our high school for the benefit of the Red Cross and Y. M. C. A.?

Each class had a booth. The freshman booth represented a ship with guns and flags. The sophomore booth was a great Red Cross. The juniors' was a cool-looking little arbor of green and white, with Y. M. C. A. in big red letters before it. The senior booth was the glory of the evening. It had a dome of red, white and blue, with many tiny lights lighting up the sign "Liberty." A tall boy was dressed as Uncle Sam, and had Aunt Columbia beside him to help him serve.

Caps, aprons, dresses, doilies, knick-knacks, candy, chewing gum, popcorn balls and lomonado were sold. A victrola was kept going, and a funny clown drew the people to the sophomore booth.

The juniors had a police court where any one was taken who flirted, chewed gum, stood about, etc. The policed one had to go to the junior booth and buy something. The seniors had a "swimming match," in which a match was placed in a tub of water and allowed to swim. It cost five cents to see it.

In the basement and domestic science room a cafeteria supper was served; and a program was given in the Assembly Room, the main features being stereoscopic views and tableaux in which the pupils took part. The senior booth took first prize, while the freshman booth stood second.

Wasn't that a novel and patriotic way to spend a Thanksgiving evening?

A. M. ROLLER.

It certainly was; and I hope that this year there will be many such Thanksgiving Bazaars.

MEANTIME let us hear how a plucky little school teacher, out in a lonely section of Nebraska, helped her community to have a jolly Thanksgiving.

Old-Fashioned Singing School on Thanksgiving

Last year my daughter taught school in a very lonely neighborhood in Nebraska. She was ten miles from the nearest village, and so had to depend greatly on her own resources.

One of her "adventures in neighboring" was the holding of an old-fashioned spelling school at Thanksgiving time. There were twenty-two pupils attending school then, and these were of "assorted sizes," all the way from beginners to those older than herself. Her plan was to use all these children and young people, so that no one could feel left out, and also to get the older people of the neighborhood together. She wanted the whole community to be present at that Thanksgiving party.

And so it was arranged. The part of Old-Time Singing Master was taken by a married man who lived near enough the school to attend all the evenings of practice. He was young and popular, and a really good musician. So these gatherings for practice were much enjoyed. Many young people not in school came, and every one in the district became interested. Only old-time songs were learned.

On the day of the celebration it was found that a fine program had been prepared: of part singing and chorus singing. Sometimes, too, the singing school would sing the verse of a song, and all the rest join in on the chorus. So every one took part.

All were in costume, as the plan was to carry out (so far as was possible without going to too much work) the old-fashioned idea. At the end of the program, boxes, with lunch prepared for two, were sold at auction, every woman and girl bringing one. The box social part of the entertainment was not a novel idea at all, but is always a jolly one, and popular. And the money from these boxes brought a nice sum, which was used for the schoolroom and playground.

The decorations, since it was Thanksgiving time, were golden pumpkins, corn, and stalks of wheat: with the children's drawings on blackboards and arranged about the room. Candles and lanterns were used for light.

My daughter was very happy over the results of that evening. It seemed to be all that was needed to break the ice in a community where the people had never mixed much. After that it was easy to get up other get-together times.

SARAH GILBERT.

Such a Thanksgiving party, fellow Adventurers, need not be held in the schoolhouse. It could be held in some one's big parlor, or in a barn. And after the program, wholesome games could be played. Perhaps, too, a round robin letter could be written by all present to be sent overseas to the soldier boys from that particular home or that special village.

AND now, Neighbors, before dipping into today's Forum, we have space for just one more Thanksgiving adventure:

Thanksgiving Dinner to Furnish School Auditorium

I THINK Adventures in Neighboring just splendid, and want to add my bit. This is what we did last Thanksgiving in this neighborhood. Perhaps it will offer a suggestion to some one else.

We had a get-together Thanksgiving dinner and supper in the new auditorium of our schoolhouse, the object of which was to furnish the auditorium. We had just such a dinner as Thanksgiving calls for: turkey, oysters, salads, plum pudding and pumpkin pie. The day was a dark one with a steady downpour of rain; but the wagons and autos kept coming until we had a large crowd of patrons. And how we all did enjoy being together: we neighbors from the different sections! Some of us had not had such a chat with old friends for a long time. We exchanged news and views, and found the exchange stimulating.

At night we had music and recitations, and a one-act play by the teachers and some of the pupils. "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "Nearer, my God, to Thee" were beautifully pantomimed by some of the school.

As we were closing our entertainment, we did not forget to send portions to those in want and sorrow who had been unable to come. Thus ended a day full of happiness for many. And, oh, yes, I must not forget to add that by our dinner we raised eighty dollars for furniture for the auditorium.

A VIRGINIA NEIGHBOR.

A very beautiful and constructive adventure, Neighbors, and a good one with which to end today's meeting. My heart will be with you this Thanksgiving Day; for I know that for some of us it could be a lonely Thanksgiving, if we would allow it to be. But ah, I beg of you, Christian Herald friends, not to let it be a lonely day. Throw open your hearts, and your hospitality, to some needy creature: even if it be only to the hungry bird on your window sill. There is never a time when we cannot give something to some one, even if it be only a "cup of cold water"; and surely on this day, of all others, we want to give, give, give out of the fulness of our hearts.

WITH this loving message, and the hope that this Thanksgiving will be the most deeply happy and satisfying of your lives, I must bid you, neighbors, godspeed for another fortnight.

The Neighbor's Forum

I know of a very simple device one hard of hearing can use without any trouble or expense. It is nothing more nor less than an ordinary mailing tube such as calendars and photos are mailed in. The largest size—two or three inches in diameter—is better than the small size. By placing it to the ear and letting the person you wish to converse with speak through the other end, you can (even if very deaf) hear distinctly an ordinary tone of voice. I know three different persons, who are very deaf, who have tried high-priced trumpets but found the tube more satisfactory. Best wishes for the Neighboring corner.—Mrs. H. M., Texas.

We are planning to earn money for our Christian Endeavor Society. Can any one tell me a way? It is difficult here.—B. M. T., Montana.

Here are some games, for parties or neighborhood gatherings, which the Neighbors might like to know about. I am sending full directions for each.—M. D., Georgia.

[DEAR NEIGHBORS: The games are "Handkerchief," "Spending my Nickel," "Selecting Partners," "Breaking the Ice," and "Laugh and Go Foot." If these are new to you, as they are to me, send me a stamped, self-addressed envelope and I will be glad to furnish you directions for playing them.—VERA L. CONNOLLY.]

"A Mito of Pennies!": that's what a certain North Dakota town made its slogan when raising money for the Red Cross. And it lived up to its slogan too. "One mile is 2,280 feet," volunteered some one. Our chairman at once produced pennies, and we found that it took sixteen to each twelve inches. We multiplied, and found that a mile of pennies would amount to no less than $844.80! A glass jar (the confectioner's kind) was used as a receptacle, and a young lady representative of our Red Cross Branch was stationed at the leading business place of the town. She had charge of the soliciting for that day, some one taking her place the next. Naturally there was some rivalry among the girls, each anxious to make hers the biggest day. And of course they did not insist upon pennies, but took larger donations with equally thankful heart. A bulletin board announced the day's receipts in cash and its equivalent in the fraction of a mile: until the full mile had been raised.—A. R., Minnesota.

I am a young girl about fifteen years old, and would appreciate letters or postal cards, as I live in a very lonely place.—NEIGHBOR.

Many thanks to all the Neighbors for their kindness and interest in me. I have received many loving letters. I am seventy-four years old, and live a very lonely life. So I am always glad and eager to receive letters. The messages from my kind Christian Herald friends have been a real joy, although I have been slow in answering them, as I have to depend on my daughter, living at the foot of this hill, to answer them for me. But they have brought much happiness to me. (The old lady living on a Mountain Top).

I save all the bright pictures from the wrappers of canned goods all the covers of seed packets, all the post cards, and even the Santa Claus pictures that come out in the newspapers just before the holidays. At Christmas time I make scrap books of flour sacks, scallop the edges, and paste these pictures in: giving these books as presents to children. I have found them my most popular gifts with the little folks.—Mrs. P. G. KIBBEY.

Our church had failed to raise enough money to carry out its missionary program. We could see no way to do this until one member proposed this plan: that every church member keep account of all the eggs laid at his home, sell them, and turn the proceeds over to the church treasury. At the end of the year, the church had not only raised the needed amount, but fifty per cent. more.—LEONARD J. PRIESTLEY.

THE CAPTURE OF JERUSALEM

By REV. A. E. THOMPSON

Pastor of the American Church at Jerusalem (driven by the Turk from the Holy City at the outbreak of the World War). At present Field Secretary for the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief.

"The capture of Jerusalem is one of those events to which students of prophecy have been looking forward for many years. Even before Great Britain took possession of Egypt, there were keen-sighted seers who foresaw the day when God would use the Anglo-Saxon peoples to restore Jerusalem. When the war broke out, there were some of us who were convinced that it would never end until Turkish tyranny was forever a thing of the past in the Holy City. When the city was captured, we felt very confident we could put one hand upon this great event which had stirred the heart of the whole Christian world, and, laying open our Bible at many places in the Prophets, say as confidently as Peter on the day of Pentecost, 'This is that which was spoken by the prophets.'

again sack Rome, but not one of us could with any assurance put our finger upon any text of Scripture and say it was so written. Constantinople might fall, and a babel of voices would be heard among our prophets. But when Jerusalem was captured, we all said with one consent, 'This is the climax of the ages.' We have entered a prophetic era. We are looking upon the things which Moses and the prophets, and Christ Himself have foretold.

"The capture of Jerusalem is not the end, but the beginning. Now, if the hour of the passing of the Turk from Palestine has come, it means great things to the Promised Land. It marks the beginning of the end of the desolation. It means also the beginning of the end of the dispersion.

"Again the capture of Jerusalem indicates that we are at the beginning of the end of the declaration of the gospel. The capture of Jerusalem also meant the defeat of German design. And finally, the capture of Jerusalem marked the beginning of the end of all imperialism."

"The capture of Jerusalem is more than a prophetic event—it is a pivot in prophecy. The Germans might enter Paris and we would weep; but, desperate as that event would be, it would only be an incident in the great panorama of the ages. The flags we love might be carried into Berlin, and how we would rejoice! But even that would only be an incident. The Hun might

HERE is a wonderful opportunity to secure a big, strongly made American flag at way below the cost of manufacture. It will be sent free for the asking, and you can examine it in your own home if you act promptly.

Every good American should show his colors these days. Let "Old Glory" mark your home as one which stands by our President, our army and our navy. Celebrate our victories by displaying this fine symbol of our national unity. Show your flag on holidays, at home-coming celebrations, parades, reunions, and patriotic occasions. Displaying the American flag is the least that we, who must stay at home here, can do to endorse the men who are leading us to final triumph, and the principles we are fighting for. Let this big flag tell the world how you stand at this great moment of our country's history.

Don't Send a Penny—See the Flag First

TO MAKE sure of your flag you must ask for it now. Our supply is limited, and when our present stock is gone it is certain we cannot obtain more at the old, low price at which we contracted for these.

Fill in the coupon printed below and mail it to us. The flag will be sent you at once, prepaid, for examination. If you decide to keep it send us only 50 cents within five days of receipt of the flag and one dollar a month for three months, making $3.50 in all. We advise you to decide quickly to take advantage of the opportunity.

Upon receipt of the first payment your subscription to the Christian Herald is entered at once for the period of one year, 52 issues. If you are now a subscriber, your subscription will be extended for one year beyond date of expiration. The regular subscription price of the Christian Herald is $2.00 a year (and will be $2.50 after January 1, 1919), so you will readily realize what a bargain this combination offer is. You not only get this big 4x6 foot American flag with double-stitched stripes, but you receive 52 weekly issues of the Christian Herald.

Christian Herald, 5099 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Send me, all charges prepaid, for examination, the large American flag advertised. If I keep it I will send fifty cents within five days, and $1.00 per month thereafter for three months, a total of $3.50, which will pay for the flag as well as one full year's subscription (52 issues) to the Christian Herald, which I am to start receiving at once. If I do not keep the flag I will send it back within five days at your expense. I incur no other obligation in mailing this coupon.

Germany Must Make Atonement

AT a recent meeting of the members and congregation of the First Baptist Church of Baltimore, Md., Mr. Richard H. Edmonds, a member present, submitted a statement setting forth the crimes committed by Germany against civilization, international law, humanity and religion in the present war. The statement proceeded:

"As Germany and its allies now see that they are inevitably doomed to defeat, since civilization is greater than barbarism, and since the powers of heaven are greater than the powers of hell, we may expect a continuation of the efforts of Germany and Austria and Turkey and Bulgaria to seek peace without punishment. They will use every influence in this and other countries to create a sickly, mawkish, neurotic sentiment against the punishment of criminals. They are already moving in every possible way to bring about a peace which would leave their crimes unpunished and permit them to prepare for another war.

"In view of these facts we desire to place upon record our earnest appeal to the President of the United States, and to Congress, that no word of peace shall be uttered in this country until Germany and its allies have unconditionally surrendered their armies and their navies; and we earnestly pray that in justice to all the civilization of the centuries to come, in justice to the millions who have died upon the battle-field in defense of civilization, in justice to the outraged women and the mangled children, that President Wilson will insist that there shall be no peace until after an unconditional surrender, and until the leading criminals have with their lives paid for their fearful crimes. Unless this be done, civilization would place a premium upon crime and give encouragement for other wars by showing that it did not have the moral backbone to inflict punishment upon those responsible for the most awful war which the world has ever known.

"In view of these facts the First Baptist Church of Baltimore desires to place upon its records this paper, and authorize its officials to send a copy of it to the President of the United States, to the Senators and Representatives from Maryland, and to furnish a copy to the daily papers of this city. And we call upon every church in the land to recognize that in this, the greatest moral issue which the world has ever faced, it is the solemn duty of the Church of God to record its opposition to any peace with the blackest criminals in human history until Germany and its allies have made, as far as is humanly possible, atonement for their crimes."

The statement and recommendations were adopted as the sentiment of the First Baptist Church. Mr. Edmonds, the author of the statement, writes to the Christian Herald: "This war issue is preeminently a religious issue. Unless civilization punishes the criminals, it will put a premium upon crime. As I view the matter, it is absolutely the duty of the religious leaders of this country to voice, through church action or otherwise, their determination that this war shall not end until those who have been guilty of these awful crimes have paid the penalty for their crimes, just exactly as society necessarily punishes the individual murderer or outlaw. Germany is the greatest criminal in human history, and unless it be punished we might as well abolish all punishment for individual crimes."

Coal Economy for the Household

TALKING to a representative gathering of men who are to assist the Fuel Administration, Van H. Manning, director of the Bureau of Mines, said concerning the economical use of fuel: "Americans have been as wasteful of coal as of other resources, largely because coal has been abundant. To many consumers it has seemed hardly worth while to give time and thought to the saving of coal. . . . Coal is the foundation stone of industry. . . . Without it transportation facilities must stand still. One man's careless and wasteful use may mean an idle factory or a cold house for his neighbor. With the world looking to us largely for its coal supply . . . the consumer of coal must pause and give serious consideration to the problem which confronts the country.

"If the consumers can be aroused to an intelligent consideration of the burning of coal, they can begin to save ten per cent. of the production (600,000,000 tons) at once. . . . About fifteen million people shovel the twenty per cent. of our coal used for domestic purposes. Only about two hundred and fifty thousand firemen shovel the sixty per cent. of our coal used by power plants and railroads. . . . The householder must realize that when he throws a shovelful of anthracite coal into his furnace its value is equivalent to half a pound of sugar, or half a loaf of bread or a pint of milk. He must appreciate that it is worth while to examine his house and to overhaul his heating equipment. Weather strips, double windows, pipe coverings, clean flues and chimneys and tight fittings in ash-pit, doors, dampers and furnace parts will all pay. Damper control is one of the chief secrets of economical heating. Clean surfaces are most essential, a soot is a poorer conductor of heat than asbestos. Care, attention, and taking pains will be the greatest factors in saving domestic coal."

Get More Eggs On Less Feed

Egg prices this winter will undoubtedly be the highest in the world's history. Those who know how to feed to get winter eggs will reap enormous profits, while improper methods mean a loss.

Prof. T. E. Quisenberry, one of the world's greatest poultry authorities and President of the American Poultry School, Box 1012, Leavenworth, Kansas, has issued a 16-page bulletin on "How and What to Feed For Heavy Egg Production and to Cut the Cost of Feed." This Bulletin will be mailed Free to interested readers, while they last. Hundreds of hens fed and cared for under Prof. Quisenberry's direction have laid 200 to 298 eggs per year, while the normal production according to U. S. Government reports is 60 to 80 eggs per year. Write today for your copy of this valuable Bulletin. (Advertisement.)

FOOD DIRECTOR HOOVER has been quoted as speaking of "sugar glut-tony," yet has failed to top the one source of that glut-tony. That is in light candy manufacture. That's where the useless glut-tony begins—and continues; hence the sugarless families of the country.

The remedy: Stop at once the use of all white cane and beet sugars in confectionery and cake-baking. This will still allow the manufacturer ample latitude—only his confections will have a slightly deeper or rowner color.

Then there will be enough white sugar to go round all the families of the land!

The word sugar does not occur once in Holy Writ: yet the source of our sugar of today is referred to in Gen. 6:20—"The sweet cane from a far country." By Alexander the Great's time (330 B. C.) it was already well known in the Levant.

Families living at or near populous centers having exotic colonies can (lacking American or domestic sugars) resort to the aliens' own grocery stores—be they Mongol, Japanese, Arab, or Indasian—and get sugar fairly a plenty. Due to the greater distance of transport, and freight-scarcity, these long-distance sugars usually carry a slight price advance over our own sugars. But there—the problem is to get cane or beet sugars at all; and folks who are paying around 18 cents for a pound can of condensed milk for its sugar content as a sweetener in lieu of sugar are paying for about half-moisture or water, or at the rate of some 35 cents per pound of the equivalent in dry white sugar!

Then there are the crude panocha slab-sugars and aspadura cones and muscovado brown-black sugars (centrifugal raws), obtainable at Iberic-American grocery stores; the cactus solid and melon invert sugars of Mexico, etc.

WE do not trouble to illustrate in this paper any of the well-known cane or beet sugars, or even the maple sugars; they are all too familiar. We limit ourselves to the scant-known in sugardom; even the cane sugar bars and slabs and beet cones are excluded, because fairly familiar since many decades; also the tuber mass-sugars and invert-sugars of the central European despotisms.

The Ever-Full Sugar Bowl

By

The maize sugars of Western America are a most creditable product, obtainable in bars, slabs, granulated, icing-sugar forms, and as a limpid invert-sugar. The color of the solid-form maize sugars ranges from yellow to cream-white, according to number (degree of refinement). They are less sweet than the sorghum, palm, date, raisin or cane sugars; around 65 points compared to the others at 100 points, but are eminently useful as an economizer on other sugars, as for preserving, in pastries, cakes, breadstuffs, etc.

Another scant-known American sugar, always obtainable in Manhattan, New Orleans, Chicago, and other big centers, is the mesquite-bean invert-sugar of the Rio Grande region of Texas and Mexico. It is also a common sugar among the natives of the tropic isles of the Pacific, under local names, as shushel, karofa, aloroba, etc.

THE sucre-de-miel (or sugar made from honey) of the French is just the plain centrifugally-separated crystallizable portion of honey, the residue remaining as an invert-sugar permanently. The dry honey-sugar, at its best, is cleanly and non-sticky to handle, of light-straw color, and with a fragrant honey-like aroma. A similar honey-sugar of the Hellenes has the fragrance of orange-blossoms, due to the flower-food of the bees. It is obtainable of Greek importers.

Asia contributes the greater part of the world's sugar supply, but it is almost all consumed by the respective nationalities; the little that is exported is a negligible factor. Hence, in sugar statistics, while Cuba and tropical America are quoted at so many million tons annually, and Europe, with its beet sugars, at so many millions more, there is scant mention of Asia as a sugar-producer, although it actually turns out more sugar (counting under all heads, as sorghum, palm, fruit, date, infia, cereal, etc., sugars) than the western hemisphere and continental Europe combined. This is, for all Asia (including Nippon and Indasia and east of the Nile region), calculated at about fifteen million metric tons annually.

A GLANCE at the illustrations will reveal the preponderance of Asia in sugar variety. We see depicted the national sugar of Japan, called mizu-ami (rice-sugar), familiar to all missionaries in the inland-sea country; the date sugar of the Nile region, and east to the Euphrates-Tigris valleys of historic memory; the palm-sugar of Indasia and the Indian Ocean region; the sorghum bars and tablet sugar and fruit sugar slabs of China, and the carob bean invert-sugar of Asia Minor.

Then there are—not illustrated, however—the raisin and currant sugars of the Holy Land; the barley cereal and wheat sugars of Korea; the fig sugars of the Izmir region and Palestine and Syria, which are made and used direct chiefly by farming communities for their own use; the iageri and gur and manit tree sugars raised on the Ganges delta and overland to Persia, and the infia sugars of Arabia.

A Mongol beet invert-sugar is on sale in this country since the past half-century at Asiatic grocery stores. I never knew it to be unobtainable. At one time the notion prevailed that beet sugar was a European innovation; but this is erroneous. The Mongols have made it for many generations. The native name is ge-hau (pronounced ge-ho).

The pictures accompanying this article have been made direct from the actual sugars, rounded up by the writer amid Manhattan's alien colony quarters.

BEFORE the United States enlisted in the Great Crusade, many American citizens joined the armies of liberation under the various flags, and not a few of them have paid their faith with the blood of martyrdom. Among these was Theodore Campbell, Conway, Ark., who enlisted in the Canadian Army on February 12, 1917, and met a hero's death in France. His fellow townsmen recently held a memorial service in his honor.

NOT all the war heroes who make the supreme sacrifice fall on the fields of France. Their graves are found in all countries where the Allied flags wave, from Newfoundland to Newfoundland. One of these was Cadet Maurice M. Milne, of Malone, N. Y., who enlisted in the Royal Flying Corps of the Canadian Army and lost his life in the line of duty, at the age of twenty-one years. He had about completed his course in training at the aviation field in Armour Heights, Ontario, and expected to leave soon for service in France. On the morning of his death he started a flight and had reached a height of 600 feet, when his plane collided with another. Both machines fell to the earth, causing the instant death of Cadet Milne and his fellow aviator.

In a letter written to his wife and parents and found on his person when he was picked up on the field, he said that he had had a presentiment of death, and requested that the letter be forwarded to his family.

DR. E. B. SERVICE, pastor of the First Methodist Church, Little Falls, Minn., received the degree of D.D. from the Oskaloosa College, Oskaloosa, Iowa, recently.

IN Arizona a new mission station has been opened under the direction of H. Dudley Peck, a student at McCormick Theological Seminary, sent out by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions. He had to travel 110 miles from the railroad to reach his first station at Chin Lee. With his interpreter Mr. Peck often walked ten to twenty miles a day, preaching along the way. During one month he walked 200 miles to reach those Indians who needed the Gospel. Arrangements are now being made to put up buildings and make a real mission station. The Navajo people are increasing rapidly, and their need of the Gospel is great, for there are 32,500 of this growing tribe.

ONE of the members of the Executive Committee of the World's Sunday School Association recently subscribed for a life membership in the Association, $1,000, payable one-third each year for three years. Rev. Joseph Clark, D.D., of the New York State Sunday School Association, has been made a life member by a friend, who testified to his appreciation of Dr. Clark's services by the payment of the necessary $1,000. Dr. Clark is well known to Sunday school workers by his nom de plume of "Timothy Standby."

BESIDES contributing to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union for the purchase of ambulances, field kitchens, etc., and making Red Cross supplies for the soldiers over seas, and supplying hospital comforts to Camp Dodge, Iowa, has a special work which has been officially endorsed by the State Council of Defense. At Fort Des Moines is established one of the reconstruction hospitals of the United States. Already some of the broken men from France have been received there for care and treatment. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Iowa has already furnished a Home Center reception room, presided over by a tactful and gifted woman whom the boys call "Hospital Mother," fitting up a library, supplying 100 fans for the wards, and hospital comforts of any kind that a mother's heart might suggest.

THE ministers and membership of the Presbyterian churches of the "southern tier" and elsewhere in New York State received a genuine surprise recently when the Chemung County, New York Presbytery, after a lengthy discussion and some opposition, granted Mrs. William H. Chapman of Elmira, N. Y., a license to preach the Gospel. This overturned the long-established precedent of the Presbyterian Church.

Rev. Mrs. Chapman has accepted the pulpit of the North Presbyterian Church in Elmira, while the pastor has been engaged in Y. M. C. A. war work in France. She has traveled much abroad, is well educated, and was a high school teacher in Elmira, W. H. W.

Columbia Grafonola

CARMEN

THE greatest operatic music was beautiful before it was great—and Columbia Records bring you the best of that magical beauty. Haunting melodies, exquisite catches and snatches of song, music of joy and of laughter, glorious marches, the fanfare of trumpets, majestic choruses—all that and more have Columbia Records.

SUCH great artists as Lazaro, Stracciari, Barrientos and Mardones make records exclusively for Columbia. But the music they choose for recording is always the truly great music of beautiful and inspiring melody. Beautiful melody—that is the distinguishing quality of Columbia Records and the Columbia Grafonola. Music you really like, played as you really like to hear it—that's what they give you always.

Complete Teuton Collapse at Hand

HERBERT ASQUITH, former British Prime Minister, in a speech in Glasgow on November 1, said, "At the outbreak of the war the greater part of Europe and a large part of Asia paid allegiance to three Emperors. Where are these Emperors today? One, whom we should remember as our good and faithful ally, has been deposed and murdered by his people. The Austrian Emperor, to all intents and purposes, is a waif, a stray. The third, at that time the most formidable figure of all, now is said to be hovering on the verge of abdication. We may say with confidence that the war has buried, beyond hope of resurrection, autocracy and its satellite, militarism."

The Central Empires on November 1 no longer rested as a potent military force. Bulgaria was practically occupied by Allied troops. Belgrade, and thus Serbia, was free of German and Austrian soldiers. Turkey had surrendered, the Dardanelles were open, the Allies could move at once to free Rumania and beleaguered Russia by a route more direct than through frozen Siberia. (The terms of Turkey's surrender are printed later in this article.) Austria was breaking up into a number of socialistic republics, with capitals established at Agram, Vienna, Budapest and Prague. Emperor Carl, ordering his army not to resist popular movements, moved toward peace. This he was not far from, for on November 1 General Diaz had communicated the terms of surrender to the commanders of the beaten Austrian armies, who accepted them on November 3, Austria ceasing to be a combatant at 3 P. M. of November 4. As for Germany, it was announced on November 1 that the Versailles Conference had practically agreed on the terms of the armistice, but that these would not be made public until Germany had acted on them. All information available, both from Allied capitals and from German sources, indicated that whatever the terms, Germany would accept.

WHEN Bulgaria, her armies broken and her people threatening open rebellion, threw herself into the mercy of the Allies, military men said that the end of the war was in sight, that it only remained to mop up the rest of the once powerful Central European alliance. Opinions as to the time to be allotted to the mopping up varied, but events have since moved rapidly. Cut off from Germany and from war supplies by the same stroke, Turkey held on in the grim hope that the senior partner in the Plunderbund would succeed in selling out at a sacrifice not too great. But the steady advance of General Allenby brought the final day rapidly nearer, and the taking of Aleppo struck the hour. It only remained for Turkey to send one more frantic note, declaring her thorough agreement with all President Wilson had set down as a basis for peace, and then, with her armies everywhere in retreat, she sought the way out.

Releasing the British commander who had surrendered at Kut-el-Amara, General Townshend, Turkey sent him to the British naval commander in the Aegean, Admiral Sir George Cave, to open negotiations for an armistice. Admiral Cave sent back word that if Turkey would send properly accredited plenipotentiaries, he was authorized to inform them of the conditions on which the Allies would agree to stop hostilities. The envoys arrived at Mudros, on the island of Lemnos, early in the week of October 27, and on October 31 the announcement was made that Turkey had, in effect, signed an unconditional surrender. Although the terms were not at once made public, it was permitted to be known that they effectively neutralized Turkey, provided for the surrender of her armies, the occupation of the Dardanelles forts and the opening of the straits to the vessels of the Allies, who were thereby enabled to enter the Black Sea and deal with the Germanized Russian fleet. The mopping up was proceeding.

Turkey is mentioned here first only because she was first to take final action. Austria, too, on October 31 was rapidly approaching the necessary point of surrender. That is, all there was left of Austria was so proceeding. Austria, always a nondescript aggregation of peoples bound together by arbitrary power, had in the month of October developed fully all the centrifugal forces dormant within her.

October 31 saw Bohemia ablaze with the enthusiasm of a new-found freedom, for Bohemia was free! Austria had turned over all governmental functions to the Czech government, and the streets of Prague were gay with bunting and resounded with the acclaim of citizens hailing the new republic of Czecho-Slovakia. The Czechs had cut the Berlin-Vienna railway, a part of the once Berlin-to-Bagdad route, and trains could

Red Triangle "Sky Piloting"

By
D. C. VANDERCOOK

TONIGHT we sleep up here in the improvised second story in the rear of an old barn. The rats were still gnawing as I sank into oblivion. Soon after midnight booming guns awakened us. Far up the street a voice shouted "Gas! Gas!" Immediately the Klaxon began its unearthly screech. Three shots were fired. Dazedly I sat up on one elbow and tried to get into my gas mask.

"You have seven seconds to get it on," the sergeant had said three days before when eight Red Triangle men went through the gas chamber. One quick thrust, the half-a-bag slipped off my chin. The bands would not go over my head. Tried again, more slowly. The nasty clothes-pin burned my nostrils. The hard rubber mouthpiece did not seem to work rightly, for the cheeks of the mask steadily flopped in and out like bellows. I was in a cold, clammy sweat. Peering through the goggle-eyes, I felt like a monster. Angriily I snatched the mask off; might as well die one way as another. Next time it worked like a charm. So I laid my head upon a shoe-pillow, biting the hard rubber till my jaws ached, and breathing loud enough to be heard above the enemy's guns. "Wearing a gas mask is one of the sensations of the war," said a lieutenant governor in Red Triangle service. You're always glad when it's over, as it was within thirty minutes last night. Often these hideous things must be endured for hours.

That was a wonderful ride this morning through the great forest carpeted with dead leaves but clean of underbrush like a park ready for a picnic. Here and there were zigzagging old trenches, newly repaired, wicked-looking barbed-wire fences, and old caves and dugouts. Everybody seemed to know the rider of long-eared Jack. All were implored not to stop him, for he might not care to start again. Two days ago, before an audience of hilarious doughboys, he had backed up the steps of the hotel on the busiest corner. It was after ten when we sank deeper into the woods, soon coming upon a small nest of dugouts whose log, cement block and dirt-covered roofs reared halfway out of the ground.

"Here comes that Jew peddler again," joked a lieutenant in his early twenties. This division is reported to average under twenty years.

"Want any razor blades this morning?" retorted the Y-man, lifting his saddle bags off. The lieutenant was hussaband a fiery brick-red beard and mustache.

"Beaucoup camouflage for him," laughed one of the gun crew, finding a seat among the others gathering about the table where the circuit rider to the big guns was spreading out his wares.

Plainly the coming of the Y-man was one of the lighter moments of a tense day. These youngsters were always waiting, always expecting something to happen: often anticipation is worse than realization. Ten days before several of their mates had been "out o' luck." Word of it had been sent to the Y-man, and he had followed the wounded into divisional headquarters' hospital. This morning he had news about them. Far from any railroad, with Monday's newspapers reaching them Wednesday or Thursday, for three days against the attacks of General Diaz, which on October 31 had completely broken their defensive positions and had cut the railways in the rear of the western two-thirds of their front, while their troops between the mountains and the sea were also threatened with envelopment or destruction.

With her only remaining army thus compromised, what was left of Austria appealed on October 29 to the Italian military authorities for an armistice and peace. General Diaz at first refused to receive the request, but later heard it and referred it to the Versailles Conference, then in session drawing up the terms of an armistice to be presented to Germany. The Austrian General Weber, with a deputation, was received in the Italian lines.

Italy was reported to be inclined to drive the Austrians completely off her soil before talking armistice; while Austria, exhausted, disintegrating, could only extricate her shattered armies as best she might, while pleading for a listening ear. It was recognized in Germany that Austria was forced to the course she was taking, the paper Vorwärts of Berlin declaring editorially that Austria was powerless to fight longer and that Germany's position, with Austria out of the field, was hopeless. The Hamburger Fremdenblatt, however, declared that Germany, with or without allies, would not permit herself "to be handled as Bulgaria was handled."

While these interrelated events were hastening the stage settings of peace on the Teutonic side, the Allied representatives, meeting at Versailles, and in the home of Colonel House in Paris, were rapidly agreeing on the necessities of peace and were drawing up the terms of the armistice for which Germany has asked. No reliable outline of these terms could be gathered from the various reports that filtered through from correspondents, whose guesses tallied fairly well but bore no semblance of authority.

The terms of the armistice signed with Turkey were made public on November 1; they took no all were hungry for the latest "snow" or rum. How were the Allies making it? Did Fritz have ten divisions to throw against this one?

"He was going to start something last night," we were told. "We were up most the night for him. . . . No, it wasn't much he gave. It's likely he'll wait now, thinking he can surprise us."

"But he can't," with positive assurance the Red Triangle man spoke to them. Their chins lifted and their jaws set grimly. "You'll give him times as good as you get. . . . Has the Straburg Express gone in yet this morning?" They grinned. "Will you flag it for me?" They didn't think they could; they preferred to see the ship go straight on over into Germany.

So they joked and jollied. They bickered good-naturedly about the price of his goods; commented freely about his lean mule; tried to sell him gum, chocolate, matches, cookies and soap. They gave orders for towels and saps to be brought up on his next trip; they ordered back watches to be repaired. When their teness had given way to a cheerier relaxation, a preacher led me twenty-five feet below ground into the sap where these boys lived last winter. Many a time he had spoken to them like a fat as they lay in water-soaked blankets in the little rooms where more water was dripping down on them, "but never a word of complaint."

Later, Jack picked his way out between duds, great shell-holes, tall and stark stub trees twisted off by seventy-fives. Beyond a boneyard of a glorious forest, beyond the of sear and crinkly leaves burned by gas fuel, we stopped in a little clearing to pick a few strawberries before taking up the trail through a field of long grass, buttercups, daisies, brilliant red poppies to the next gun emplacement.

Everywhere we found American pluck good cheer. Everywhere the Red Triangle was welcomed like a friend who shares their life. One night when Fritz was busiest, the Triangle man had gone out to this second pit.

"What you doing out here when you die have to come?" they asked.

"Oh, lads, I couldn't sleep, thinking of out here."

"Well, anyway, we're glad you've come," confided.

(No wonder the boys understand and love to confide in the Red Triangle man who thus lives them, shares their perils, ministers to the wound, thinks first and last and all the time of their comfort. And no wonder the parents of boys, who know of these things, intend to see the Y. M. C. A. has the money needed to keep grand work going at top speed.—Ed.)

account of political or economic questions, but confined wholly to the placing of Turkey where could not again resist. The terms may be summarized as follows:

The Dardanelles are to be opened and the Dardanelles Bosphorus forts occupied by the Allies; the positions mine fields are to be indicated and assistance given in removing these obstructions; all Allied prisoners of war are to be released; the Turkish army is to be demobilized; all Turkish vessels of war are to be surrendered and the Allies are to have the right to occupy strategic ports where necessary; the Allies are to have free use of Turkish ports and anchorages, arsenals and repair facilities, which is to be denied to enemy shipping; the Allies are to occupy the Taurus Tunnel system; Turkish troops are to be drawn from northern Persia and Transcaucasia; all Turkish wire and wireless communications are to be held by the Allies; no military or commercial material is to be destroyed; an Allied officer is to be attached to the Turkish Ministry of Supplies; Turkish officers in Tripolitania and Cyrenaica are to be surrendered to the nearest Italian garrison and all ports are to be surrendered; all Turkish garrisons in Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia are to be surrendered; all Germans and Austrians, military and civilians, are to be evacuated from Turkish dominions within one month; Turkish prisoners are to be kept at the disposal of the Allies; Turkey must maintain all relations with the Central Powers; in case of disorder in Armenia the Allies will occupy such part of Armenia as may be necessary; hostilities to cease at noon of October 31.

Vienna joined the ranks of the capitals of new republics on October 30, when the National Assembly accepted a constitution in which there was no room for a crown, while the officers and soldiers of the former army organized a committee to conduct demobilization. Here, as in Budapest and Prague at Agram, the imperial cockade was torn from the helmet, the imperial colors gave place to the new colors of a free people, and Victor Adler, socialist leader, a few months ago threatened with execution because of his opposition to the Government, became not proceed beyond the German frontier. Everywhere Austrian soldiers were tearing from their uniforms the insignia of the empire, while the Austrian double eagle was gaily trampled under foot.

In Hungary, at Budapest, similar scenes prevailed. The Hungarian Diet took over the administration of affairs, declaring independence of any crown; the people rioted and paraded in the streets and mobbed and robbed stores; the soldiers tore the imperial cockades from their caps and wore the revolutionary colors, and the imperial standard was torn from the parliament house. The troops acted with the newly formed Hungarian National Assembly and a council of officers and soldiers was established. Hungary was free, and free Hungary was reported to be hurrying to get a good seat at the council table of peace.

At Agram, in southern Hungary, in the territory where Croats and Slovenes predominate, another council was sitting, a congress of Jugo-Slavs, at which the independence of Croatia, Slavonia and Dalmatia was proclaimed, and Jugo-Slav regiments fought sanguinary battles with a few Hungarian regiments which had refused to join the revolutionaries. On October 31 the streets of Agram were gay with bunting in National and Allied colors, and the people, so long under the iron rule of Austria, were celebrating their long-dreamed-of freedom. Meantime Jugo-Slav volunteers with the Serbian army were helping to drive the disorganized army of Austria out of Serbia, and were approaching their native soil. The Hungarian Diet recognized the independence of Croatia and Dalmatia; and Fiume, the principal seaport in Dalmatia, was in the hands of Croatian troops.

As if this were not enough, it was reported that Austrian regiments in many places were disbanding. And yet, with all this disorganization behind them, the Austrian armies facing Italy had fought stoutly

Albania Pleads for Freedom

By WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD, Secretary of The Balkan Relief Fund

Epa Shemsi, head dervish of a sect of Albanian Mohammedans

NOW that the military forces of Austria-Hungary have retired from Albania as the result of the combined sea and land operations of the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy, it is practicable to put into operation immediately President Wilson's gospel of the self-determination of small peoples. Freed from the domination of the Central Powers, Albania, first among the lesser nations, is ready for self-government.

Albania is entitled to an independent national existence for these reasons: That she is the oldest nation in Europe; that she fought for independence from Turkish rule for nearly five hundred years, and that at the outbreak of the present war she actually had a national existence and a government created, recognized and supported by five of the powers of Europe.

In her struggle upward from the darkness of ignorance of the Middle Ages, Albania can look only to the free peoples of the Western democracy for guidance and help; first because she is in a position, financially or otherwise, to undertake the work, and second, because the United States alone, of all the nations, went into the war not in direct self-defense or for the fulfillment of treaty obligations, but from motives of pure altruism.

The Republic of Albania should be proclaimed, because the Albanians themselves desire a republican form of government modeled on the government of the United States. Men of Albanian birth now living in the United States have caught the inspiration of our American civilization; they have learned our language; they have attended our night schools; they have developed habits of thrift and industry; they have become skilled in various lines of manufacture; they have fitted themselves to become valuable assets to the citizenship of the United States, and they have kept alive in their hearts that love of motherland which, in due season, will lead them back to the peaks of their birth, where their enlightened enthusiasm, their broadened intelligence and their American industrial skill will give to Albania that upward impetus that will place her upon an equality with the nations of Western Europe, where she belongs.

There are in the United States sixty thousand young men of Albanian birth. I have met and spoken to hundreds of them. During the past ten years not one Albanian in the United States has so fallen into dissolute or unthrifty ways as to become the recipient of public charity.

As in the case of the Philippines, the control of the United States over the affairs of Albania could be undertaken until a new generation has grown up to carry on the work of government along the lines of advanced Western civilization. To give over the government of the new Albania to the pashas, beys, kumkams and mukhtars still remaining as the dogs of the old Turkish misrule, would be a crime against civilization that a hundred years would not obliterate. In delimiting the boundaries of the new Albania, difficulties will arise unless President Wilson's declaration of principles be adhered to with unyielding firmness. The nations surrounding Albania may claim large areas of territory populated exclusively by Albanians; but, if the frontiers be fixed on racial lines, these claims may be ignored. A delimitation based on racial lines would include Lake Ochrida and the towns of Struga, Dibra and Djakova, which were left outside by the Treaty of London after the last Balkan war.

That Albania should be carved up and distributed among the surrounding nations, or that she should be controlled by any individual neighbor, according to rumors of a secret treaty entered into before the United States went to war, is unthinkable. Our President set aside that plan—if plan there was—when he made declaration against the distribution of small nations among their covetous neighbors.

Albania does not need deliberative public bodies, long-drawn-out legislative discussions or political combinations. She needs just these few plain things:

- (a) Food for the starving.
- (b) Employment for all able-bodied men.
- (c) Wagon roads. Most of the employment for the first year or two could be given in the construction of roads.
- (d) Oxen, farming implements and seeds.
- (e) Instruction in modern methods of farming, whereby the present normal yield of food crops may be quadrupled.
- (f) Tanneries, shoe factories, glove factories, woolen mills.
- (g) Development of natural resources, including coal, copper and asphalt.
- (h) Primary schools. I put schools last because schools may not be required in Albania for five or six years. Most of the little children are dead of starvation.

ALBANIA does not need anything more. Give to her these things at the hands of an intelligent governor-general actuated by love of his work and see what miracle of improvement is possible with new seed and modern methods of cultivation. Cornmeal, ground by the housewife between two stones, is the principal article of food. Corn bread sprinkled with coarse salt is almost the only dinner dish with nine-tenths of the population.

Many thousands of young men of Albanian birth, now living in the United States, work in shoe factories in New England and St. Louis. Other thousands are in woolen mills. These men can make shoes and woolen goods in Albania quite as skilfully as in the United States. At their hands the raw products of Albania can be transferred into manufactured goods for export. Electric power for the operation of these factories can be generated from mountain streams and rivers almost anywhere in Albania. There is enough water power going to waste at the Falls of the Drin to turn every spindle, every loom, and every shoe machine in Albania, and with abundant power to spare. Albania will never need the coal deposits in her mountains, because water power is cheaper than coal, but the coal may be mined for export. That there is coal in Albania I know, because I have seen its outcroppings in the mountains. Blacksmiths use it in their forges; but, for some unknown reason, the people prefer to burn wood in their houses, although wood is scarce.

Roman Catholic priests of Shkodra have assured me that there is copper in the mountains of the north. Asphalt I have seen piled up for export at Vlona.

Albanians have offered to show to me springs or seepages of petroleum; but I have not made any investigation.

IT is impossible to find words adequate to a description of the present conditions in Albania and the need for quick and sympathetic action in her behalf. My own work for the relief of suffering there began in October, 1913, nearly a year before the outbreak of the present war. The need then was due to the destruction of 125 Albanian villages by the military forces of Serbia. During the first half of 1914 the Greeks advanced northward through Epirus, in Southern Albania, and destroyed 250 villages. Half a million Albanians were made homeless during those two years. Twenty thousand were killed, and possibly a quarter of a million died of starvation. Added to these horrors there were three consecutive years of crop failures—two due to dry weather and one to excessive rains. Then, in December, 1915, came hordes of Serbians retreating across Albania before the military forces of Austro-Hungary, Germany and Bulgaria. The Austrians occupied Durazzo in February, 1916, and subsequently controlled by common sense and she will rise from desolation and a twelfth century state of civilization and take an honorable place among the nations of Western Europe. Her people are of Western stock the same as ourselves. They are not of Eastern origin, like the Armenians and Syrians.

This is a job for a man who can grasp the opportunity to lift two million human beings out of darkness and ignorance into the light of Western civilization, and who will work night and day to accomplish his task.

Aside from the giving of food to the starving and employment to able-bodied men, the thing of first importance is the building of roads. I have traveled 450 miles through the interior of Albania. In all that distance, I have ridden in a wagon only twenty-five miles. During my journeys I was compelled to go 150 miles on foot, because the mountain trails were too perilous for even the sure-footed mountain pony.

For the construction of roads a first-class highway engineer from the United States would be needed, together with a bridge engineer and a gang of bridge builders. The work of road-building could be carried on during the entire winter season, so that, by planting-time in the spring, the task of introducing better methods of agriculture could be undertaken with the aid of wheeled vehicles instead of the backs of donkeys.

AT one time I sent shipments of seed corn to Albania; but the outbreak of the war prevented me from giving personal attention to the experiment. When I say that the average yield of corn in Albania is approximately six bushels to the acre, anyone will

Americans and Italians Smash Foe Lines

DURING a week when peace seemed to be constantly more certain to be soon achieved, the Allied armies continued their well-aimed blows at the military establishments of the enemy. The Italians, pressing home the advantages won in their offensive on the Piave and the mountain front just west of it, the beginning of which was noted last week, succeeded in completely defeating the Austrian army, in driving a wedge between the armies on the Piave and those to the west and in threatening to capture every Austrian between the Trentino and the sea. From Conegliano, the Italians and British pressed on across various streams tributary to the Livenza, the railway bridge at Conegliano being taken and lost thirty times before the Austrians gave up and withdrew. The important town of Vittorio was taken on October 30, and the Livenza was reached at Sacile on the 31st. Turning north from Vittorio, Italian cavalry pressed through the mountain passes and on the 31st took Porte nelli Alpi, on the upper Piave north of Belluno, cutting the only highway and railroad by which the Austrians on the Asiago plateau and the mountain country west of it could retreat and separating the Austrian armies on the Venetian plains from those in the mountains. The Austrians holding the mountain front were faced with the alternative of surrendering or making an attempt to escape over narrow trails. On November 1, they were surrendering so fast that the prisoners were an embarrassment to the victors and almost blocked the roads by which necessary supplies must follow the advancing armies. With the line cut north of them, the Italians over the Piave as far south as Dona di Piave, and Italian cavalry working around in their rear, the Austrian armies in the plains on November 2 were making the best speed they could toward the Isonzo, having reached the Tagliamento river half-way from the Piave to the Isonzo.

This situation brought a prompt request for an armistice from the Austrian commander. In their precipitate retreat the Austrians left guns, ammunition and stores in profusion, the captured material being estimated as worth several billion lire. On October 31, 1,000 square miles of Italian territory had been retaken.

November 3 will be a day long remembered in Italian history, for it saw Italian soldiers in possession of Trento, the central city of the Trentino, while Italian soldiers and sailors took Trieste and set flying the flag of Savoy above this ancient Italian city which 500 years of oppression had failed to make Austrian. On this day, too, the Austrian commanders in the field, their armies broken, 500,000 men and 5,000 guns ganized than those in the mountain sectors. Italian troops were in Udine, the principal city east of Venice, and the Italian base until the retreat of last year, now wiped out by victory.

THE American troops, which since Sept. 26 have been fighting a daily battle northward along the Meuse, opposing the best troops Germany could bring against them—a fight which when history has given it perspective will live among the greatest achievements of our unbeaten army, came suddenly face to face with complete victory on November 2. On the preceding day, General Pershing having taken one by one the necessary dominating positions, launched an attack in force against the Freya-Stellung line, along which the Germans hind them were soon in French hands. General Pershing's men pressed irresistibly. Massed against them were nine divisions of Germany's best available troops, her Third and Fifth armies. The Americans outnumbered them and every division was fresh and rested and eager. The American artillery fire was greater, from more guns, than any time in the five week's fight and fairly smothered the Huns. The fighting was furious. The Germans made full use of machine-gun defense, counterattacked desperately and did their utmost to obey their orders to hold their lines, but evening saw Pershing's men at Bayonville, an advance of over two miles in the center and numerous villages and woods had been cleared of the enemy. On the following day, November 2, our doughboys smashed through the Freya defenses, swept up to Buzaney, the German base back of this line, and reached the village of Forest over four miles north of the starting-point for the day. On both flanks—the left flank resting on the Forest-Boult, the northern tip of Argonne Forest, and the right on the Meuse—the fight was hand to hand and the German resistance at the ginning almost surmountable. In with Buzaney in possession of the men and the high roads through it and with the French threatening to flank the enemy the Forest through their advance toward from the Austrians the Germans suddenly decided to lost, their situation becoming hourly more critical, signed the rigid terms of the armistice laid down by the Versailles War Council and communicated to them by General Diaz. The terms were not made public until the following day, but it was announced that hostilities would cease at 3 P. M. on November 4. At the time of signing, the Italian armies were advancing everywhere in the mountain region, while on the plains they had crossed the Tagliamento against vigorous resistance, the Austrian armies here being less disorganized than those in the mountain sectors. At the same time General Gouraud's French army struck northward from Vouziers along a front facing the Aisne, which here runs northwestward. General Gouraud's engineers threw several bridges over the river north of Vouziers, the Germans not resisting for some unexplained reason until the bridges were completed and troops had crossed. Then they concentrated the whole force of their artillery on the French, but were too late and the villages of Semuy and Vandy with the important heights be-ting was possible and the units on the left flank, about noon, found themselves unopposed. Pressing forward as fast as they could, they were unable to find one to fight. Calling for motor trucks, the doughboys piled in, mounted machine guns on the hoods and dashed northward as fast as high power and bad roads would permit, but up to evening of the 2nd they had not caught up with the fast retreating enemy.

November 3 did not furnish General Pershing's men with time enough

NOVEMBER 5 marked the election of a complete National House of Representatives and one third of the Senate, while Governors were to be elected in 31 States, Woman Suffrage was before the voters in Louisiana, Oklahoma and Michigan and Prohibition in Minnesota, Florida, Ohio, Oregon and Wyoming. Both parties closed the campaign confident of victory. On November 6 the returns were as yet incomplete, but it appeared probable that the next House of Representatives would have a working majority of Republicans, while in the Senate a Republican majority of four was indicated. Henry Ford probably failed of election to the Senate from Michigan, Truman H. Newberry, Republican, winning by about half the normal Republican majority. Senator James Hamilton Lewis, Democrat, many times the President's spokesman in the Senate, was defeated in Illinois by Congressman Medill McCormick. Kansas, where Progressivism rent the Republican party to Democracy's advantage, returned to her old allegiance, electing Governor Capper, Senator over Wm. H. Thompson, seeking re-election, and choosing a Republican Governor and a complete Republican delegation to Congress. In Oklahoma Senator Owen, Democrat, appeared to have been defeated in a close election; while in Nebraska Senator Norris was carried to election in a Republican sweep which gave the State a Republican Governor for the first time in six years and returned four Republicans and two Democrats to Congress; in Ohio the Democratic candidate for Governor was probably elected in a close contest; in Missouri Joseph W. Folk, Democrat, was probably elected to the Senate; in

The Elections of 1918

Massachusetts David I. Walsh, Democrat, was running a close race with Senator Weeks; Idaho divided her vote, returning Senator Wm. E. Borah, Republican, and John F. Nugent, Democrat; in Montana Thomas J. Walsh, Democrat, was elected over Oscar Lanstrum, Republican, and Jeannette Rankin, running as a Nationalist; Kentucky appeared to have elected Ben L. Bruner, Republican, as Senator; in Minnesota Senator Knute Nelson, Republican, a staunch supporter of the President, was re-elected by a big majority; New Jersey returned two Republicans to the Senate, but added three to her roll of Democratic Congressmen, making her delegation six and six; New Mexico Senator A. B. Fall, Republican, was probably re-elected; in Virginia David Elkins, Republican, appeared to have won the election; Delaware Senator Saulsbury was defeated by L. H. Ball, Republican. There is not room here to recapitulate the results of the voting for national representatives, but at noon, November 6, the probability was that the next House would stand Republicans 228, Democrats 207, a Republican majority of 27. New York State elected a Republican Legislature, but appeared to have chosen a Democratic Governor, Alfred E. Smith.

The vote on Woman Suffrage resulted in its defeat in Louisiana, its probable adoption in Michigan, and probable defeat in Oklahoma.

Prohibition was probably defeated in Minnesota, was defeated by a considerable margin in Ohio, but won by a narrow margin in Florida and by a considerable margin in Wyoming, where Oregon elected a legislature pledged to ratify the national amendment.

A Message from Brave and Unbeaten Belgium

PASTOR P. ERRE BLOMAERT, Belgian Chaplain, chief of the Protestant chaplains in the Belgian army, came to America late in October as a special representative of King Albert, bearing a message from the King to the American people. Next week Miss Sangster will bring us all a special message from Chaplain Blomaert. Next week also W. Livingston Larned leads us back through the years to the

A world is being reborn in these days, crowded with events whose greatness we scarcely appreciate. Next week, Rev. Jas. T. Nichols of Des Moines, Iowa, brings a spiritual message, "The Rebirth of a World."

Next week also the Neighbors will discuss Christmas and Marion Harland will apply her skill to more of the housewife's problems.

The Terms of Austria's Armistice

SECRETARY LANSING announced, at 9 o'clock November 4, that the Allies had unanimously agreed on the terms of the armistice to be offered to Germany, that diplomatic unity had been completely achieved and that the Allies were acting in the utmost harmony. It was reported at the American Government, as the Government approached by Germany, would transmit the terms to her. It was generally expected that she would accept, although some officials indicated the possibility of some further correspondence over details. Secretary Lansing in the note to Germany published herewith, advised her that she must be ready to pay damage done to civilians by her military and naval forces and that the armistice terms were ready and were the hands of Marshal Foch. It was reported on November 6 that an armistice delegation had left Berlin for the front. It was generally held that the terms accepted by Austria's armistice represented the probable minimum which Germany would have to accept. Austria's surrender was complete; the terms in full, made public in the United States on November 4, are as follows:

Military Clauses

ONE—The immediate cessation of hostilities by land, by sea and air.

TWO—Total demobilization of the Austro-Hungarian army and immediate withdrawal of all Austro-Hungarian forces operating on the front from the North Sea to Switzerland. Within Austro-Hungarian territory, limited as in clause three below, there shall only be maintained an organized military force limited to pre-war effectives (effectiveness?). All army artillery and equipment shall be located at points to be indicated by the Allies and United States of America for delivery to them, beginning with all such material as exists in the territories to be evacuated by the Austro-Hungarian forces.

THREE—Evacuation of all territories invaded by Austria-Hungary since the beginning of the war. Withdrawal within such limits as shall be determined by the commander in chief of the Allied forces on each front of the Austro-Hungarian armies behind the fixed as follows:

From Picumbrail to the north of the Stelvio, it will follow the crest of the Rhetian Alps up to the sources of the Adige and the Isarco, passing thence by Mounts Reschen and Brenner and the heights of Oetz and Ischgl. The line thence turns south, crossing the Ischgl and meeting the present frontier of the Carnic Alps. It follows this frontier to Mount Tarvis, and after Mount Tarvis follows the watershed of the Julian Alps by the Col de Predil, Mount Mangart, the Tricorno (Terglout) and the watershed of the Cols di Podberdo, Podisam and Idria. From this point the line turns southeast toward the Schneeberg, excludes the whole basin of the Save and its tributaries. From Schneeberg it goes down toward the coast in such a way as to include Castua, Mattuglia and Tosca in the evacuated territories.

It will also follow the administrative limits of the present province of Dalmatia including the North Lisarica and Trivarska, and, to the south, territory limited by a line from the (migrand) of Cape Planca to the summits of the watersheds toward, so as to include in the evacuated region all the valleys and water courses flowing toward Sebenico, such as the Zrmanja, Krka, Butisnica and their tributaries. It will also include all the islands in the north and west of Dalmatia from Dugi Otok, Selve, Ulbo, Scherda, Maon, Paga and Puntadura to the north up to Meleda in the south, embracing Santandrea, Busi, Lisa, Lesina, Tercola, Curzola, Cazza and Lagosta, as well as the neighboring rocks and islets and passages, only excepting the islands of great and small Zironav Bua, Solta and Brazza. All territory thus evacuated (shall be occupied by the forces?) of the Allies and the United States of America.

All military and railway equipment of all kinds, including coal belonging to or within those territories (to be?) left in situ and surrendered to the Allies, according to special orders given by the commander in chief of the forces of the associated powers on the different fronts. No new destruction, pillage or requisition to be done by enemy troops in the territories to be evacuated by them and occupied by the forces of the associated powers.

FOUR—The Allies shall have the right of free movement over all road and rail and waterways in Austro-Hungarian Seven—The immediate repatriation, without reciprocity, of all Allied prisoners of war and internal subjects of civil populations evacuated from their homes, on conditions to be laid down by the commander in chief of the forces of the associated powers on the various fronts. Sick and wounded who cannot be removed from evacuated territory will be cared for by Austro-Hungarian personnel, who will be left on the spot with the medical material required.

Naval Conditions

ONE—Immediate cessation of all hostilities at sea and definite information to be given as to the location and movements of all Austro-Hungarian ships.

Notification to be made to neutrals that freedom of navigation in all territorial waters is given to the naval and mercantile marine of the Allied and associated powers, all questions of neutrality being waived.

TWO—Surrender to Allies and the United States of fifteen Austro-Hungarian submarines completed between the years 1910 and 1918, and of all German submarines which are in or may hereafter enter Austro-Hungarian territorial waters. All other Austro-Hungarian submarines to be paid off and completely disarmed and to remain under the supervision of the Allies and United States.

THREE—Surrender to Allies and United States with their complete armament and equipment of three battleships, three light cruisers, nine destroyers, twelve torpedo boats, one mine layer, six Danube monitors to be designated by the Allies and United States of America. All other surface warships, including river craft, are to be concentrated in Austro-Hungarian naval bases to be designated by the Allies and United States of America, and are to be paid off and completely disarmed and placed under the supervision of the Allies and United States of America.

FOUR—Freedom of navigation to all warships and merchant ships of Allied and associated powers to be given in the Adriatic and up the River Danube and its tributaries in the territorial waters and territory of Austria-Hungary.

The Allies and associated powers shall have the right to sweep up all mine fields and obstructions, and the positions of these are to be indicated.

IN ORDER to insure the freedom of navigation on the Danube the Allies and the United States of America shall be empowered to occupy or to dismantle all fortifications or defense works.

FIVE—The existing blockade conditions set up by the Allied and associated powers are to remain unchanged and all Austro-Hungarian merchant ships found at sea are to remain liable to capture save exceptions which may be made by a commission nominated by the allies and the United States of America.

SIX—All naval aircraft are to be concentrated and impounded in Austro-Hungarian bases to be designated by the Allies and United States of America.

SEVEN—Evacuation of all the Italian coasts and of all ports occupied by Austria-Hungary outside their national territory, and the abandonment of all floating craft, naval materials, equipment and materials for inland navigation of all kinds.

EIGHT—Occupation by the Allies and the United States of America of the land and sea fortifications and the islands which form the defenses and of the dockyards and arsenal at Pola.

NINE—All merchant vessels held by Austria-Hungary belonging to the Allies and associated powers to be returned.

TEN—No destruction of ships or of materials to be permitted before evacuation, surrender or restoration.

ELEVEN—all naval and mercantile marine prisoners of the Allied and associated powers in Austro-Hungarian hands to be returned without reciprocity.

President Wilson Replies to Germany

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 5.—Following is the text of the note handed to the Swiss Minister today by Secretary Lansing for transmission to Germany:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.
Nov. 5, 1918.

From the Secretary of State to the Minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in the United States.

Sir: I have the honor to request you to transmit the following communication to the German Government:

IN my note of October 23, 1918, I advised you that the President had transmitted his correspondence with the German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent with the suggestion that, if those Governments were disposed to accept peace upon the terms and principles indicated, their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such an armistice as would fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government has agreed, provided they deem such an armistice possible from the military point of view.

The President is now in receipt of a memorandum of observations by the Allied Governments on this correspondence, which is as follows:

22—The Allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses.

They must point out, however, that Clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

Further, in the conditions of peace, laid down in his address to Congress of Jan. 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed. The Allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air.

I am instructed by the President to say that he is in agreement with the interpretation set forth in the last paragraph of the memorandum above quoted. I am further instructed by the President to request you to notify the German Government that Marshal Foch has been authorized by the Government of the United States and the Allied Governments to receive properly accredited representatives of the German Government and to communicate to them terms of an armistice.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) ROBERT LANSING.
MR. HANS SULZER,
Minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in the United States.

territory and of the use of the necessary Austrian and Hungarian means of transportation. The armies of the associated powers shall occupy such strategic points in Austria-Hungary at times as they may deem necessary to enable them to conduct military operations or to maintain order.

They shall have the right of requisition on payment for the troops of the associated powers (wherever?) they may be.

FIVE—Complete evacuation of all German troops within fifteen days, not only from the Italian and Balkan fronts, but from all Austro-Hungarian territory.

Interment of all German troops which have not left Austria-Hungary within the date.

SIX—The administration of the evacuated territories of Austria-Hungary will be intrusted to the local authorities under the control of the Allied and associated armies of occupation.

BETTER THAN WE EXPECTED. The report of Chas. E. Hughes upon the American Airplane situation was made public on October 31, along with a letter from the Attorney General summarizing the report and agreeing with its recommendations. Making the investigation Mr. Hughes spent 5 months and examined 280 witnesses, whose testimonies filled 57,000 pages. The report covers 182 pages. Mr. Hughes recommended that (1. E. A. Deeds be tried by court-martial on charges of having acted as confidential adviser to a former business associate and of giving out false and misleading statements with regard to progress of aircraft production. These charges have been made before, and Col. Deeds had himself asked for a court-martial. Three other officers were accused of having violated the law, prohibiting representatives of the Government from transacting business with corporations with which they were associated. In these cases Justice Hughes recommended civil trials. As regards expenditures, lack of co-operation and general inefficiency Mr. Hughes reports much the same findings as the Senate Committee, whose report has already been published. The report shows that Secretary of War Baker personally cancelled a contract made with a company with which his brother was connected and insisted that his brother leave the company.

READY FOR THE DRIVE. The final preparations for the United War Work Campaign for $170,500,000 which closes November 18 were initiated in New York on November 3. 15,000 persons, Protestants, Catholics and Jews, who were to be workers for the campaign met in Madison Square Garden to hear Secretary of War Baker tell how the various organizations united in the campaign had rendered faithful service of inestimable value to the boys "Over There." Former Justice Hughes was the Chairman of the meeting. He declared the campaign the greatest voluntary altruistic effort which any people had ever been called upon to make. Secretary Baker closed his address as follows:

The nation's greatest asset, the pearl of great price to us, the thing that will make our civilization solid and substantial, make it admired of all men for all time, and to us the greatest comfort that institutions can give to men, that thing is this great-spirited army that we now have abroad.

"We must press this campaign forward; we must secure these funds, we must continue the services of the devoted men and devoted women who are there now sharing the dangers of the front, and the privations of the soldier's life. We must maintain and increase their activity with our soldier boys, and when those boys do come home, think what an inspiration it will be to them to realize that when they went into battle, forgetting and abating all minor differences in the interest of their patriotic loyalty and desire to do their duty, that we were not found wanting on our side, that we abated our differences and made a united effort to sustain the thing here for which they were living their lives there."

The Week in the World's News

LIBERTY LOAN OVERSUBSCRIBED. The Fourth Liberty Loan of $6,000,000,000 went far "Over the Top," according to figures furnished by the Treasury on November 1. Every Federal Reserve District exceeded its quota, the total of subscriptions being $6,866,416,300, or 114 44/100 per cent. more than the amount offered. The men of the army took more than $75,000,000 worth of bonds, and the men of the navy more than $43,500,000. In the first loan there were 4,500,000 subscribers, in the second, 9,500,000, in the third, 18,300,000, and the fourth was carried to victory by 21,000,000 subscribers.

DERAILMENT BRINGS DEATH. A Brooklyn elevated train, hurrying to Coney Island, was derailed on a curve on the evening of November 1. The first car, a heavy motor car, struck the concrete wall dividing the entrance to the tunnel. The third car, a light wooden car, was thrown across the tracks and was practically pulverized by two following other cars which

"Yet God Also Is Wise"

TEXT—Isa. 31:1-2. "Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are very strong; but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord! YET HE ALSO IS WISE."

THIS shaft of stinging satire, straight from the big heart as well as brain of a true patriot, was aimed at the political leaders of Jerusalem, at a certain crisis in Jewish history. It also stands a maxim of vital truth which should serve as a solemn warning in every crisis of human history. For if life is really worth the living it is because through it all "one increasing purpose runs"; and this can only be if behind it all and through it all there is a Great Purposer. Moreover, what is true of the individual must be true of the aggregate. If there is such a thing as a philosophy of history the one and only key to it must be the fact that

"behind the dim unknown

Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own."

Let us look for a moment at the historical setting, for it will throw much light upon the meaning which the prophet put into the words, and by the same token make them live for us.

The prophet Isaiah lived in the last half of the eighth century B. C. It is not certain that he was in any way related to the royal family, but at any rate it seems to have been the fact that he grew up and lived his life close to the king and his court, and therefore close to the very center of the national life. It was from this point of view that he gained his outlook upon life, not only that of his own people, but presently that of the world, for it so happened that it was during his active ministry that the vision of the world, as distinguished from the nation, was beginning to open to the eyes of men.

AT the commencement of his career the ruling monarch of far-away Assyria conceived in his wicked heart the design and determination to conquer the whole world and make it the vassal of Assyria. Exception is often taken to the saying that "history but repeats itself"; but anyhow it is not without interest to note how this bit of ancient history finds its likeness in the history of recent events. Assyria of old is but the prototype of modern Germany; and its king wears the same grim visage as the Kaiser, not only as he conceives his diabolical plan, but in the ruthlessness and frightfulness with which he relentlessly tries to carry it out.

From Jerusalem as his watchtower, Isaiah through forty years watched the ebb and flow of this terrible world struggle; and it was from the same height, above the noise and din of battle, that he learned that practical statesmanship which made him the greatest political power in Israel, and also the splendid faith which made him such an influence not only over his own people and times but over all peoples and times, since it enabled him to realize the government of the world by the One God, infinitely high indeed, but also infinitely near; exalted in righteousness surely, but always so humbling himself that they might know, if they would but open their eyes to see, that "The heart of the Eternal is most wonderfully kind."

As the conflict wore on, king succeeded king both in Assyria and in Judah; but on the one side there was the same relentless purpose with the same relentless fury behind it, and on the other side there was the constant alternation between hope and fear as crisis followed crisis. At each one of these Isaiahs, strong in his faith, stood pointing out the right way and warning away from the wrong way. That his advice often fell on unheeding ears goes without saying. Again and again the political leaders discovered only too late their mistaken wisdom.

IT was at one of these crises that Isaiah hurls at these leaders this bit of biting sarcasm—"Yet God also is wise." The time was not far from the close of his career. Judah was again threatened with invasion, and her politicians were trying to discover how best to meet it. The policy adopted was one of intrigue looking to an alliance with Egypt. With his clearer vision Isaiah saw that such a policy involved not only bad politics, but worse religion. In any event Egypt either could not, or would not, help them, no matter what she might promise; but, at bottom, it was after all only a further reliance upon material things which all along had proved their undoing, whereas it was not alliance, but reliance which alone could save them—trust and confidence in God who overrules in righteousness, and the courage born of these which would enable them fighting together with him to beat back again the enemy at their gates.

In spite of his warning, the policy seems to have been pursued, and the prospect of a speedy alliance was almost if not quite in sight. The politicians were perhaps already congratulating themselves upon the promised addition to their fighting strength; perhaps too they were boasting of their wisdom shown by what they had accomplished, and the cleverness with which they had sidetracked this prophet whose influence with the people had well-nigh upset their plans. Then Isaiah answers them: "They look not unto the Holy One of Israel, and Jehovah they do not seek. Yet he also is wise."

You think yourselves very clever, but you have left God out of account. You think you have been making history, but remember God also works in history, and surely with no less cleverness and persistence than you do. God also is wise. Sarcasm seems to be the only weapon with which to pierce their utter folly. Of course they believed there was a God, but somehow they had not thought of associating wisdom with him, particularly in the management of world affairs. They relegated him to what they thought and spoke of as their religion. They only thought of him as far away, not at all interested in the affairs of life; really a God who did not care.

Now and then, perhaps, when trouble or sorrow came, in some dim, hazy way they might try to get him to interfere, or to change his will; but that along the far reaches of life, through its great crises as well as in its small vicissitudes, there was such a thing as plan or purpose which God in his wisdom was working out, all this was utterly foreign to them. And so it was, over against this utterly false philosophy of life, as well as against the mistaken policy based upon it, that Isaiah, even by means of this quick bit of satire, proclaimed this never-to-be-forgotten truth—"God also is wise."

THERE is a timelessness about this truth which lifts it away from its immediate setting, and brings it across the centuries to us in another great crisis of human history. It is a truth which I dare to say above all others we need to hear and to heed.

There are two points of view from which I desire to consider this truth—

(1) That of the great conflict in which as a nation we have been called to take our place and to bear our part in the high task of defending the principles of righteousness, justice and liberty; and

(2) That of the period of reconstruction which must inevitably follow after this war is won, and the world has been made safe for democracy, as it surely is going to be.

From the first point of view, I doubt not it may be taken for granted that, by this time at any rate, we are all persuaded that this great world war is not merely one of peoples against peoples, or of nations against nations, but in its final analysis it is nothing short of the clash and indeed the fight unto death of two great principles of human living which perhaps cannot be better expressed than in the familiar words that it is "might which makes right," on the one side, and "right which makes might," on the other. But what we ought to realize, perhaps more than any of us do at all times, and perhaps more than some of us do at any time, is that through this mighty conflict, awful as it is, some great purpose is being wrought out.

If there is one sure lesson of history it is that all progress, all civilization, is slowly but surely accomplished only through struggle and sacrifice. Every step in advance has to be bought with a price, and oftentimes it is only long after the event that it appears that the price was none too great to pay, but that the result is certainly worth all it has cost. So today we can believe, even on the testimony of history, that if the world is now having to pay the biggest price it ever had to pay for something, that something will at length appear to be worth all it is costing now. But there is still stronger reason for this faith, and it is this—that God through all this mighty world upheaval, this clash and crash of tottering world empires, is working out his all-wise purpose for the ultimate good of men.

OF course, it is easy for any one to challenge this statement with the sneer that this is always the way men have of claiming to have God on their side. But the sure answer to the sneer is that if there is any purpose or meaning in the life of men or of nations it can only be that back of it all, and through it all, there is some Great Purpose. Moreover, in this instance, as a matter of fact, there is no thought of claiming to have God on our side. Let the Kaiser content himself with that blasphemous boast, if he can. And let us be quick to take the humbler yet far stronger position which Abraham Lincoln took in another crisis of our nation's history when he said that the more important thing is to be on the side of God, and then let the whole course of human history comfort and cheer us with its sure witness to the fact that the side of God has always been that of righteousness, justice and freedom, and never that of sin, wrong or slavery.

The sad mistake men are always making, in the twentieth century just as they did in the eighth century before the present era, is in thinking that God is so far away, and so great, that he simply cannot be interested in human affairs or world history; and the saddest mistake of all is to think that God does not care. Well, if that is true, it is not worth wasting time even to think or speak about God.

An illustration from a recent writer goes right to the heart of the matter:

Indeed, let one stand over against a war-torn, unhappy world and try to think that God does not suffer in agony, and he will see how needless and incredible such a God would be. God looks on Belgium, and he does not care! Look on Armenia desolate and Poland devastated, and he does not care! He sits in heaven and sees his children wounded alone in No Man's Land, watches the deaths, the heart-breaking poverty of war, its ruined childhood, its shattered families and he does not care! how impossible it is to believe in such a God. A God who does not care, does not count.

But our God does care, and therefore he does count, and the highest proof of it is the sublime faith of the Christian Gospel, his good news to men, that in the person of his Only Begotten Son Jesus Christ he has entered into and actually shared all human conditions, coming among men that they might have life and have it more abundantly, not only by setting before them the pattern for human living, but actually taking part in the battle of life and fighting it through to the finish. The whole character of God is made known to us in terms of our own humanity in Jesus Christ. In him we know that "there was a cross in the heart of God" even before there was a cross on "the Green Hill far away," and while this has long since been taken down, the cross in the heart of God abides and will continue to abide so long as man struggles upward shall continue. It is a timeless fact equally true for all times and places. "World history is not something at which God looks on as a spectator or which he directs from above, but something in which he genuinely partakes."

IN these days when, because of the awful frightfulness of the war, men's hearts sometimes fail with fear, there is heard now and again the cry: "What does not God, if there be a God, put a stop to it?" Surely faith's answer is obvious: He does not because in making such a world as this is, God limited himself and cannot lightly do that which we might think he ought to do. God did not cause this war. It is man's perversity that did it. And if we are really honest with ourselves, as in the sight of God, it is certain we shall have to acknowledge our own share in it. The world is what it is today just because it has been so crowded out of it, and we all have helped in the crowding-out process. The plain fact of the matter is, and we should recognize it readily enough if we could only get out of our environment enough to make a clear and clean judgment of the situation, that modern society of which we are a part has simply become obsessed with materialistic conceptions of life and with materialistic values in life. Yet God also is wise. Long ago he made plain a great truth concerning human life—"Man shall not live by bread alone"—and now through this world upheaval he is patiently teaching this old life truth over again to the world. So too, slowly and patiently, he is winning his way back into the lives of men in order that he may again lead them onward and upward, through storm and night, to their destined goal.

What a challenge there is to us in this assurance! The war with all its suffering and sacrifice is a part of the way up and not on the way down in our civilization. Therefore it is a war which we must carry on, with a willingness and readiness for every sacrifice, until the victory is won. It is only the sheer folly to speak, or even to think, of peace, if by peace we mean only compromise. With a splendid idealism of patriotism one has recently said:

Peace itself is not an ideal: it is a state attendant upon the achievement of an ideal. The ideal itself is justice, freedom, truth, and the honorable conduct of a just and humane society. Until these ideals have been achieved there is no peace possible that is consistent with the self-respect of a nation's soul.

Evils That Never Arrive

SUNDAY, November 17. Mark 16: 3. "Who shall roll us away the stone?" This needless anxiety may stand as a common type of innumerable worries concerning difficulties which never arrive. How anxiously these women had grappled with the disturbing problem of their own weakness! They earned to do the last love-service to the dear body of their Lord. "But who will roll us away the stone? We shall not be able to move it! And no one will be about at that early hour! It will be still dark and the arduous labor will not have come to his work! We may take our spades to the grave, but the stone barrier will block our weakness, and we shall have to turn home again!" And so they fretted and worried, and they saw no way out. And, still fretting and worrying, they went to the tomb. "And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulcher." For the angel of the Lord descended from heaven and came and rolled back the stone from the door. All their worry had been quite unnecessary. The difficulty which they had foreseen never arrived.

And that is only one example of countless others in which we bother about things for which our Father has made ample provision. The angel has already received his commission, and at the appointed time he will remove the stone. But still we are inclined to worry all along the way. When we are converted by the saving grace of Christ we are often seriously troubled and anxious about the new road. We are fearful as to how it will fare with us when the tempter straddles across the way. And what about the Slough of Despond? How shall we get over it? And how shall we be able to climb the hill Difficulty? And with many other such fretful questions we worry our hearts. And they are all needless burdens which we are fashioning for ourselves. There is an angel ministry in all these things. But the trouble is, we forget the angel, and whenever we leave the angel out of the reckoning we see insuperable barriers everywhere, and we are sore afraid. The angel is before us on the road, and when we come to the fearful place we shall find that his work is done. J. H. J.

Afterward

MONDAY, November 18. Rev. 7: 9. "After this I beheld . . ." Rev. 19: 1. "After these things I heard . . ." Some things cannot be seen until we have seen other things, and some things cannot be heard until we have first heard something else. Imagination was not afraid of death, because he had seen the Lord's Christ. That is to say, he had seen something, in the light of which death lost its terror. After this I beheld." After what? "I was in the spirit on the Lord's Day." "After these things I heard." After what things? After the fall of the mystical Babylon. Babylon represents any power, political, military, social or other, that is offensive to law and order, offensive to peace, offensive to the good of the race and the will of God. The fall of that power is destined and decreed. Babylon shall fall, and "after these things" we shall see what we could not see before. After the earthquake, wind and fire, shall come the still small voice. To be ready to hear—to be sensitive to the messages of the Eternal—this is our duty, our present and future duty.

"After this." Is religion then wholly a matter of the future? That is what its critics say. That is why so many people despise or ignore it. But religion is a matter of the present, as well as of the future. It is a matter of the past, the present and the future, because it is eternal. The past is a world we cannot ignore. It is a part of the law of life that the past has its treasures, its golden memories, its gifts to the present. We are making the future now. The present is the future in the process of making. Whether "after these things" we shall behold delectable visions and hear ineffable voices depends upon our appreciation of the fact that the present has always vaster issues than can be seen.

There are a few years in all our lives when self is the great world. We are mere animals. But there comes a time when conscience awakens and moral sense asserts itself. After this we behold life in a new light. After this we hear the voice of duty, and if we are divinely led, we honor it. Then, as the years go by, God gives us other monitors. The Great Book shines on our path. After this we behold the plan of the ages. After this the Lord Jesus reveals himself, and in his light we see right. There is one event the afterward of which is more potent than that of any other next to birth. It is the new birth. Then, "after these things," all things become new. Then pleasure and sorrow take their proper places in life's economy. We come to regard them both as relative, not final, and to value each for what it contributes to the deepening and sweetening of character. C. C. A.

Love and Fear of God

TUESDAY, November 19. Ps. 99: 1. "The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble; he sitteth between the cherubim; let the earth be moved." Enthroned in unapproachable majesty, vastly superior to the ingenuity, might and glory of earth's ephemeral kingdoms, raised far above the restless strivings of puny men who are laboring to be great and greater than the rest, sits the only true Potentate, the real Master of this world, the Lord of lords and King of kings. All things must serve his ends; for every event he alone shapes the ultimate and true purpose; his will supersedes every other will. When men forget their inferiority, as they are apt to do, being naturally given to the folly of self-conceit, the Great Unknown may step forth out of the darkness which veils him from mortal eyes, and by deeds of royal might may change in the twinkling of an eye the aspect of affairs so utterly that men are dazed and cannot discover any more the purposes with which they started out. God insists on his unquestioned supremacy, and woe to him who forgets it! But is not this view of the majestic God in his transcendent sublimity terrifying even to Christians? In so far as they are still in the flesh and sinners, yes; but in so far as they are the redeemed of the Lord, there is nothing terrible to them in the most exalted views they may have of God. For this great and mighty God is the God who has loved them: he has employed all his matchless perfections in the work of rescuing sinners; he has proved himself "mighty to save." W. H. T. D.

The Treasure of the Cross

WEDNESDAY, November 20. Ps. 104: 24. "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches." During the year just passing, abundant harvests and fruitful trees and vines have been ours. The flocks have been safe in the fold, the earth hath yielded her treasures, for which all should praise the heavenly Father. Gratitude also should be expressed for the progress of reforms in the enfranchisement of woman, the spread of prohibition, the greater harmony between capital and labor, and the outpouring of millions of money for educational, benevolent and charitable institutions.

Spurgeon once said that a cross was the most valuable piece of furniture in his home. The civilized world is realizing the treasure of the Cross as never before. It is a tree of fruitage, the richest humanity has ever known. Hearts blossom red when iron enters the soul. Some flowers grow best under the snow, as marble becomes beautiful under the sculptor's hammer. The Christian under his cross, while liberating the world from oppression, becomes loftier in spirit and grander in being.

In our annual Thanksgiving festival, can we "in every thing give thanks"? Can his appointments ever be called disappointments when we know that "he always wins who sides with God"? Therefore, let the bells peal their chimes of praise, the choirs their hallelujah anthems, and all hearts their carols of rejoicing, making their keynote "liberty for all the peoples of the earth." It is thus we can make life a psalm of praise, an aspiration after the crystal Christ. Beautiful melody is said to be the harmony of different notes; so mankind today is united in the song of freedom for all oppressed peoples, and so "makes life, death and the vast forever one grand, sweet song." E. W. C.

The Unfailing One

THURSDAY, November 21. Heb. 1: 12. "Thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail." We make no mistake if we read, in connection with the first chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the ninety-third Psalm, the Psalm of the Everlasting God. The psalmist is thinking of the Jehovah of the Old Testament. The apostle is speaking of the Christ of the New Testament. Behold the Christlikeness of God! Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever. It is a truism of our faith that God is unchanging and unchangeable. We have an eternal God, revealing himself to us in an eternal Christ. Forms of religion are not eternal. Nor are creeds. A creed is not a contract; it is a poem, a composite picture, a work of art such as a cathedral, which is never finished just because it is so great, just because it is so nearly like a living thing. If forms of worship and statements of faith are changeable, it is because human life is changeable. A composite picture of humanity must necessarily be kaleidoscopic. New pictures present themselves at every turn of the glass. "Our fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live forever?" Only God lives forever, and that which is incorporated with him. What mean such phrases as "our lives are hid with Christ in God" and "of me are ye in Christ?" However mystical such phrases are, they represent a reality of Christian experience. The Eternal God is our refuge, and underneath are everlasting arms. However far the floods may bear us, they can never separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. He is the same, and his years shall not fail. C. C. A.

Remembering His Goodness

FRIDAY, November 22. Ps. 145: 7. "They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness." A finer subject for the believer's reverie, a nobler theme for his song than is here suggested can hardly be imagined: God's goodness and righteousness. Either alone would be sufficient to engage our meditation and praise forever; the two combined, as they appear in the wonderful plan which God has devised for the salvation of sinners, should fill us with rapture. When God gave his only begotten Son that all who believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life, he manifested his love and at the same time met the requirements of his righteousness. He punished sin in the Sin-bearer and rescued the sinner by the sacrifice of his own Child. The God who could conceive and execute this redemptive plan is indeed a God of great goodness. All other blessings which men receive from the hand of God rest on this fundamental blessing of the redemption. The joys and pleasures of our home-life, the generous yields of our gardens and fields, the wealth that comes to us out of our forests and mines, the cheerful heart and the health of body which are needed to enjoy all these bounties, are granted us to rouse in us memories of that great love which found a way of reconciliation for us when we were lost and perishing. Our daily mercies and the special blessings which each season of the revolving year brings us will not be depreciated but raised to their true spiritual value when we connect them in our meditations with that great mercy which made our offended Judge our loving Friend. The bread tastes sweeter and the sun shines brighter for the soul that remembers that it owes also these things to the labor and love of Jesus. Seeing all our goods and our whole life in a relation to Jesus, makes them more precious and rouses with greater force the spirit of gratitude in us. The utterance of our cherished memories of God's grace and love becomes stronger as we strike the mainspring from which the living waters are to gush, feeding our faith with great and solemn thoughts and entuning our lips to exquisite praise. Pressing Towards the Goal

SATURDAY, November 23. Phil. 3: 13. "Forgetting those things which are behind." We are saved by hope; therefore, do not build your future on the past. Hope thou in God; bury your blunders as deep as the heavenly Father buries your forgiven sins. Mourning over failures impedes future victories, and contemplating losses turns the attention away from activity. Let the helmet of hope flash the glory of possible future attainments over all the mistakes of the past. One cannot press onward toward the mark for the prize hampered and hobbled by regrets and sorrows.

Hannibal lost Rome by tarrying after his great victory to rejoice over his successes. If he had pushed on, Napoleon-like, he would have ruled the world. Lot's wife lost by just looking back. She lost time, opportunity, everything. Paul's motto is a good one, "This one thing I do; I press toward the mark for the prize." Those who hesitated to lose all at Pompeii, when the air was filled with fiery clouds of showering ashes, became encrusted petrifications—monuments, speaking to all the world of their failure to use the precious moments in which to escape.

Never hesitating in hours of exigency, never looking back at the evil that may overtake you, keeping your eye upon the goal, lay aside every weight, every besetting sin, and the unfading crown will be yours. Too much retrospection spells ruin. Looking unto Jesus as your pattern, guide and Saviour always inspires activity. He is your prize, your heaven, your all; your past will never return, but Jesus will come to meet you. When you look joyfully forward to him, you can look peacefully back. His forgiveness covers all the past and glorifies the future. E. W. C.

The Guiding Hand in the Storm

THERE are many developments in human affairs which, though seemingly involved in mystery at the time of their occurrence, begin later to be better understood. He must be blind indeed who, looking back over the years, does not now discern the influence of a divine hand directing the issues of the world war. Appalling as has been the cost, the conviction grows that no lesser sacrifice would have sufficed to accomplish what has been so wonderfully brought to pass. At the outset, it was a struggle marked apparently by madness and confusion, systematic only in its terrible destructiveness, and utterly lawless in its aims on the part of the aggressors. Who could have foreseen that those very powers that grasped the pillars of the temple of world peace with destructive purpose would themselves ultimately become involved in the ruin; that the Romanoff, Hapsburg and Hohenzollern dynasties, synonyms of the worst forms of despotism, would themselves crumble under the crash; and that the weaker peoples, who had been oppressed and robbed of their nationhood and independence, would be restored by their fall? Who would have ventured to assert that the Balkan races would be set on the road that leads to independence and enlightenment; that the Moslem power, which had caused so many wars and had made the world stand aghast at its hideous massacres, would be shorn of its territory and rendered permanently impotent? Could even the wisest of men have foreseen that the war was destined to bring about the redemption of the Bible lands from Euphrates to Mediterranean, and that Jerusalem would be rescued from the infidel Mohammedan power on the very eve of Hanukkah, the "Feast of Lights"—the festival commemorative of deliverance from their ancient oppressors?

If we view the great war with regard to its moral and spiritual results, we can now see many instances of divine overruling. It has opened the door for the small peoples, by which they can return to nationhood and freedom. It has stricken bad rulers from their thrones; it has pulled down a long list of princes and premiers, and cabinets and political time-servers, who were foes to human freedom. It has impressed its influence mightily upon all the nations and has liberalized every existing government. It has put a ban upon greed and selfishness, has given the promise of a better living to the workers, and has everywhere inspired the spirit of practical helpfulness and friendly international relations. Truly, the war has brought measurably nearer the vision of human brotherhood throughout the whole earth.

In the largest sense, the war has been a crusade of righteousness against oppression, of the spirit of truth and justice against brute force and frightfulness. When the united Allies appealed to God in behalf of their cause, the answer came, and the assurance of victory has increased at every step that followed. Our coming Thanksgiving will be one on which we, as a united people who entered the struggle to conquer oppression and save civilization from destruction, can join in grateful acknowledgment of the mercy and goodness of Him whose ear is ever open to the cry of faith and sincerity, and the plea for a righteous and noble cause.

Spartan Mothers—and Others

A CHRISTIAN HERALD reader in Texas sends us a clipping from a newspaper which relates an incident that carries a seasonable lesson to inordinate lovers of pleasure. It tells of a lady in San Antonio who sent a package of papers from that city to her son in the trenches. "We do not know what these papers contained, but the impression made by certain portions of their contents, which told of social dances and similar convivialities, must have been a very vivid one, if we may judge from the letter that mother received from her son a few weeks later. "In God's name, mother," he wrote, "how can people over in America live that kind of a life, while we fellows over here are wading hell shoulder deep for you and our country?" This rebuke to the thoughtless and heedless, while applicable in its place to a certain class, fortunately serves to mark the contrast between the great body of American motherhood and the few exceptions. Today, the mothers, wives, sisters and daughters of our land are enduring their burden of war care and war work with Spartan courage, and, let us add, with an unshakable trust in the divine goodness. The Red Cross, the Y. W. C. A. work and a score of other humanitarian activities are all carried on at full steam by the glorious women who are keeping the home fires burning. Their incessant labors, their noble economies and their prayers are helping our heroes at the front as nothing else can help them.

Lieutenant Adrian C. Edwards, of Illinois, killed in action on May 4, left his mother the priceless heritage of a letter that was to be sent to her if he fell in battle. He wrote, in substance: "When you receive this letter, I will either be a prisoner in the hands of the enemy or with my God. Do not grieve if I am missing, but rejoice that you have given a son in sacrifice to save civilization, to prevent future wars and to make the world safe for democracy.

"I desire that you shall be like the Spartan mothers of old, who, when their sons went forth to battle for freedom, said to them, 'Either come home proudly, bearing your shield before you, or upon it.' You must remember some mother had to lose a son, some one must make the sacrifice. . . . Good-by, mother, I will see you in the next world. You may know that I died fighting for you, for my country and all that life holds dear."

Will not this letter go down to history like that one President Lincoln wrote to the Spartan mother who had laid the costly sacrifice of five sons upon the altar of our country?

RENEW YOUR SUBSCRIPTION NOW

THE increasing scarcity of paper stock has forced the Government to set a definite limit on the amount of paper that can be used in printing magazines. Paper is allotted to every periodical publisher in proportion to the number of subscribers who have actually paid for their subscriptions in advance. Because of the new paper conservation regulations, we cannot print magazines to fill subscriptions not arranged for in advance. After we have used a certain definite amount of paper in printing the Christian Herald, we cannot print any more copies of the current issue regardless of the demand, as we will not be able to obtain any extra paper. It should be borne in mind that the amount of paper allotted to the Christian Herald is less than we used last year.

To insure the continuous receipt of the Christian Herald, it is absolutely necessary that you renew your subscription in advance of the expiration date. Don't wait until the last minute, as we cannot supply back numbers. Please remember that once a name is dropped from our list, two to three weeks must elapse before we can reinstate it. To insure your receipt of the Christian Herald on the date of issue, we begin mailing a week in advance.

The subscription price of the Christian Herald, as announced in last week's issue, will be advanced to $2.50 a year on Jan. 1, 1919. Renew now and take advantage of the present price of $2.00. A complete announcement of the increased subscription price appears on another page of this issue.

Jobs for Women Unlimited

THE best way for many women to show their patriotism is to train for service. Efficiency was never a more highly prized asset than it is today. The Government is helping women to find the work they are best fitted to do and suggesting how they can best train to fill places of men called to the colors.

"The time has now come when many women must drop their knitting for a field of greater service, cease volunteer work, and take a regular job for regular pay," says C. T. Clayton, of the U. S. Department of Labor. "The fact that women may not be in need of the money has nothing to do with the case. The Government needs their service for production, and the Government is very particular about women being paid the same wage as men for services equally rendered."

The patriotic thing is for a woman to do the work her training has fitted her to do, provided it has been along the lines of an essential vocation. School teachers should stick to their calling, no matter if munitions offer a higher reward; the youth of America must not be neglected.

For the untrained woman, hundreds of factories are spending or preparing to spend millions solely in the work of intensive training of new workers. Seven hundred and fifty thousand new skilled workers are needed by the country by January first.

The woman with nimble fingers who is not afraid to work, and who is willing to cast aside for eight hours a day her fluffy-ruffles for overalls, her plumed bonnet for a service cap, and to concentrate on the task at hand, is sure of a quick and certain reward.

A Christmas Chest

DO we lack keen joy at the prospect of Christmas giving? Then perhaps what we are suffering from is barrenness of the true Christmas spirit.

In bringing the gold to the festival, do we forge the frankincense and myrrh? And do we bring the gold only as to a market-place—to barter it, to give gifts in exchange for gifts in return? "What waste!" do we cry with the disciples, when the alabaster box of precious ointment is broken over the head of Christ, forgetting that loving charity is what Christmas means?

A Christian Herald friend in Germantown, Pa., suggests a manner of Christmas giving that will be in perfect accord with the true spirit of the season. He proposes that the Christian Herald Family make up a Christmas chest for the sufferers overseas. He writes:

Would it not be well for us each and all to look at the great need across the seas, both for spiritual and material food where the ruthless hand of war has made so many homeless, helpless and penniless? When we look about in this country and find so many living in comfort whose closets are full, bureau drawers and trunks full and larders full, it surely would seem the part of wisdom for us to forego the usual custom and pleasure of giving and receiving presents here among our own relatives and friends and have instead "A Christmas chest" (not a war chest), each one contributing to its contents (in money) as they might be led with glad and willing hearts, as unto Him whose birth we celebrate. We the would have the unspeakable privilege and delight of hearing him say to us: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

Surely the Christian Herald, which has a world-wide record for its beneficent acts along these lines, would be willing to act as custodian and forwarder of all funds sent to this "Christmas chest." I am enclosing my check for $25 as a starter to this fund. A PILGRIM.

The Christian Herald gladly undertakes to render the best possible account of funds entrusted to it for this purpose. Let the Christmas chest be Christian America's gift to Palestine, which is now facing famine. Your dollars will help to save the lives of the afflicted people of the Holy Land. Not merchandise but money is needed. In present conditions merchandise cannot be transferred. Money we can send by cable.

To give material aid without hope of return, to give of self in the name and in the spirit of the Supreme Giver, will unlock for each of us the innermost treasure chamber of Christmas joy and blessing. Let us see how many hearts our Pilgrim's appeal for Palestine will touch. We invite every one to send a gift to the "Christmas Chest."

The Balmy Arctic

ANOTHER cherished illusion is dispelled and relegated to the junk-heap of vivid misconceptions that have suddenly faded. Explorers Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who has just returned from five years' cruise in the regions around the North Pole, tells us that the weather up there is by no means the frigid terror we have pictured in our minds. It is much cooler in central Siberia than at Herschel Island. Even near the geographical pole the climate never gets really bad, although the mercury occasionally runs down to 60 below zero! Indeed, it was so mild and compatible with physical comfort that he usually disrobed on the porch of his igloo, and passed the evening in his underwear, resting at night in his sleeping-bag. His underwear, by the way, was of reindeer's skin with the fur side in. He has explored some 250,000 square miles, amid a kinds of weather, and claims to have suffered no hardships until his return to civilization. There is no suggestion of any health resort or summer colony scheme in the explorer's story; it is simply cold fact—though not nearly so cold as they have been popularly supposed to be. Most folks, however, would rather spend a vacation in a different climate, accepting all the risks, than tempt fate in the balmy Arctic with the mercury at 60 below and raw frozen meat the main attraction in the daily menu.

Only the preacher who fastens his words together with the cement of love will make them stick in the minds of his hearers.

The Church After the War

More Expressions from Prominent Religious Leaders Urging a Realignment of America's Spiritual Forces

OUR second instalment of responses to the Christian Herald's questionnaire, "What Should the Churches of Protestant America do to meet the Religious Situation after the War?" are given below. They include a wide variety of practical suggestion. Baptist, Methodist, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Lutheran and other denominational leaders, as well as college professors, write freely on the vital question.

Never has any problem confronted the Church that equals in importance that which is involved in the question now under discussion. It is made very clear in almost all these letters which we print today—as in the first instalment—that the problem is one which is rapidly overshadowing all others in vital interest for the churches, and which must be faced and answered in the near future.

The Church Should Put All Narrow Interests Aside to Be Ready for Its Greatest Hour of Opportunity, writes Dr. Torrey, Dean of Bible Institute, Los Angeles.

YOU ask my opinion on a very vital question: "What should the churches of Protestant America do to meet the situation?" In reply I would say:

1. They should put all narrow personal interests aside, and resolve at any cost they will do what lies in their power to present the simple and pure Gospel as is found in the Word of God to every man, woman and child at home, and to every man, woman and child, as rapidly as possible, in heathen lands.

2. They should avoid all wastes of men, money and effort. There is no question that the present division of real Christians into separate, and sometimes warring, sects oftentimes results in an appalling waste of men, money and effort. Many a community has from three to ten churches and three to ten ministers, where one church and one minister would meet all the needs of the community better than they are met with this division of forces. Very frequently these churches and these ministers stand for the same essential truths, and the points of difference among them are concerning questions of entirely secondary, or less than secondary, importance. For example, many a Methodist minister preaches exactly the same Crucified, Risen, and Seated Lord Jesus Christ as is preached by many a Presbyterian minister and many a Baptist minister. The questions that divide them are simply questions of church government, or questions of modes of administration of church ordinances. In such a case there should not be three ministers, but one; and very frequently it would be possible to get a better minister than any one of the three who can be had under existing conditions.

There cannot possibly be a union of all Protestants, or many Protestants differ from one another on questions that are really vital; but there should be a new argument, for many a Presbyterian minister agrees with many Methodist ministers on questions that are vital, and differs from other Presbyterian ministers on questions that are vital. There cannot be co-operation among professed Christians who disagree upon really fundamental questions, and the new alignment should be along these fundamental lines. It matters not to me whether a man is a Methodist, or a Baptist, or a Congregationalist, or a Lutheran, or what he is, if he believes in the absolute authority and inerrancy of the Scriptures, in the real deity of Jesus Christ and the real human nature of Jesus Christ, in the atonement of Jesus Christ by his shed blood, redeeming us from the curse of the broken law, in regeneration by the power of the Holy Spirit, in salvation on the simple and single ground of the atoning blood and on the simple and single condition of faith in Him who shed the blood, in the future conscious endless punishment of those who persistently reject Jesus Christ in the life that now is. On the other hand, if a man is a Presbyterian and yet rejects any of the truths just mentioned, I cannot co-operate heartily with him even though he be a Presbyterian. Denominational distinctions have never meant anything to me. The Protestant church ought to be realigned along these vital lines. I am sorry to say I have grave doubts whether it can be, but you have asked, "What should the churches of Protestant America do to meet the situation?" not what will the churches of Protestant America do.

3. The Churches of Protestant America, in order to meet the present situation, the grave crisis that is upon us, should be real Christians in the daily conduct of the membership of these churches. They should give up the love of money, the love of display, the love of pleasure, and many other things that characterize the large share of the professing church today, and which are absolutely hostile to the manner of life demanded by the Lord Jesus Christ.

4. The churches of Protestant America should give up the attempt which has been so characteristic of church activity the past ten or twenty years of reorganizing society without the regeneration of the individual. The program set forth in the New Testament is not the reorganizing of society from without by mere ethical teaching and social reform. The program of Christianity is to reach society by leading the individual to a definite personal acceptance of Jesus Christ and to a transformation of his own character, and thus to make society what it ought to be. The Protestant ministers and churches should give themselves up to intelligent, definite soul-winning as they never have before since the days of the apostles. They should work for real revival, not for great mass movements along thoroughly worldly lines and by thoroughly worldly methods, methods that oftentimes jar upon the spiritual instincts of intelligent Christians, and that aim at drawing vast crowds, making a great outward stir and bringing inordinate financial returns to the leaders in the movement, but a revival sent down from above in answer to prayer and manifestly carried on in the power of the Holy Ghost, and that results in the radical, thorough and permanent transformation of the lives of those who come under its power into the likeness of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The Protestant churches should pray as they never prayed before, absolutely surrender themselves to the lordship of Jesus Christ as they never have before, sacrifice as they have never sacrificed before, give as they have never given before, and wear themselves out in untiring work for the salvation of the lost as they never have before.

While the present hour is one of crisis and peril, it is the greatest hour of opportunity that the Church of Jesus Christ has ever known. If the churches are faithful to the opportunity we shall see such gladdening results as we have never seen before in all the history of the Church on earth. God has been speaking to us in tones of thunder through the great cataclysm of the present war. He is calling us to devotion, sacrifice and effort. Will the churches hear the call? I do not know, but I know that many of us will. I would rather live and work in the present hour than in any hour of this old world's history.

Los Angeles, Calif.

The Churches Must Unite after the War to Combat the Forces of Worldliness and Sin, writes Pastor F. B. Meyer, Famous English Divine.

AS soon as peace comes, the churches must make one united and strong push into the ranks of worldliness and sin. There must be unity of generalship. An army council should sit week by week directing the forces in each great center of population. The churches should divide the big blocks of human dwellings into parishes, each having its own parish; and thus the entire area would be covered. But in each parish the same method should be adopted to meet the same conditions, and that method should be carefully considered and agreed upon by experts as to the one most suited for the special class that was to be addressed. Let us pool experiences and get the best resultant.

Efforts for social and hygienic improvement should not be excluded, but the main effort should be for the winning of men, women, and children for Christ by the adoption of appropriate means.

This advance into the enemy's country should not be spasmodic and fitful, but persistent and maintained; nor should it be carried out by paid or imported labor, but by the utilization of the forces latent in each of our churches and congregations.

Much prayer should baptize the prosecution of this great war against the devil and all his works.

Christ Church, London, England.

If the Church Has the Vision and the Courage, It Will Find Its Soul; Lacking These, It Will Lose Its Greatest Opportunity, writes Dr. John Murdoch MacInnis (Presbyterian).

I HAVE given a good deal of serious thought to the question you ask. I have also tried, for the last four years, to keep in touch with what the leaders of thought on both sides of the water have to say concerning the subject. As a result of my reading and study, I am more and more convinced that the Church, as it now stands, is not measuring up to its obligations, because it has lost sight of its real mission in the world.

In order to meet the challenge of this crisis it must, first of all, clearly define its own mission. In order to do that, it must face and answer a preliminary question. Is Jesus Christ the unique, divine Son of God, with an authoritative revelation and power to realize His program? If we can give that question an affirmative answer the mission of the Church is clear—it is to take Christ's program seriously and make its realization the supreme thing in life. What is this program? Jesus put it into the most challenging sentence that has been uttered in all human history—"All authority is given unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all nations [not from all nations but of all nations] teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you." If that means anything, it means an immediate challenge to the world to recognize Christ's authority and his program as the only program that can warrant lasting peace.

I believe that if the Church has the vision and the courage to accept that program and its vital challenge, and to set aside every selfish and denominational interest that would stand in the way of its speedy realization, it will find its soul and render the greatest possible service to a broken and bleeding world. If it lacks that vision and courage it will lose the greatest opportunity of the centuries and will continue a mere ecclesiastical flunkey, without a definite mission or saving authoritative message.

First, it must have a new and immediate experience of God. This program requires life and power. Second, it must be prepared to make any changes in the existing organization that are necessary to give adequate expression to the new life in a world such as we now find ourselves in. That will certainly mean real co-operation, and perhaps organic union of all the churches that are ready to accept this program. Vital co-operation is the important thing, and I am not at all quite sure that it can best be secured through organic union. But we must have unity of life and purpose and co-operative action.

Third, it must be prepared to encounter the suspicion and savage hostility of the world and ecclesiastical organizations whose life is based upon principles which are the very opposite to the program of Jesus.

But when the church is ready to pay that price the gates of hell can no longer prevail against it.

Syracuse, N. Y.

Church Unity Practicable, Although Denominationalism Will Continue, writes Editor-Pastor L. K. Munhall.

THE churches of Protestant America to meet the situation should get together as far as possible and practicable. Organic church union is impossible in this age. The leading denominations will continue as such. The numerous subdivisions are the chief cause of confusion and offense. Let fourteen kinds of Presbyterians; sixteen kinds of Methodists; seventeen kinds of Baptists; and nineteen kinds of Lutherans unite under their denominational standards, and it will be a comparatively easy thing to have Protestantism in America make common cause against the enemy of all good. The motto of the Evangelical Alliance is still a good rallying cry: "In essentials, unity; in unessentials, liberty; and, in all things, charity."

Vital Religion and a Christianity That Is Socially Fruitful Are More Than Organic Unity, writes President Emeritus W. F. Warren of Boston University.

MY answer to your question, "What should the churches of Protestant America do to meet the situation?" is simple. Like our Lord's compendium of the law and the prophets, it can be expressed in two items.

1. The leaders and the led in these churches, heartily repenting of their past failures, should now become consistent Americans. This means, of course, that they should with all sincerity believe in the Declaration of Independence, in the Constitution of the American Union, with all its amendments, and should uniformly act according to this faith. So doing, they will prize personal and political liberty not merely for

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

THE town of Bradford was decked with flags and bunting in honor of the homecoming of Ambulance Company 241, in which Richard Ward had served at the steering-wheel of the ambulance, losing his right hand at Château-Thierry. After the celebration Richard and his father, Rev. Dr. Ward, sat in the latter's study and talked about Dick's future, a problem which was complicated by the loss of his hand and his engagement to Requa Randall, to whom he also looked for advice in this matter. Dr. Ward's sermon on the first Sunday after the return of the soldiers decided Dick to become a foreign missionary.

CHAPTER THREE

THE front door bell rang, and Dr. Ward, quivering with rare excitement, stood up by his desk.

For several years, indeed from the beginning of his ministry in Bradford, he had established a custom of meeting any who had been touched by his preaching, or any who wished to see him on the religious life, in his little study in the parsonage after the Sunday evening service. He called this the Open Door. It had become as well known and established as any religious or social service of the church, and into the quiet of this little room, after the busy and sometimes exciting day, in the course of the years had come many perplexed and repentant souls, most of whom had gone out of the little room with happy tears on their faces and a song of deliverance in their hearts.

Mrs. Ward had gone to the door, and there came in a group of young men. There were so many of them they filled the study up full. Dr. Ward was overcome, but he had only just begun to express his welcome when Bert Chandler said, speaking in his abrupt manner:

"Dr. Ward, we know it's late, and we would have come earlier, but the chaplain came in on the nine-thirty, and we hadn't seen him for six months and thought he was dead. We brought him along. He wanted to come when he found out what we were coming for. Chaplain Hunter, Dr. Ward."

BUT Dick sprang forward and threw his arm about a man who had been the last to enter the room, crying out in a tone of delight:

"Oh, Chaplain! And you are alive!"

"Very much so, Dick," said Chaplain Hunter, hugging him with both arms, laughing and crying as Dr. Ward advanced through the group to greet him.

"Hunter!" he said, finally getting hold of one of the chaplain's hands. "Of course I know you! Welcome here! Welcome!"

"And to think he should be here to welcome, Dad! Why didn't you fellows tell me?"

Dick turned to the group with fiery gesture of arm and hand. Bert Chandler answered with his usual brevity.

"We didn't know it ourselves until the chaplain walked in on us."

"It's like a story out of Maupassant!"

"Or life," said Chaplain Hunter, his eye glistening as he glanced at his own boys of Company 241.

"Tell us!"

"No, I came here to listen to a greater adventure than my own. Dr. Ward, I don't want to obtrude my little escapes and adventures since I went down on that last transport that was torpedoed in the Mediterranean. There is going to be plenty of time to tell it."

"But, Dr. Ward, we haven't seen the chaplain since—since we heard of his death in Africa. It's like a miracle to see him here," said Underwood, who had been one of Dr. Ward's chorus before the war, as well as president of his young people's society and an enthusiastic Sunday school teacher.

the circle of "his boys" and quietly began.

"Dr. Ward, I can't tell you what a joy it is to me to be home again. I had been at Bayview only a short time when the war broke out, and never had the pleasure of meeting you, but your son, Dick—"

"Often mentioned you," said the doctor with a smile, the kind that radiated through the room. It seemed to him as if all of life in that little room thrilled with "adventure," as indeed it did.

"He saved my life! Dad, don't you remember I wrote" missionaries and chaplains to assist in the Palestine Relief. We were near the end of our trip through the Mediterranean. Saturday night I went to bed about midnight after an evening on deck that was one of the most beautiful I ever saw on the water. The moon was full, the ocean like a sea of glass. It was to be our last night on the boat, and somehow almost every one seemed to think the danger was over. We were in plain sight of a lighthouse flashing on the coast, and its welcome, or something, instilled a false sense of security. The only precaution I took was to sleep fully dressed except for shoes, coat and hat.

"ON the way over I heard the commander growling away to the effect that the ship stood no show anyway for she had thirteen ministers aboard! Apparently the hoodoo worked, for I had been asleep less than an hour when the first torpedo struck. There was no loud explosion, just a dull, heavy thud, that shook the boat from stem to stern. No one needed to tell us what had happened.

"When you ask me what I did, my answer is: I grabbed my family pictures and ran. As a matter of fact, there was a little more to the program than that. I switched on the light, awoke my roommate, jumped into my tall boots (without lacing), pulled on my sweater, coat, overcoat, life preserver and hat, grabbed the articles mentioned, and ran as aforesaid.

"Needless to say, nerves were a trifle taut, and a bit of humor which flashed across my mind tearing up the back stairway sixty miles a minute helped a lot to save the situation. I happened to think that I might stumble on the flopping shoelaces, and the answering thought was: 'I will have to be a lively shoemaker to get ahead of the boots for the next minute or two.'

"The lifeboat was in the water four minutes after the explosion, with the stern of the steamer already half under. We were the first boat away on our side, and I think the first of either side.

"The steamer disappeared just thirteen minutes after the first explosion. I shall certainly never forget that sight. She settled stern first, the propeller finally coming up entirely out of the water and silhouetted against the full moon. Finally, as the water reached the boiler, there came a terrific explosion which broke her in the middle and she sank like a shot.

"CONDITIONS couldn't have been better, as it was light as day and perfectly calm. We were in the boat only about twenty minutes when we disembarked on the deck of an English destroyer. They said she was a old-type boat, but, old or new, believe me, she was the best-looking boat I ever saw.

"The most impressive moment I ever had was when we lined up on the deck and our leader called the roll. We were pretty sure every one was there, but not positive, and when the last man answered 'Here,' the crowd cheered their heads off and we responded standing at attention and sang the Doxology and 'God Save the King.'

There were so many of them they filled the study up full

"You ought to hear him tell about getting torpedoed. We never had any of that!" and Underwood spoke with a tone of regret that sent the whole room into a roar.

"Yes, give us that now," Dr. Ward said earnestly, bustling about, Dick and Bert helping to seat the visitors. "We have all the future before us for the thing that brought you here tonight. Give us your story, Hunter."

CHAPLAIN WILLIS HUNTER, a man of thirty-five, former pastor of the church at Bayview, next town to Bradford, glanced affectionately around

"I have the floor," interrupted Hunter, blushing through his tan as if he were a girl. "Let me get this torpedoing off my mind, and then we'll get at the real business of the evening, for I feel, sir, after what the boys have told me of your sermon this morning, that we are on the eve of one of the greatest adventures this country or the world will ever know.

"Just a word. I went out with the first bunch of chaplains that sailed in 1917; got in touch with Company 241 in France, and was on my way six months ago to Syria with a transport containing Y. M. C. A. secretaries,

"I saved one complete outfit of clothing, overcoat, hat, gloves, my old gray sweater, both family pictures, camera, and razor. Everything else was lost, but somehow or other things didn't seem to amount to much after I once got my feet on the land.

"And that's all, only somehow the report got out that I was lost, with a number of others, and my unit was switched from Beirut to Cape Town on the new Zulu Mission work so suddenly that no word of my being all right ever reached the boys in France, and I thought I could give them a little surprise on my way to Bayview from New York. And here I am, thankful to the good God, after plenty of adventures in Africa that can wait. For I want to know of the new adventure we are going into." And Chaplain Hunter looked around the circle of earnest faces with a gleam in his eye that reminded Dick of the look he gave him when he went out that night into "No Man's Land" and brought him in safely back to the Company.

A SILENCE fell over the circle. It had listened in tense mood while the chaplain was relating his adventure. But now the object of their visit to the Open Door seemed to come at once into prominence. This group of young men had lived in the atmosphere of exciting and changing events so long and continuously that every one present had come home with the thought of becoming a part of the commonplaces of Bradford and its daily routine, getting into business, marrying, having a home and "settling down."

But Dr. Ward's sermon had stirred them like another call to the colors. How was the world to be saved, after all, without saviors? And the heroic note had been struck in his sermon with a power that the preacher did not know himself.

He looked around the group now and was almost astounded at the sight of those present. He had known these boys in his parish since they were little fellows in the Sunday school. Now here they were, tanned, muscular, serious-eyed, ready to grapple with big things, feeling the stir of life, eager for its struggle.

Almost before a question had been asked, the room seemed to be electric with prayer.

They had all knelt when Dr. Ward went to his knees. His prayer was an outpouring for wisdom, guidance, strength, revealing power. The chaplain followed, and in his first sentence Dr. Ward understood something of the secret of the chaplain's influence over his boys. He said,

"Father of us all, we are not only in the hollow of thy hand, but in the bend of thine arm."

And then with beseeching power he seemed to break open the very gates of the other world and reveal the greatness of the common purpose that had brought them into that little room to consult together.

THE boys all offered short prayers, simple, direct, personal, a revelation to Dr. Ward of spiritual feeling. And it was noticeable that in all this there was no straining for effect, no praying to others, but each voice seemed to be a personal, direct appeal for individual wisdom and strength.

Dr. Ward was wise in his counsel.

"We have not come, I am sure, to propose any definite fixed plan tonight. I understand the main purpose of every one of you is to enter upon the great adventure of world conquest in obedience to the Master's command to go into all the world. That determination is so serious, so vital, so full of meaning to you all, that I am sure we shall have to meet many times and plan very deeply and carefully if we carry out the command as the Master wishes."

They were all so greatly interested that they remained in conference until after midnight. The chaplain's face glowed with enthusiasm. As the group finally went out, the chaplain's last word to Dr. Ward lingered in very heart:

"Dr. Ward, we have just come out of a great world adventure. But I believe we are now proposing to go into another so much greater that no man can measure its dynamic or weigh its dimensions."

WHEN the Doctor had shut the door and had come back into his study, Dick was still there, standing by his father's desk.

And it was at that moment that Dr. Ward thought of one question he had been several times on the point of asking his son when he first came to him that evening after declaring his purpose. He put the question now with the usual characteristic family frankness:

"Dick, lad, how about Requa? Have you thought of her? Will she go with you into 'all the world'?"

Dick turned at the question and disclosed a startled look at his father. It was several moments before he answered.

Then he answered slowly, "Father, I had forgotten Requa."

Dick repeated the words as he stood there:

"I never thought of Requa!" and then added, "But I'll have to think of her now. Her father will never let her go."

"How do you know he won't?"

"She said so."

"But Randall will not oppose her going if her happiness is in question."

"But suppose it's a question of his happiness?" Dick asked with more shrewd knowledge of Requa's father than Dr. Ward supposed he possessed.

"I don't know, lad; you will have to go and see him."

DICK had started to go out of the study. He stopped at the door, and said slowly:

"Dad, do you know, I'm afraid of Requa's father. I never was afraid of the Germans, and I know you don't believe I am a coward, but I would rather go over the ridge at Château-Thierry any time than face him and ask him to do a thing I know he doesn't want to do."

Dr. Ward laughed.

"Is it as bad as all that? Go to, my son. Does Requa belong to him more than to you?"

"She belongs to me. We belong to each other," said Dick doggedly. "But all the same, I'm afraid. How could I forget Requa? How could I?"

He went up to his room asking the question and in addition to it the other, the one he dreaded to ask, "What would Requa's father say?" He smiled grimly to himself as he sat there in the dark, for he had not turned on his light, wondering what Requa's father would say, how he would act, what Requa would do if her father refused to give his consent. And the longer he thought of it, the more he feared the outcome.

For the Mothers and Babies

IT is said that there is three times as much danger in being a baby in New York as there is in being a soldier in the front-line trenches in France. At this time, when war is destroying adult life and lowering the birth-rate, it is gratifying to observe the beneficent activities of such an organization as the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, which is doing valuable service in the reduction of infant mortality. During the past year the infirmary has treated in its clinics about 50,000 women and children from the congested districts of New York, cared for more than 700 mothers and new-born babies, made 22,000 medical visits to homes of the poor, and given dispensary treatment to 28,741 women and children. Its medical and surgical staff of women are taking the place of the medical men who have been called to France. These beneficent activities have been carried on since 1857, when it began training nurses, and many of its alumnae served in the Civil and Spanish wars, and others are now in active service in France. The infirmary is now launching a campaign to raise $200,000 to re-establish its very necessary work.

The History of a Van Camp Soup

A Parisian Chef

In the Hotel Ritz, created the original recipe. It embodied some 20 ingredients, and 23 hours were required in the making.

In a culinary contest held in Paris this recipe took the prize. Thus this soup became the leader in that city of fine cookery.

Materials Analyzed

These Van Camp scientists fix a standard for every ingredient. Every material must come up to that standard. Some materials are selected by analysis to insure against variation.

Thus a Van Camp Soup is always at its best—exactly like the model soup adopted.

Scientific Cooks

Later this chef was employed by Van Camp, and that recipe came with him. Here our culinary experts, college trained, worked three years to improve it. By testing countless blends they evolved a savor which amazed the chef himself.

All Van Camp Soups are perfected in that way. Our scientific cooks start with a famous recipe. They try out hundreds of ways to improve it. And they never stop until they reach the limit in deliciousness.

The Final Formula

Then every step and detail is recorded in formula. And that formula is always followed to the dot.

In every Van Camp Soup you get a famous recipe perfected in this way. You get the very utmost in blend and ingredients.

They come to you ready to serve, at a trifling cost—the finest soups ever created.

Try two or three, and you will never again be content to serve an ordinary soup.

VAN CAMP'S Soups — 18 Kinds

Other Van Camp Products Include

Pork and Beans Evaporated Milk Spaghetti Peanut Butter
Chili Con Carne Catsup Chili Sauce, etc.

Prepared in the Van Camp Kitchens at Indianapolis

Van Camp's Pork and Beans

Also perfected by these culinary experts. Beans selected by analysis are baked for hours by super-heated steam. Baked with a sauce which is the final result of testing 856 formulas.

Van Camp's Spaghetti

Based on a famous Italian recipe which our experts spent years in perfecting. Never in Naples or anywhere has one ever tasted a Spaghetti which compares with this.

Van Camp's Peanut Butter

Made from a perfect blend of Spanish and Virginia peanuts, with every germ removed. The germs are slightly bitter. It means a new delight to lovers of peanut butter.

"The LIQUID VENEER People"

EVERY one knows the brave story of Helen Keller. Every one knows the great barrier that she faced at the very beginning of her life—the barrier that was an almost unsurmountable wall between her and the rest of the world. And every one knows how she overcame that barrier.

Helen Keller was a perfectly normal baby when she was born, but, at the age of nineteen months, she contracted an illness that left her deaf and blind.

Deaf and blind—and only a baby! That was the barrier that loomed before Helen Keller. Living in a world of eternal darkness, and eternal silence was to be her portion in life.

Teaching the blind and the deaf was a new sort of work when Helen Keller was a baby. But a certain clever teacher took the child in hand and with infinite patience and resource taught her to build a new life out of the sense of touch. And Helen Keller built that new life so efficiently that the eternal silence was touched with music; for at the age of twenty she entered college, and graduated from it in the prescribed number of years; since that time she has been the author of a number of books and magazine articles.

Lately Helen Keller has been working for her country, and the other day she received a letter from President Wilson commending her for her endeavors in the Fourth Liberty Loan campaign.

THE work that Helen Keller did in the Liberty Bond campaign was interesting and unusual. She sent out an appeal broadcast, with very wonderful results. Phrases from the letter that she sent are extremely interesting:

"The long night of humanity is over and done," she wrote. "The air is tremulous with the soundless hum of a new day. I tell you that the hour for deliverance for all men is at hand; the purpose of the ages is being fulfilled. Man's hope of liberty, so long thwarted, crushed and smothered, is coming with the new day. Men and women are growing conscious of their power—more and more in their purpose."

So wrote Helen Keller, who is deaf and blind—and who has conquered affliction!

Many lives have been ruined by serious disasters than that which overcame Helen Keller at the very beginning of her life. Many souls have been broken on the altar of adversity that we less sharp than the that Helen Keller thrown against. But are people who have trouble with a smiling and who, in spite of their troubles, and sometimes because of them, have achieved.

If Helen Keller has been visited by deafness and blindness, she undoubtedly has been a perfectly normal girl, with health and good spirit and cleverness. But, because of her affliction, she developed talents and genius that might never have found place in her life.

In her work for the Fourth Liberty Loan, Helen Keller wrote an appeal that people read and answered first, because it was a first appeal, and secondly because it was written by Helen Keller—who is a figure of national importance. If she had never had to struggle against the that she had to struggle against, she would doubtless never have been able to write an appeal so moving and beautiful that it would be of help to her country.

OH, friends of mine, great cross, even a cross that is made of deafness and deafness, has its place in the plan of things. It may be hard to bear, but it may be a terrible obstacle and yet it may go into the making of the great things of these ages. It may be the keynote of the mute harmony that runs through the song of life!

Helen Keller

A troubled life with little sunshine in it;
A life that, like the rosebud, knows the thorn;
A life with cares and doubts and fears eternal;
A life with every bitter sorrow torn;
A life set down to bloom in desert places,
Where hope lies dead and heartbeats totter slow;
A life with great defeats and tiny blessings,
When faith itself is pale as drifted snow.

And yet a life met bravely, sweetly, wisely,
A life supreme with faith when all is night,
Will make the heavens ring with silent music,
And turn the very darkness into light!

Food Administration Plans

THE United States Food Administration announces that because of the epidemic of influenza throughout the country it has postponed the opening of its new conservation campaign until December 1. The original plans contemplated the opening of this campaign October 27. Director B. S. Allen of the Educational Division of the U. S. Food Administration writes: "The change was made imperative by health conditions and advised by the Food Administrators of the different states throughout the country. Because of the forbidding of gatherings of people on account of the epidemic, the aid of the churches, the schools, the four-minute speakers, libraries, lodges and gatherings of patriotic workers could not be secured for the strenuous campaign in the planning of which they were an essential part. It is hoped that by December 1 necessity for quarantine conditions will have disappeared."

"In this campaign," Director Allen adds, "the Home Card is to be placed in the twenty million kitchens throughout America to emphasize the need for continued and increased food conservation for the benefit of the stricken peoples of Europe, and as an inspiration to continuing the sacrifice which has enabled the Allied nations to maintain the war and allowed the transportation of our own troops to France and their maintenance there. The Home Card will be a direct personal message to each home, from the Government at Washington, pointing out the part for every individual to render practical assistance three times a day in the winning of the war."

"The Food Administration wishes again to emphasize the absolute necessity for increased conservation and the total elimination of waste in foods. This is a national war obligation that continually grows greater. With a crop production for 1918 having a nourishment value about the same as that of last year, our food obligations to the Allied nations have increased fifty per cent. as a minimum, and the willing assumption of this extra burden by our people makes it possible to provide ships for the continuous transportation and sustenance of our fighting men in Europe. Recent events abroad are justification of the program and should be effective inspiration to our people."

"It should not be forgotten that with each advance of our armed forces abroad immediate necessity arises to make food provision for the people of the recovered territories. The coming of peace—if it should come soon—will not add one pound of food to the present supply nor release us from our moral obligations to assist the Allied nations. On the contrary, it would add materially to America's opportunity to assist humanity, as it would afford opportunity to get to the hungry millions of Poland, Rumania, Armenia and to other peoples who cannot now be reached."

Marion Harland's Corner

With Thanksgiving-Day in Sight

It is now my happy duty to confer with Cornerites concerning "substitutes" and economies that are to take the place of the customary items in this year's holiday feast. Turkeys go naturally with the great day as mince-pie and plum-cake with Christmas. But the birds which haven't gone to take Thanksgiving to France fly too high for many of us. In many homes prudence has had its perfect work for weeks past in dictating self-denial in the matter of eating. Parents and children have agreed cheerfully to abstain from small luxuries that Thanksgiving Day may not be turkeyless.

I am writing now for the tens of thousands who feel conscientiously that the appearance of the plump turkey at the foot of the board on the time-honored feast-day would be a sinful luxury.

I do not insist that what I carefully refrain from branding with the obnoxious title of "substitutes" shall take the place of conventional and well-loved dishes. I do know that they are palatable, and far more economical than the dainties prepared with almost religious rites by our foremothers.

THE notable cook from whom I have borrowed the first recipe on our pocket had no thought in her day—forty years back—of making her savory and do duty upon Thanksgiving Day. She offered it in what she called "pinch-me-in-the-poultry-yard." When turkeys were out of season, my ingenious house-mother invented

Mock Turkey

Get your butcher to bone a breast of veal, and to cut from the same a steak about ten inches long, six wide, and over an inch thick. Must be trimmed neatly, and the bones and trimmings be reserved.

Lay it upon your kneading-board and pound lightly into smoothness with a potato-masher. Squeeze a teaspoonful of lemon-juice upon it to insure tenderness. Have ready a forcemeat of bread-crumbs, well seasoned with butter, salt and paprika. Spread it, half an inch thick, upon the meat and fill the latter up neatly, enclosing the forcemeat. Bind into a roll with soft cotton string and pin into shape, here and there, with wooden skewers. The oblong roll should be placed at the ends upon the stuffing, and sewed or stitched into tapering tips to keep in the stuffing. Lay it in the dripping-pan and pour over it two cupfuls of hot weak stock, made from the veal bones and trimmings. Cover closely and roast for nearly two hours, basting frequently with the gravy. When it is done, transfer to a hot dish, carefully clip and remove the strings, and draw out the skewers, keeping the shape entire and the joined sides downward.

Thicken the gravy left in the pan with browned flour and season with pepper, salt, a dash of Worcestershire sauce, and a teaspoonful of tomato catsup. Boil up, stirring until smooth, and send to table in a gravy-boat. Serve the meat with apple-sauce, unless you can get cranberries to carry out the poultry idea. Carve perpendicularly, giving some of the filling with each portion.

SHOULD you prefer poultry of some kind for the Thanksgiving dinner, instead of imitations however ingenious and attractive, and the right thing be out of reach, do not forget chicken. A fowl of mature age may serve our purpose if cleverly prepared.

Chicken Pie (Cheap and Good)

To begin with, secure the legs, neck and head. A caterer once told me that his best chicken soups were made of the legs and heads of fowls bought by the quantity from meat-nders.

And, often, some inches of the neck go with the head. The dressed fowl is more comely than it. Scald, and pick all the feathers from the head and neck, and scald the feet. Then, scrape these last lightly to loosen the scales accumulated during the creature's long months (or years) of service. Cover four inches deep with cold water, and put over the fire where it will come very slowly to the boil. Let the pot—closely covered—simmer for four or five hours. Do not season at all. It will retard the process of gravy-making. Do this in the evening. In the morning, skim the grease from the surface of the cold liquid, scrape the bones, and mince finely what comes out. Set aside while you cut up the raw fowl.

Wash and arrange in a broad pot in the following order. First, a layer of chicken; next, one of fat salt pork, chopped small; third, a sprinkling of minced onion. Proceed in this order until the materials are used up and cover all with the prepared gravy, without straining or seasoning. Fit on a close top and set at the side of the range where the contents of the pot will not reach the boiling-point under an hour. The secret of tenderness with tough poultry and meat lies in very slow and steady cooking. It ought not to be necessary to warn cooks on this point, but it often is. Premature and fast boiling hardens the fibers. Therefore, give our fowl all the time you have for the work. Five hours of slow cooking are none too much. Then take from the fire and let it cool—still covered. When it is cold and you are ready to make the pie, drain off the gravy, add a little chopped parsley, pepper and a tablespoonful of browned flour rubbed into a paste with butter. Stir well and, having laid the fowl in order within a deep dish lined with pastry, pour the gravy over it, and fit on the top crust. Bake in a moderate oven, covering the crust with white paper until it is firm. Then bring to a tempting brown.

It is well to cook the fowl the day before Thanksgiving, leaving only the final stages of putting it in the dish, etc., for the important holiday. I am not afraid to guarantee the excellence of the dish if these directions be obeyed.

"If the iron be blunt, . . . then must he put to more strength," says the wisest of books. Just now, we should apply the principle in a hundred different ways. Ingenuity, patience and clever adaptation of taste to materials are so many forms of strength.

FOUR correspondents have told me that carrots are a toothsome addition to the pumpkin pie without which Thanksgiving Day is hardly itself.

"Two-thirds pumpkin and one-third boiled and mashed carrots," is the rule.

A fifth member tells of a successful experiment with mashed potato, that "surprised and pleased us all." She mixed one-fourth as much potato as she had pumpkin into a smooth soft mass, treating it as she would the pumpkin alone.

In regions where pumpkins are scarce and dear, these suggestions will be valuable. In the recipe given herewith, I have assumed that the simple pure article is not out of arms' length of the thrifty housemother whom I have seated in imagination in the easiest chair in my cozy study while I write.

Pumpkin Pie

Four eggs; one quart of milk; a cupful of sugar; three cupfuls of stewed pumpkin rubbed through the colander or vegetable press; spices to taste. Some like a dash of ginger in addition to mace and cinnamon. If you substitute corn sirup or other liquid-sweet for sugar, stir into it an even teaspoonful of corn starch to add consistency to the mixture. Beat the yolks light with the sugar, and add gradually the pumpkin, then the milk and spices. Lastly, whip in the stiffened whites.

Bake in pie-plates lined with a good crust and lay strips of the pastry, lattice-wise, upon the top. Bake, covered, until the contents are firm, then brown. Eat cold, passing cheese with it.

Baked Chestnut

A pleasing variety in the regulation Thanksgiving fare may be secured by country people who have access to chestnut groves. The large Spanish chestnuts are still better for the purpose, but costly by comparison with the native product.

Boil the chestnuts and skin while they are hot. Let them get cold, cut each in half, and lay them in a buttered pudding-dish. Have ready a good brown gravy made by boiling cracked bones for some hours, letting them get cold in the liquid, then straining this off, thickening with brown flour rolled in butter (or a substitute) and seasoning with salt and pepper. Pour over the chestnuts, cover, and bake until bubbling hot.

They go finely with poultry.

Will members accept from me hearty and affectionate wishes for them upon this, the first of our winter festivals, with thanks for the cordial support they have extended to me from the first days of our association up to the present time? Each week has knit us more closely together in the sense of personal sympathy and appreciation of the cardinal truth that we are co-workers for the good of our fellow men and the advancement of the Kingdom that shall have no end.

They Shoot Puffed Grains From Guns

Yes, that's a curious fact.

These thin, flimsy bubbles—the daintiest grain foods in existence—are created in that way.

Sealed in those guns, the grains are subjected to an hour of fearful heat. The moisture in each food cell is thus changed to steam. Then the guns are shot, the steam explodes. Every food cell is blasted to pieces.

The grains come out as airy globules, flaky and toasted, puffed to eight times normal size.

Not Merely To Delight You

But this whole process serves a scientific purpose. It was invented by Prof. A. P. Anderson. And the object is to fit the food cells to digest.

Each kernel of grain contains millions of food cells. Ordinary cooking doesn't break half of them. This gun-shooting method is the only way known to break all of them.

Remember that. These flavory, fragile bubble grains seem like food confections. But they are whole wheat, whole rice or corn hearts made so digestible that every atom feeds.

It's the ideal way to serve these grain foods, as well as the most enticing. Every child should get them every day.

Puffed Wheat being a whole-wheat product, no substitute need be bought with it.

crushed through it. Two other wooden cars were ripped open by the structure of the tunnel. On November 3, eighty-nine were known to have been killed, including practically all of the passengers in the third car, and more than 100 were injured. The train was jammed with people owing to a strike of motormen having greatly reduced the service. The strike was settled before daylight the next morning, the company agreeing to observe regulations of the War Labor Board, which it had resisted. Three of the operatives on the train were arrested, charged with homicide, but the Mayor of New York on November 4 started a hearing to discover and develop the guilt of the men higher up.

BULGARIA A REPUBLIC. King Boris of Bulgaria, who succeeded his father on the throne on October 3, abdicated on November 2, and a peasant government was formed under the leadership of M. Stambuliwsky, for some time chief of the peasants and agrarians of Bulgaria, who was reported to command a republican army of 40,000 men.

2,000,000 IN FRANCE. On November 1, 2,000,000 American soldiers were in France. Draft calls issued on November 2 called for 290,773 new men within three weeks. When these men are in service, the strength of the army at home and abroad will have passed the 4,000,000 mark.

REDS PLAN MASSACRE. Dispatches coming from Petrograd through Copenhagen, on October 30, reported that the Bolsheviks were openly declaring that they intended to make the night of November 10 a general St. Bartholomew's night, in which they would murder the entire bourgeoisie and intellectual classes. The announcement was said to have created a panic in Petrograd. The correspondent of a London paper wrote under date of October 30: "It is futile to cherish the illusion that the Bolsheviks do not mean what they say. During September their official organ announced daily 500 names of persons shot in cold blood without trial and without reason. If not for the sake of Russia, then for the sake of humanity, of liberty, of all civilization, and for the security of peace that at last draws near, it is high time to put a stop to atrocities as fiendish as any committed by the Germans in this war." Other reports told of the Germans evacuating Russia and devastating the country, as they went through, leaving it without grain or cattle. It was reported that children were dying of starvation because milk could not be obtained.

On October 31 dispatches coming from Amsterdam, Holland, reported the murder, on October 27, of Madam Breshkovskaya, the "Little Grandmother" of the Russian Revolution, who was shot on a charge of opposing the Bolshevik régime.

THEY CAME THROUGH THE SMOKE. A story comes through the Associated Press from the American forces north of Verdun of the surrender of fifty-one Germans, through a ruse. For several days Germans had been creeping unarmed to a point midway between the lines where bread and tobacco were given them by American troops. Finally, on a certain day, each man who came was told that the next time all comers would receive five sacks of tobacco instead of one. Instead of coming in in groups of three or four, the next day fifty-one men came unarmed in search of tobacco and food. The Germans were hospitably received, split into small groups, and invited to come to another spot for the distribution. This spot proved to be the Intelligence Office of the American Division, and the Germans were informed that they were prisoners. At first they indignantly demanded to be sent back to their lines with their five sacks of tobacco apiece, but receiving the extra packages of the weed, they were at last reconciled to the new condition, especially as they saw the treatment accorded by the American soldiers to their prisoners.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. For more than a year Germany has been short of rubber and her auto-trucks have been running on steel tires. On October 31 evidence reached the American lines showing that the Germans were also short of gasoline, advancing troops finding many tractors in perfect condition abandoned because of the lack of fuel. . . . The great American army of knitters supplied to the Red Cross since the beginning of the war 2,240,514 sweaters, 776,615 mufflers, 1,054,814 wristlets, 645,961 helmets, 2,143,921 pairs of socks, and 419,800 comfort kits. . . . A Holland-American liner landed in New York on October 29 with 4,000 tons of German-made goods, including toys which had been purchased in Germany and paid for in 1914 by American firms. The American Defense League immediately began a campaign to prevent the sale of these goods in competition with American-made merchandise. Two of the consignees notified the Government that they would not receive the goods. . . . The Shipping Board announced on October 31 that peace would not halt the nation's shipbuilding, but that the present program of 15,000,000 tons would be completed, and that the only change which the coming peace would bring would be the dropping out of inefficient yards and inefficient workmen. On November 3 it was stated that, with all yards pushed to capacity for a year, there would still be a shortage of ships. . . . On November 4 fighting was reported between Ukrainian and Polish troops in Galicia, the city of Lemberg having been taken by Ukrainians supported by German and Austrian regiments. Przemysl was in the hands of the Ruthenians. . . . Andrew D. White, a founder and for 18 years president of Cornell College, Ithaca, N. Y., died November 4 aged 86.

Americans and Italians Smash Foe Lines

catch up with the fleeing Huns. By evening the French-American line was drawn almost straight from Rethel, north of the Aisne, to the Meuse near Stenay, the last outpost of the great Argonne Forest was in Allied hands, and the Boche was hurrying somewhere faster than before. The main armies could not go forward faster than the guns and transport could follow. Patrols, both infantry and air, found it difficult to locate the foe. Flying was rendered dangerous by low clouds and mist, but Captain Eddie Rickenbacker made a flight early in the day bringing back valuable information, and later in the day other Americans got over the enemy's lines and reported the Germans everywhere in retreat. Even east of the Meuse their columns of men and transport were headed northward and eastward, although they had not yet been attacked east of the river, which the Americans were contented to face for the time being while they pressed toward Sedan. Our advanced troops were on November 3, less than five miles from the important Montmedy-Mezierres railway, the main artery of supply for the whole German force still in France. This line, which for a week had been under the fire of long range guns, was thus brought within ordinary artillery range. The prisoners taken exceeded 5,000 while over 60 guns were captured in the three days.

On the rest of western front, the fighting was not particularly spectacular during the week. The earlier days were given up to bettering of positions and the following up of the enemy where he was drawing back. On November 1, General Haig attacked southeast of Valenciennes, taking three thousand prisoners and positions which made the further German tenure of the city impossible. Canadian troops entered and passed beyond Valenciennes on the 2nd after hard fighting in the suburbs.

October 31st saw a combined all Allied attack in Flanders between the Scheldt and the Lys, southwest of Ghent. Belgian, French, American and British troops took part. The enemy was pressed back everywhere against or over the Scheldt and all the high ground between the two rivers was taken, the Allies reaching positions within ten miles of Ghent. Over 10,000 prisoners were taken and 98 enemy airplanes were downed in one day's fighting.

General Liggett's American First Army continued to follow the fleeing Boche on November 4, finally catching up with him about nine miles south of Sedan, where he offered organized resistance. With the position of the enemy thus determined and his railway lines under artillery fire and cut at two places, near Conflans and Montmedy, the American force was turned eastward across the Meuse. Patrols sent over on the 4th proved that the enemy was there in force and were withdrawn. On the 5th the Americans attacked along the whole river front from Sivry to beyond Pouilly, making good the crossings and throwing the Germans back from the heights commanding the stream. As this was written they were still going.

November 4 saw also a new attack by the English and French between the Oise and the Aisne where the Germans were pushed back along a thin mile front for more than three miles. On November 5, with their railway communications cut by the American first army and their front shattered by many Allied salients, the Germans were in retreat along the whole 1 mile front in France. The British were within eight miles of the border fortress of Maubeuge, having passed the Mormal Forest and the Belgians were in the suburbs of Ghent. Desperate fighting was in progress along the whole line, but with the Germans losing and retreating and the Allies gaining in speed and in morale, the French army especially striking terrible blows with the strong arm of the avenger.

Secretary for Foreign Affairs. The Emperor was reported to be at castle of Godollo. He made no attempt to stem the rising tide of freedom which meant the overthrow of the unsteady throne. Count Tisza, former Hungarian Premier, considered one of the group which launched the war was assassinated in Budapest, November 2.

The temper of Germany was illustrated by an article in the Swabische Tagwacht, in which the writer declared "We are vanquished!" After admitting that the troops, although still in occupied territory, were unable to maintain themselves there or achieve victory, he continued: "The months of resistance would cost the lives of 100,000 men and double that number of wounded. We have already lost so many men that the provinces are depopulated. . . . Peace will certainly cost us dear, but we shall be spared the forces that are necessary for economic revival. . . . we continue the war, the enemy will invade Germany and the conditions imposed would be still worse than those he would lay down today. The armistice conditions will soon arrive and their publication will mean acceptance. The people must be prepared for this."

Not only did dispatches indicate with constantly increasing assurance the impotence of Germany, her inability to do otherwise than accept such terms as the Allies should submit, but the end of the Hohenzollerns appeared to be approaching on rapid wings. On November 1, the Emperor was reported to have gone to Great Headquarters, whither he had been followed by Vice Chancellor Delbrueck, who was on an important mission for the Chancellor. It was supposed that Dr. Delbrueck would lay before the Emperor an abdication document.

took possession of the country as far south as Vlona. From that time until the Austrian retirement the scanty crops of the Albanians were requisitioned by the half-fed soldiers of the Austro-Hungarian army of occupation, and the Albanians were hungry.

Today Albania is a ruined and devastated land peopled by spectres of famine.

Through all the miseries of these recent years the Albanians have kept burning in their hearts an unquenchable flame of patriotism and a longing for peace and security and good government. No one knows of a time when the Albanians were not in their strip of country between Macedonia and the Adriatic Sea. They were there ages before Hellas founded ancient Greece. At the beginning of the Christian era the Apostle Paul preached to them and laid the foundation for their conversion to Christianity. They were known then as the Illyrians. Later their King Skanderbeg, otherwise known to history as the Captain of the Janissaries, saved Europe from devastation by Attila the Hun. It was the Albanian army under Skanderbeg that checked the Huns. For this Europe still owes to Albania an unpaid debt of gratitude. With the passing of Skanderbeg, Albania fell into the hands of the Turks nearly five hundred years ago. The Balkan wars of 1912 and 1913 set her free.

Early in 1914 Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany and Austro-Hungary made Albania an independent nation, with Prince William of Wied as ruler. He was selected for this post by the German Kaiser. William of Wied cannot well. His intentions were excellent. But—you cannot govern a half-starved people without money for running expenses. The five Powers gave William a country wherein men, women and children were dropping dead of starvation; but did not give to him any money. On September 6 William abandoned Albania to her fate and turned to Germany. Later I heard that he had rejoined the German army and that he had been decorated by the Kaiser.

AFTER William's departure came an Essad Pasha at the head of a mythical "army of ten thousand men." Essad planted a rusty cannon or two on the road to Durres and demanded that the legislative assembly elect him "Provisional President." This mentally unbalanced individual, attended by a tattered company of about 500 men, ruled Durres (Durazzo) until he fled at the approach of the Austrians.

Geographically, Albania is the western end of the Balkan peninsula. It has the Adriatic Sea on the west, Greece on the south, Macedonia on the east, and Serbia and Montenegro on the north. In area it is about twice the size of the State of New Jersey. It has the latitude of New York and the climate of Virginia. In the mountains, however, the winter climate is that of New Hampshire.

With the foregoing brief summary I place the case of Albania before the people of the United States, asking the same sympathy and help that we have given to Cuba and the Philippines.

I suggest that those eminent and highly capable gentlemen who so generously and ably seconded my efforts to relieve distress in Albania now come together for the purpose of bringing Albania's condition to the attention of President Wilson, and, with the President's approval and guidance, calling into consultation representatives of the sixty thousand Albanians in the United States, to the end that Albania may have a man's chance for life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Foremost among those supporters of my past efforts in behalf of Albania I will name here the Rev. Frederick Lynch, D.D., editor of the Christian Work. No one knows quite so well as I how much this man has done to help Albania. Having done so much it now is his privilege to do more. I feel certain that the other gentlemen will join with him in this new work for the upbuilding of a long-suffering and deserving people.

I will be glad to answer any inquiries sent me by readers of the Christian Herald concerning the future of Albania. Such letters may be addressed to me in care of this journal.

The Preacher and the Blacksmith

ON entering upon his new circuit, a Methodist pastor had a blacksmith shoe his horse. The story goes that when the horse was shod and the fee paid for, the blacksmith remarked: "You are the new Methodist preacher, ain't you?" On the preacher answering, "Yes," the blacksmith said, "I don't know whether anybody has told you or not, but I make it a point to kick every new Methodist preacher sent here." After the preacher tried in vain to reason with the man, he said, "Well, I will try to make the best of it I can," and he laid off his coat. Soon the preacher had the blacksmith down and astraddle of him, punching him in the side with his fists. The blacksmith was begging to be let up. The preacher replied, as he continued to punch him, "I will let you up if you will pray," to which the blacksmith answered, "I can't pray." The preacher continued to punch him, the blacksmith begging more earnestly and pathetically, until he got the more punishment, while the preacher, to all his appeals, answered, "I won't let you up till you pray." The blacksmith continued pleading pathetically, and finally the preacher said, "I will say the prayer, and you pray it after me," to which the blacksmith agreed. Then the preacher picked him up. Ever after, the blacksmith is one of the staunchest friends the preacher had. Not long after receiving this much-needed lesson, the blacksmith is converted and became one of the staunchest church members of the preacher's charge.

Germany is the blacksmith; the United States, including America, are the Methodist preacher. We are now astraddle of Germany and Germany is begging for "peace"—begging to be let up. As the preacher knew well that he let the blacksmith up before he prayed, and before he was thoroughly conquered, meant the renewal of the fight as soon as the blacksmith got ready for it, so we ought to remember that to let Germany off before she prays—before she is completely conquered—means that the war must all be fought over again as soon as Germany can get ready for it. So, for us to thoroughly conquer Germany before letting Germany off is as much a religious duty as it was for the preacher to thoroughly conquer the blacksmith.

A Century of Teaching

FOR three days, beginning October 8, the people of Auburn, N. Y., celebrated the centennial of the Auburn Theological Seminary, which was founded in 1818 for the specific purpose of educating Presbyterian ministers to serve the growing population of Western New York. The plans, which, made a year in advance, had contemplated a grand musical pageant, had to be given up, because the war had taken the best musicians. A banquet, at which Secretary of State Robert Lansing was the principal speaker, was attended by 500 delegates and citizens. Addresses showing the growth of the institution and the progress of religious thought were made to the delegates and to the residents of the city by such distinguished speakers as Dr. James Dexter Taylor of Natal, South Africa; Dr. John E. Williams of Nanking, China; Governor Whitman of New York; President J. Ross Stevenson of Princeton Theological Seminary; Professor William Adams Brown of Union Theological Seminary; President Jacob Gould Schurman of Cornell University; Professor Edward Caldwell Moore of Harvard University; President George Alexander of the Presbyterian Board of Missions; President Frederick C. Ferry of Hamilton College; Moderator Frank Smith of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States; President George Black Stewart of the Auburn Seminary, and President William McKibbin of Lane Theological Seminary.

An "X" Liquid Repair in a Cracked Cylinder Stands 2000 Pounds Pressure!

EVERYBODY has met the "know-it-all" type of man. When you tell him something extraordinary he's sure to say "it can't be done."

Maybe this kind of a car owner won't believe that "X" Liquid has repaired the inner wall of a cracked cylinder making it as good as new—and saving the car owner over $150 in repairs!

Yet the facts are on record—and can be verified.

* * *

It is no unusual thing for "X" Liquid to repair cracks in valve pockets—in waterjackets—in parts of the cooling system where for any reason welding isn't practical or economical.

And as for small holes in the radiator, pump, connections, etc.—"X" will repair one leak or a thousand—in ten minutes. And do a better job than can be had for $25 worth of soldering.

"X" Liquid is the only practical, scientific method of repairing leaks without danger to the cooling system. It doesn't weaken the radiator as soldering does; nor does it choke the cooling system and make the cure worse than the disease—as is the case with radiator cements, meals and such "dopes."

How "X" Liquid Reduces Upkeep Costs

KEEP "X" constantly in the water. This repairs all leaks before they give trouble. What's more, if "X" is kept in the water it loosens the rust and scale now present—and prevents new rust or scale from forming. This means a cooler, better-working engine—plus a saving of oil and gasoline.

In preparing your car for the winter, use "X" Liquid to repair all the leaks. This will prevent the anti-freeze from leaking away—save your engine—and save you money.

Jacob Wins Esau

International Sunday School Lesson for November 24

Gen. 32:3—33:20

A Lesson on Reconciliation

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

ONE of the truest and deepest of the Proverbs is this: "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city." Yet oftentimes we are surprised to find the injured one only awaiting an opportunity to forgive. Such seems to have been Jacob's experience. With all his prosperity at Haran the memory of his shameful treatment of his brother rankled in his breast. When he decided to return to Canaan his guilty conscience made him dread the possible revenge of Esau if he ventured again into his neighborhood. Finally he faced the worst and decided to seek a reconciliation. On the way he had the great spiritual experience of Peniel, and realized that in all his trickery and selfishness it was against God that he had been contending. He "wrestled" all night in prayer and at last felt anew the assurance of God's blessing.

A Primitive Way of Regaining a Brother's Love

So we have in our text the characteristic way in which Jacob planned his meeting with Esau. He wished to impress his brother favorably as to his success, generosity and desire for renewed friendship. He was very skilful with his presents and his presentation of his family in such a way as to arouse dormant affections. Oftentimes little children have paved the way to restored brotherhood, as here. We really must give Jacob credit for sincerity, too, remembering that he had not the benefit of the Christian teachings which we have enjoyed. Here, too, Esau's good points come to the front—he harbors no grudge, is forbearing to a degree, and really magnanimous in his eager greeting of his own twin brother who had treated him so unfraternally.

The Duty of Reconciliation

We find everywhere today, as in the past, bitterness and estrangements between former friends, between close relatives, between brothers even, as here. These things ought not so to be, for reconciliation is not a possibility merely but a Christian duty. Difficult? Yes, but well worth a real disciple's while to try. We should imitate Jacob in this one point at least, in wishing to end the enmity. We should also emulate his wisdom and his tact, supplemented by the spirit of Jesus which he knew not of. For one thing Jacob and Esau found no need of bringing up the old scores for settlement. Both knew what had separated them, but not much was said about it. It is a mistake to spoil a perfectly good reconciliation by "rehashing" the bygone troubles.

To the followers of Jesus it is not enough to be willing to forgive an offender when he comes to us. We must seek him out, though we be never so conscious of injured innocence. "I'll meet you halfway," is not Christian—it's just common decency. A Christian is willing to go much more than halfway. His attitude is based on God's forgiving love toward us. Though we offended him, yet he first sought us out and extended forgiveness, that we might accept it and be reconciled to him. So ought we to act toward one another. Paul tells the Corinthians that God "gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation." That lovely phrase refers to the taking of Christ's Gospel to sinners, to be sure, but it can best be commended by those who exercise a "ministry of reconciliation" between man and man, as well as between man and God.

How glibly we repeat the Lord's Prayer every time we go to church! Yet what a responsibility we assume therein—"Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors." Think of it: "O Lord, forgive us just the way we forgive one another!" Dare we say that? Or, as others interpret it, forgive us, for we here and now forgive others! What a reminder it is of Christ's further teaching on reconciliation! He once said that God would have us pause on our way to the altar to consider if some brother has aught against us. If we have offended any, we ought first to be reconciled with our brother and then come to offer the gift. On the other hand, he says in another place, if a brother has sinned against us, we ought also to go and show him his fault, "between thee and him alone." So the duty of attempting reconciliation is unescapable. How solemnly Jesus said, in the heart-searching Sermon on the Mount, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." There is a story of two leaders in the primitive church who had disagreed bitterly, and one refused all attempts of the other at reconciliation. Finally in time of persecution they were both sentenced to a cruel death. Once more the first asked the other to be reconciled, but in the shadow of death he refused! He could die for his faith, but he could not forgive his dying fellow believer! He could be a martyr for his religion, but he could not bring himself to practice its characteristic teachings! Is such faith saving faith? [Read I Cor. 13:3 before you answer that question.]

The Bible has a curious phrase, "coals of fire," which describes the returning of good deeds for evil. Way back in the Book of Proverbs we find this advice: "Say not, I will do so to him as he hath done to me." Yet how natural is the instinct to revenge! And how spiritual the purpose to overcome evil with good! This too is based upon God's dealings with us. "He hath not dealt with us after our sins"—no should we so deal one with another. When companies of Christians meet they frequently repeat the ancient creed called the Apostles' Creed. When the recite "I believe in the forgiveness of sins" one is tempted to ask one's self "Do they?" for so many do not seem to act as though they did. There is no genuine forgiveness without striving to put away the remembrance of the offense. God never says, "I'll forgive but I cannot forget." He says, "I will remember your sins against you no more forever."

International revenge is a horrible thing and the source of countless wars. By way of contrast, consider the wonderful mutual forgiveness and reconciliation between Boer and Briton after their terrible strife. Think of Jan Christian Smuts being now in England the trusted counselor of the Christian monarch he formerly fought.

Enmities Within the Church

Lastly, let us face the sad fact enmities within the fold of the Church. Of these the feud in the Chosen Family in Genesis may be a painful picture. Indeed, we seldom have such barefaced treachery as Jacob's to overcome, but we have the same hindrance to the progress of true religion, the same misrepresentation of the God of Abraham. At bottom misunderstanding is usually the chief factor, even among our own people. The cure of misunderstanding is magnanimity—large-mindedness, the mind of Christ. It means not holding grievance. It means not treasuring trifles, not adding fuel to the fire. Means seeking to win to love again. That is Christ's way. Christian forgiveness is not saying "I forgive; now we're quits, and I'll have no more to do with you." Christian forgiveness "I am sorry, too. Let us both try to forget it: let us be as though it had never happened." Hard? Of course it is. Things worth doing are always hard.

There are pleasant surprises, often on the Way of Reconciliation. Jacob thought to find Esau bitter and dangerous, but instead he was pleased to be sought out. "Esau ran to meet him and embraced him and fell on his neck and kissed him." This was the man whom Jacob had cheated and supplanted! The prodigal brother was received like the prodigal son. It is always so indeed, but it happens often than we think.

Aren't you glad that this erring Jacob did not wait till his brother was dead to wish that they could have been reconciled? Yet many a Christian waits too long, and only beside a grave comes forgiving. How great is the anguish of those who have sinned against the dead! Many would echo Amos Barton's words at Millie's grave, "I didn't love you enough. I did not understand. Oh, Milly, forgive me!"

In reconciliation, as in salvation itself, "Now is the accepted time."

Sunday School Methods

For Missionary Sunday

A New Day at the Holy Sepulcher

WHEN the Mohammedan governor of Jerusalem learned that a thousand American Christians, representing several scores of different denominations, were coming to that city to hold the World's Sunday School Convention, he asked whether a thousand soldiers would be sufficient to guard the peace of the convention. And there was a good reason back of the governor's question.

For generations scenes of riot and even bloodshed had occurred year after year between the rival Christian sects at the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem during the ceremony of the Holy Fire on the Saturday before the Oriental Easter.

It was no wonder, therefore, that when the governor was told that not a single soldier would be required to insure the peace of the Sunday School Convention he could hardly credit his ears. But he witnessed the spirit of unity among those Sunday school people gathered from different nations as they met for three days under two great tents upon the site of Calvary. He noted the unselfish spirit of these workers as they planned for the childhood and youth of the world. He heard the address of the Samaritan High Priest from ancient Nablus, interpreted by a Jewish rabbi. At the close of the convention he sent his deputy to say that these people would have a cordial welcome at any time to Jerusalem.

And at this last Easter, for the first time, the ceremony of the Holy Fire was celebrated at the Church of the Holy Sepulcher without the presence of Turkish soldiers.

The English were in command in Jerusalem, and Colonel Storrs had determined that this year the celebration should occur without the presence of a single soldier.

There was intense excitement. The church was packed to the doors. The Greeks, the Armenians and the Coptic Christians were there, intensely jealous of each other. At times it seemed as if rioting was just about to break out, and as the priests within the tomb passed out the sacred fire through tapers, there were a few moments of struggle.

Mr. Stephen Trowbridge, the World's Sunday School Secretary among the Moslems, was, with Mr. Cleland, asked by the governor to stand in front of the mass of Armenians to keep down any turbulent spirits. The Greeks proved the most noisy and troublesome, but on the whole the ceremony passed off very peaceably.

The Sunday School Kindergarten in South America

A NEW day is dawning for the Sunday schools in South America. Rev. George P. Howard, that tall Sunday school magician from his headquarters at Buenos Aires, is touching the dead bones, and something is happening. First it is graded lessons in Spanish, then a whole lot of books translated into Spanish for training of teachers. The other day a wealthy Argentine lady came to Mr. Howard's office to purchase supplies for a Sunday school which she had started. Mr. Howard showed her Margaret Slattery's "The Girls Her Teens," and saw how fine it would be in Spanish. Immediately the lady gave $120 for the translation.

Recently 200 Sunday school workers, pastors and superintendents came together in Buenos Aires. An address was made on the part of the superintendent. Then Miss Hard, of Norville, representative of the World's Christian Temperance Union for those countries, gave a demonstration of a model Sunday school kindergarten class with the use of the sand table. Miss Norville is now meeting the teachers of all beginners' classes on Friday afternoons to prepare the lesson for the next Friday.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

Topics of the Week of Prayer

THE World's Evangelical Alliance has suggested topics for use in the customary observance of the Week of Prayer commencing January 5, 1919. With every angle of world events pointing to early peace it would appear that Christendom might well make this a week of prayer and praise and of girding for the great work of spreading the Gospel of God's healing grace in a world fastened by affliction and ready to find and follow the better way. The suggested topics follow:

Sunday, January 5, 1919. Texts Suggested for Sermons and Addresses
 "The Lord reigneth." (Ps. 97:1, 2.)
 "Quicken me according to thy word." (Is. 119:154, 156, 159.)
 "Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord." (Zech. 4:6.)
 "Ye have need of patience." (Heb. 10:36.)
 "Behold, I have set before thee an open door." (Rev. 3:8.)

Monday, January 6, 1919. Thanksgiving and Humiliation
THANKSGIVING—For great deliverances and all the surprises of the divine mercy; for the welcome given to the call to duty and for any unveiling of the will of God; for all experiences of answered prayer.—Ps. 116:1-8; Ps. 40:6-13; Isa. 43:1-7.
HUMILIATION—For continued unworthiness in the face of much sacrifice on our behalf; for our failure to recognize completely and to proclaim powerfully the reality of the living God; for all hesitating faith.—11 Sam. 23:13-17; Mal. 2:17-3:6; Ezek. 37:1-10.

Tuesday, January 7, 1919. The Church Universal.—The "One Body" of which Christ is the Head

THANKSGIVING—For the growing desire for visible unity in the churches; for clearer recognition of the excellences in the churches differing from our own; for greater willingness to realize the prayer of our Lord that we "all may be one."

PRAYER—For the divine blessing on all movements toward unity which are according to God's will; for the deliverance of the church from moral and spiritual impotence; for fortitude and initiative; for a deepened confidence in the Holy Ghost; for new power to imprint the will of Christ upon all preparations for reconstruction; for an enlightened faith in the coming of our Lord.—Isa. 11:1-16; John 17:20-26; Eph. 3:14-21.

Wednesday, January 8, 1919. Nations and Their Rulers

PENITENCE—For all stubbornness in national sins and for all false pride; for all hatred, for inhumanities and cruelties, for all that is unChristlike; for slackness and selfishness in divinely appointed tasks.

PRAYER—For perseverance in duties; for grace to enter into the counsels of God for the nations; for willingness to make additional sacrifices to further divine ends; for victory over evils within and enemies without; for the gift of an international mind; for the dedication of national consciousness.—Isa. 9:8-17; Amos 7:1-9; Isa. 19:19-25; Rev. 19:11-16; Rev. 21:22-27.

Thursday, January 9, 1919. Missions Among Moslems and Heathen

THANKSGIVING—For the sustained and increasing contributions to missions abroad; for the ever more manifest bankruptcy of the great rival religions under the challenge of Christianity; for the maintenance of work with depleted staffs and under serious difficulties.

PRAYER—That the unequalled glory of the personality of Jesus Christ may be recognized everywhere; that many who have been won to admire him may be led to adore him as Saviour; that the opportunities for evangelization in the native labor camps in France may be fully used; that many Christian soldiers may be led to dedicate their lives to the evangelization of the world; that wisdom and statesmanship may be given to missionary leaders.—Psa. 2; Isa. 35; 1 Tim. 2:1-7; Rev. 7:9-12.

Friday, January 10, 1919. Families, Schools, Colleges and the Young

PRAYER—That the Father's blessing may rest on all who mourn; that mothers and guardians may be strengthened for their responsibilities in the absence of the fathers; that an ever increasing number of our homes may be dedicated by daily household prayer; that the young womanhood of our land may be protected and inspired as it hears the call to labor; that young manhood may be strong against all the special temptations of its present vocation; that the tide of new ideas in the minds of youth may be guided and controlled unto noble ends.—Jer. 31:15-20; Joel 2:28-32; Col. 2:16-23; II Tim. 2:1-5.

Saturday, January 11, 1919. Home Missions and the Jews

PRAYER—That the Church may gain a new conscience concerning social unrighteousness and economic inequality; that grace may be given for readjustment of methods in fidelity to the Gospel of Christ; that definite victory over sins both of the flesh and of the spirit may be achieved; that many of the Jewish people in its era of new hope may be won to the Christ; that the final plans for the re-settlement of Palestine may serve the ends of the Gospel; that God may be glorified in all things.—Luke 4:16-30; II Peter 1:1-11; Rom. 10:1-15; Rom. 11:25-32.

There are 148 asking for prayers for healing of themselves, mothers, wives, husbands, sons, daughters, sisters and friends. Among them many ask for healing of cancer without having to resort to the knife. A subscriber asks that Mrs. S. J. P. may have a spiritual uplift as well as a bodily healing; that a friend who has met with an accident may be restored; Mrs. B., for physical and spiritual strength; a Reader, for a woman with nervous prostration; L. B., "that my brother may be cured of heart disease and my spine straightened"; F. B., that a dear friend may recover from the effects of a serious operation; F. R., that a worried subscriber may be cured physically and spiritually; that her parents may overcome heart weakness and her sister be cured of a goiter; M. C. C., that a broken arm may be mended and not give any more trouble; P. P., that a perplexed sister may be given sufficient physical strength and mental vigor for the faithful discharge of the unusual duties laid upon her for the coming winter; Miss J. P., that a lump which has formed may not prove cancerous, but may be removed and health restored; N. H., that a member who, it is feared, has tuberculosis may be cured; N. H., "that I may recover my health, and outlive my mother so I can care for her"; Mrs. S. B., "that the paralysis may leave me, and I be able to walk and lift my arms and head again"; G. T., for healing of two friends; a reader, "that I may recover from neuralgia and entirely regain my health"; C. S., that grandbaby may be cured of whooping-cough; Mrs. F. H., that God will remove and stop the fever among the stricken people of Eastland, Texas; Believer, for a patient sufferer of rheumatism that she may be entirely restored to health; Mrs. W., that a woman be restored to health and her faith in God; Miss M. J., that a young man terribly diseased may get well; a Reader, "that my family may be restored to health and that I may be able to influence my husband to be more considerate of my health and wishes"; a reader, that a burden may be lifted from a person in great mental stress, also for a permanent cure for a skin disease; nine ask that their mothers be restored to health; five for the restoration of wives; ten for husbands; twelve for sisters; sixteen for sons, including Mrs. J. P. N., that her son, who has a broken and dislocated wrist, may be made whole, and that he may be obedient to the wishes of his parents in choosing his companions; Mrs. H. C. T., that an afflicted son in a hospital may be cured; seventeen for daughters, including Mrs. E. B., that her daughter may be a comfort to her family; Mrs. R. W., that two daughters at college may keep in perfect health.

Eleven for the healing of sight, among them Mrs. J. S., that her husband, hurt through an accident to his eyes, may entirely recover. Twelve ask for the conversion of friends and relatives; among them a friend asks that two brothers may be saved and sufficiently humbled to see their folly; Mrs. E. W. G., that two children be saved and strengthened in their faith; a Believer, that a Christian who is not honoring Christ and whose conduct is a stumbling-block to others may be redeemed; D. M. I., that old and young may be Christianized and that all malice and hindering causes be removed and all work together for God, home and nation; eight ask for the conversion of sons.

Thirteen ask for financial aid, of which two wish to dispose of their farms. Ten request to be released from the liquor habit.

Eight requests are for revivals and reforms; among them Mrs. F. B. L. asks that a spiritual deepening may come into the hearts of the Boulevard Congregational Church people, and especially its officials; G. T., for a blessing on Gospel messages being distributed, and especially those being sent to soldiers in active service; that a Sunday school class may catch the missionary spirit; for revivals at Macon, Moberly and Cairo, Missouri; for deliverance from a secret and subtle temptation; for revivals at Cedar Church, Winchester, Ind.; at Big Springs, S. D.; Grandburg, Wis.; Throckmorton, Texas, and Chambersburg, Pennsylvania.

themselves, but also for all men irrespective of race, condition or color. They will preach and practice the Golden Rule, for that is what a true American calls a square deal. They will unanimously refuse to justify injustice, or to tolerate intolerance. So doing they will command the respect of all men; for such virtues are respected even by those in whom they are lacking.

2. The same leaders and led should now become consistent Protestants. Thousands of them are not now, and never were. The consistent Protestant goes to the Christian Bible for his rule of life, and counts the degree of his success in conforming his life to that rule the measure of his Protestantism. He expects to gain present and final salvation by virtue of the life and death and ever ongoing mediatorial activity of his great high priest and Saviour, Jesus Christ. He holds that all regenerate persons need to be born of water and the Spirit, and also that as there are diversities in the ministration of the Spirit which gives the new life, so there may well be more than one permissible mode in the application of the baptismal water which symbolizes and attests the new life. He prizes his liberation from the taboos of all legalistic systems of religion, yet in the presence of the weak and ill-instructed, is most solicitous not to put a stumbling-block in his brother's way. He is never greedy for honor or office, knowing that "in honor preferring another" is the watchword of every true Protestant. He cannot be a party builder, or a sect-glorifier, for he knows by heart Paul's expostulations addressed to the Corinthian sectaries. He cannot canonize the saint whose name he may bear, or claim for the particular fellowship in which he was born any exclusive Christian "deposit" or calling. On the contrary, he exultingly cries: "All things are mine; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas; or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are mine!" At the same time he fellowships every comrade and fellow-heir of the kingdom, greeting them joyously with the apostolic salutation: "Ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's!"

Let the Protestant churches of our land simply comply with the two above feebly outlined calls of God, and our returning soldiers, however transformed by their mutual contacts in camp and battle beyond the Atlantic, will find not only a form of vital religion among us, but also an embodiment of Christianity whose social fruitfulness and more than organic unity heroic souls can respect and count worthy of their own best efforts as personal units in the militant array called to the high task of bringing all nations into the knowledge and loving service of God.

Brookline, Mass.

Wm. J. Warren.

Our Churches Should Cease Bickering over Non-Essentials and Trifles, writes Pastor Junius B. Remensnyder (Lutheran).

THE result of our soldiers in the battle-field growing indifferent to the secondary distinctions separating the Protestant denominations is altogether natural.

In the presence of the great the little seems smaller still. In the sun's fiery disk the star grows pale. In extreme peril of life the soul demands alone the great living facts and truths of religion. It is then that our Lord's divinity, his atonement through grace, and the blessed hope of eternal life are those vital facts of Christianity which hold our gaze beyond all others.

And what our army has found most precious in its fearsome test the returned soldiers will look to for light and strength again. And can we not, without in one jot or tittle compromising the Gospel of Christ, address our preaching and ministries to these essentials of religion instead of bickering over trifles and disputing over subtle doctrines that never have been and never will be settled?

If the soldiers teach us this lesson it will draw all genuine branches of the Church together and exert a most blessed influence in hastening that long-sought, long-prayed-for consummation, when the Church of Christ shall be One, even as his Body is One, and as he and his Father are One. God speed the day!

New York City.

Junius B. Remensnyder.

"Reconstruction" Will Be the Great Watchword After the War, writes Dr. P. W. Philpott, Canadian Pastor.

REGARDING the question "What shall the Protestant Churches of America do to Meet the Situation?"—"Reconstruction" is the word. This will be the great watchword after the War.

Speaking of "economic," social and commercial conditions, some one has said that "the choked wells will have to be cleared of rubbish and new wells dug if civilization is not to perish from the earth." So it must be with the Church if she is again to grip the masses and mold the opinion and life of our nation. Old wells must be cleared of the rubbish—that old well from which gushes forth life and salvation.

The Reformation under Luther gave back to the Church truths that have long been lost. The Reformation which we now need and for which many are praying must give back those great truths which have been wellnigh lost to us, truths that regenerate lives and bring men into fellowship with God. Not a few thinking men have come to feel that the Church is very largely responsible for the present condition in the civilized world. A very keen secular writer recently says:

Every minister knows that from the days of Ferdinand Christian Baur, founder of the Tübingen School, down to the latest word from P. W. Schmiedel, there has been a patient, indefatigable, and relentless effort to squeeze every possible trace of the supernatural from the Old and New Testaments. If the task had been undertaken by minions under an imperial fiat, it could not have been performed more faithfully. By the time an American scholar has followed his course of training through Welhausen, Harnack, Wendt, Pfleiderer, Ritschl, and a score of other German authorities, and has made his researches culminate in Von Hartmann and Ernst Haeckel, he has not enough of the supernatural left to run a tin toy, let alone a universe. And no one has any excuse for ignorance concerning the gigantic superman superstition of Nietzsche, Treitschke, and Bernhardi; it was described, discussed, dissected and damned in all kinds of periodicals within six months of the breaking of the Belgian border. The inference is inevitable that when the leaders of a nation's life in theology and philosophy play skittles with every claim to divine interest in the affairs of mankind, and reduce anything which goes beyond the precincts of the material to a subjective and subconscious phenomenon, they are not likely to base national conduct upon the immutable and eternal foundations of righteousness. And we have the evidence that such has been the effect.

These are scathing words, but thousands of good men believe that they are true and that the Church must face this fact if she would solve the problem.

"The time is come for judgment to begin at the house of God." The heaven of rationalism which has so largely permeated the Protestant ministry has produced a loveless and lifeless Church. Power and passion are almost extinct. We are perfect in almost everything but the one great essential that feels for and finds the heart of the common people. When the Church has nothing supernatural to offer the people, then she has no authority to speak for God.

It seems to me that God's answer to the question is found in II Chron. 7:14. It is true that the Allied armies made very little headway until they placed themselves under one great leader. From that day they have been doing things. While these allied armies have retained their national identity, in the one great thing and every other thing that is essential to the grand objective they are solidly one. So should it be with our great Protestant denominations. Differing as we may in those things that are non-essential, let us come under the one Great Leader whom God has already "appointed to be Head over all to the Church," standing solid for the great fundamentals of our Christian religion.

A professor in a theological seminary once told his students "that wherever in the future their lot might be cast whatever the varieties and changes of time, place and circumstances, they would find two things always and everywhere the same, human nature and the Gospel."

The Gospel was provided for the very problem we are trying to solve and its transforming power is ever the same. It is not by education, culture, environment or natural evolution that we can meet this need. God sent his Son to solve the problem, and he alone can do it. His name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins.

Regarding a union of Protestant denominations on the basis of belief in the great fundamentals of the New Testament, I believe that we have a fair good demonstration of its possibility in my own church here. I have been pastor here for twenty-three years. We have a membership of about 1,300, and nearly every phase of denomination belief is represented, but we are absolutely one on the great essential truth which the Church of Christ has preserved since the days of the apostle. The result is that we have a most harmonious communion and heartiest cooperation in Christian activities.

Hamilton, Ont., Canada.

P. W. Philpott.

Dr. J. R. Mott Tells How Religious Unity Will Be Promoted by the Association on the Various Bodies in War Work.

"I AM not unmindful of the vital importance of the question you raise," writes Dr. J. R. Mott to the Christian Herald, "but I am under such pressure every moment with matters relating to our coming financial campaign that I am unable to give you a message as you suggest at the present time."

Dr. Mott, however, has kindly sent us a copy of his recent address to the editors of the religious press at War Work headquarters in New York, October 17, in which he said:

"This plan of associating all of us together is going to promote religious unity at a time in the world when there means more than will appear on the surface."

"This arrangement stands not for undenominationalism, but for interdenominationalism. There is all the difference in the world. Undenominationalism, which would try to reduce ourselves to the lowest common denominator, says, 'I will obscure, I will hide I will minimize, I will apologize for the which is most distinctive to myself as my creed'."

"Interdenominationalism says the very opposite of that. It says, 'We will hold fast to that which is most distinctive of us'. One of the finest things in that splendid letter of the President which summoned us to cooperate is the sentence which I think can give exactly. With his usual felicitous phrase and with his finest penetration he says:

"In inviting these organizations to give this new evidence of their patriotic co-operation, I wish it distinctly understood that their compliance with this request will not in any sense imply the surrender on the part of any of them of its distinctive character or autonomy, because I fully recognize the fact that each of them has its own traditions, principles, and relationship which it properly prizes and which, preserved and strengthened, make possible the largest service."

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD WILL ADVANCE TO $2.50

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been forced to increase its subscription price. Every single item that goes into the making of the Christian Herald—paper, postage, printing, engraving, wages, etc.—has increased enormously in cost. And the costs keep right on increasing.

One of two things was necessary—either to lower the standard of the Christian Herald—or to increase the subscription price. You would not want the standard lowered, and we will not lower it. In fact the Christian Herald must keep right on getting better—and bigger—and finer. The Christian Herald has an important mission to perform, and will need the hearty co-operation of every reader to do it successfully.

An opportunity will be given to all our readers to renew at the present price of $2.00 a year, as the increased price of $2.50 a year will not go into effect until January 1, 1919. No matter when your subscription expires—even if you have recently renewed and your subscription does not expire for many months—you can have your subscription extended at the present rate. This enables you to still have the Christian Herald at $2.00 a year, in spite of the ever increasing cost of manufacture.

A glimpse at the unusual articles in store for readers of the Christian Herald is given below. Dr. Sheldon's story alone is worth the price of a year's subscription. It will make you realize the necessity of giving the subject of "Reconstruction after the War" your own personal thought. Dr. Clark will give you the experiences of a life spent in Christian Endeavor work.

But this is not all. Dr. J. H. Jowett, who for more than two years has occupied a large place in the hearts of all of us, will continue through the coming year, to write the Meditations for every Sunday in the year and to furnish the first sermon each month. Other sermons from such men as Dr. A. C. Keigwin, Dr. Chas. M. Sheldon, Dr. Cadman, and equally able leaders in every denomination, men of poise and power. Then there is the double-page pictorial rotogravure, Dr. Allison's study of the Sunday School lesson, the weekly discussions of the Young People's Topics, the careful review of the week's news, including the war and the movements toward peace, the story of religion at work in the camps, the Mail Bag with its multiplied and many sided questions, the Bible and Newspaper page, occasional clean and gripping short stories and notes of religious work from the wide field of the world at large.

You will regret it if you miss a single issue of the forthcoming Christian Herald.

A GLANCE INTO COMING ISSUES OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

"CIRCLING THE WORLD FOR CHRIST"

By Dr. FRANCIS E. CLARK, President of the Christian Endeavor Society

THE publication of Dr. Clark's "Reminiscences," upon which he has been engaged for many months, will begin in next week's issue of the Christian Herald under the title of "Circling the World for Christ." These recollections of a long life are filled with remarkable experiences and will interest and inspire all who read them. They show how gloriously and abundantly God rewards the faith of those who work for souls, and how the humblest effort, put forth in trust and hope, can become the seedling of a mighty tree, whose far-spreading branches will give shelter to multitudes. The story of the Beginnings of Christian Endeavor, and of the many world pilgrimages to which they have led, reads like a romance.

Dr. Francis E. Clark

A CONCLUDING SERIES ON PROPHECY

By Prof. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute

THE World War has given a new stimulus to religion. It has brought men to a living sense of the nearness of God and of the presence of His governing hand in all things. In his remarkable series of articles on the Fulfillment of Prophecy, which appeared in the Christian Herald, Dr. James M. Gray has done a wonderful work in prophetic enlightenment. So widespread has been the demand for these articles that Dr. Gray, at our request, is preparing another series which will in all probability be the concluding one. It will consist of six articles, the first of which will be published in December. In these days of increasing interest in Prophetic Fulfillment, every serious-minded American should take this opportunity of getting new light on the divine purpose for our own beloved land and for the distracted nations in Europe.

"All the World," by Dr. Sheldon

AFTER the war, what? Reconstruction, readjustment, expansion.

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D., author of many fascinating stories, such as "In His Steps," "Jesus is Here," and "Howard Chase," has written another. It is more timely and appropriate than any story you have yet read, because the story is woven around the theme of reconstruction after the war. Like Dr. Sheldon's other stories every installment was portrayed by the author to his Sunday evening congregations before the next episode was written. In this unique manner Dr. Sheldon attains a story of heart-to-heart sympathy and understanding not to be gained in any other way.

An installment of "All the World," as Dr. Sheldon's new serial is called, will be found on another page of this issue. It is probably the most timely story yet written. The theme of the entire story is reconstruction—which, after all, is really the most important question that war puts before us. Do not miss reading the entire story—an installment of which will be given each week.

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.

"REDEMPTION OF THE HOLY LAND"

By Major THEODORE WATERS, Secretary of the Christian Herald

WHEN Major Theodore Waters, of the Christian Herald Staff, was chosen by our government as one of the American Red Cross Commissioners to Palestine, we knew that a new door of service was being opened by which many of the Christian Herald Family Circle would enter to share in the great enterprise of redeeming the Holy Land. Major Waters writes as follows from Jerusalem: "I have now in the course of preparation several articles on Palestine, including one on the Beggars of the Country, and others on the Women of Palestine, and the Children of Palestine. I am going out into the villages collecting material for these articles. One that will be of wide interest to Christian Herald readers will deal with the effect the War has had on the Holy Land, i.e., the Old Way and the New.

Major Theodore Waters

Among the subjects of which other articles will treat are these: The Orphanages of Palestine; The Health and Sickness of the Country; How the Missionaries Have Fared; The Present Condition of Zionism; The Wonderful Work of the Army; How the People are Fed, Clothed, Housed, Taxed and Educated. These articles will appear during the coming months, and we have no doubt that they will be found intensely interesting by all our readers.

"THE SEARCH"

BY GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

MRS. GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ, author of "The Witness," which appeared serially in the Christian Herald last fall and caused very favorable comment, has written a new serial for the Christian Herald entitled "The Search." The first installment will be published early in January. Mrs. Lutz has the very rare faculty of painting real people. A master of dramatic situation, she never permits herself to write into her stories incidents that might not have been. Her stories feature few characters, but these are strong or weak as the case may be, even as you or I are strong or weak, but her heroes and heroines meet critical situations as we often dream that we would meet them, triumphantly and with the triumph always on the side of good, while those of her characters who cast the shadow on the picture fail very much as we fail when our weaker nature overpowers our better will. In all of her stories, as in real life itself, the good survives and shallowness and self-seeking eventually betray themselves.

Grace Livingston Hill Lutz

THE CHURCH AFTER THE WAR

Leading Minds in the Various Denominations Give Their Views as to the Opportunity and the Outlook

"WHAT is the Church going to do to face the new conditions and the new opportunities that will present themselves after the war?"

The Christian Herald has advised with conservative leaders in Christian thought on this vital question, which has been brought to the front in a very remarkable manner and from many different sources during the time since America's entrance into the world-wide conflict. The conviction has gained ground in many minds that it will be "a new world, with new conditions and new opportunities," when the strife has ceased.

Such men as Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Francis E. Clark,

J. W. Chapman, Wilbert W. White, Billy Sunday, Bishop Quaile, David S. Tuttle and C. I. Seofield have freely expressed themselves on the subject. Opinions from almost 100 leaders in religious thought have been received by the Christian Herald. The first appeared in the October 30th issue and others will be published on alternate weeks.

COLORED PICTURES OF THE HOLY LAND

Drawings Made on the Spot by DAVID ROBERTS, R.A.

AWAY back in the early years of the century that is gone, an artist became dissatisfied with the pictures he had seen of the Holy Land and finally decided to go there and make some pictures that were right. Thus it came about that David Roberts, in 1833, made the long trip from England to Alexandria. Thus he saw and pictured Egypt and the Holy Land. He made from his sketches a series of wonderful water color paintings of the sacred and holy places which only this year have been finally torn from the hands of the infidel and brought under the protection of the flag of a nation that honors Christ.

One of the Series of Colored Holy Land Covers

The best of these really wonderful drawings will appear from time to time on the front cover of the Christian Herald with explanatory text.

MARION HARLAND'S CORNER

FOR nearly two generations men and women have been blessing the name of Marion Harland, and calling her the good fairy of the menu. To her has come the young bride troubled about the mystic secrets of that first dinner, or those initial biscuits, or those wonderful culinary triumphs that mother used to make. To her also has come the mother of many for that new way to combine things everybody is tired of into a dish which will force a demand for second helpings. And Marion Harland has exerted a charmer's power over flour and spice and sugar and salt and seasonings, and made them perform miraculous transformations while a wondering world looked on and called for more. Just because the world has kept calling for more, and because she is still ruling queen in the domain of the chef, the Christian Herald requested Marion Harland to conduct her own corner in each week's issue.

POETRY OF UNUSUAL MERIT

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER and Others

THE war has increased the value of poetry and has raised its standard of excellence. For the war has brought the emotions of a world to the fore, and poetry is a subtle appeal to the emotions. In the last few years verse has taken a place in the lives of folk who never before cared for it. The Christian Herald has always published good verse, and during this time of war, the quality of it is particularly excellent. The Christian Herald is giving to its readers the best poetry that is being written. Miss Margaret E. Sangster notably stands at the head of our contributors, and poems from others equally known will be published.

NO MORE PUNCTURES OR BLOWOUTS

PERFECT TIRE FILLER TAKES PLACE OF AIR—SENT FOR FREE TRIAL TO CAR OWNERS

Car owners can get immediate relief from punctures and blowouts and from the delay, danger and expense of air-filled tires by writing to J. A. Jonson, Sales Mgr., 224 W. Superior St., Chicago.

Mr. Jonson's Company manufactures a tire filler (not a liquid) that is in successful use on over 50,000 cars. This solid resilient filler rides like air yet does not puncture or blowout, it doubles the life of tires and does away entirely with the use of the inner tube. No spare tires or rims are needed.

Tests made by the Ford Owners Club, Widney Resiliometer, Technical Universities and over 50,000 users prove that this remarkable tire filler rides like air over the roughest roads, that it will not flatten and that it is not affected by heat, cold, water, sand, mud or pressure.

Various departments of the Government, Municipalities like Cleveland, Chicago are using this filler with remarkable success.

Mr. Jonson's free advertising offer is intended for one car owner in each locality, who will test this tire filler at the manufacturer's risk, and then tell others of its wonderful merits. It is suggested that car owners write Mr. Jonson at the address above for details of this offer. (Adv.)

Why Hens Won't Lay

P. J. Kelly, the Minnesota Poultry Expert, 119 Kelly Bldg., Minneapolis, Minn., has published a book, "The Tale of a Lazy Hen." It tells why the hens won't lay and how to make them lay every day. Mr. Kelly will mail the book free to anyone who will write him. (Adv.)

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

Mrs. H. M. Patton, Waverly, Mo., writes, "I fed 2 boxes of 'More Eggs' to my hens and broke the egg record. I got 1500 eggs from 160 hens in exactly 21 days." You can do as well. In fact, any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 2498 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied, your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.—Adv.

Foretold the World-War 18 Years Ago

MR. W. R. ADAMS, a business man of Larned, Kan., has been a lifelong student of the Bible with special reference to its prophecies. He has written a number of pamphlets on the subject, his writings extending over nearly twenty years. As early as 1900 he stated in one of his publications that the world complications would culminate in a great war in 1914, which would be "the last war"; that Germany would be the leader on one side and Russia on the other; that the United States would be a potent factor, and would be the leader at the end; that the war would be different from all previous conflicts; that it would be "God's controversy with the nations of the earth"; that the alignment would be "between Modern Israel (the Saxon nations) and the rest of the nations," and that God would "fight for and give the victory to his people." He also wrote of the Jews, that "this war is in part for their deliverance." There are many other remarkable forecasts in his writings which we may notice hereafter. The article printed below is from a pamphlet written by Mr. Adams in 1909.

The Times of Restitution

By W. R. Adams

Written and Printed in 1909

PROPHECY deals with the future and is ever couched in the language of types, figures and symbols. To understand prophecy, we must learn the meaning of these figures and symbols. To determine the truth or divinity of the prophecies, we must find their fulfillment in the events of history. If they are fulfilled, they are of God. If the things prophesied do not come to pass, then God hath not spoken them. If, by a careful study of the prophecies of the Bible and a close investigation of history, we are able to note their fulfillment in the events of the past, may we not, in some measure at least, be able to indicate their fulfillment in future events?

God has promised us a time when all that was lost in the fall shall be restored. The period during which this great work is to be done is called, "the times of restitution of all things, as spoken by all the holy prophets since the world began." While the word "times" implies more than one period, and may refer to the Gospel age, as well as to the Millennial age, yet it is generally understood to mean the Millennial age of one thousand years as the time for this great work.

The types and shadows of the Jewish age reveal to us, as we think, a type of the times of restitution in the "jubilee year." To Israel, the seventh day was a sabbath of rest unto all the people; in which no work of any kind was to be done. They were to till the land six years, but the seventh year was to be a sabbath of rest unto the land, and as they had gathered manna six days and found enough to last over the seventh day, upon which none fell, so they were to plant and till the land and gather their harvest during the six years, and expect God to so bless their labor that they would have enough to last over the seventh year of rest to the land; during which they were not to plant, nor till, nor harvest. (Lev. 25:21, 22.) And at the end of seven weeks of years, making forty-nine years, they were to keep the fiftieth year as a sabbath or jubilee year.

WHY were all these things (Lev. 25:8-16) so carefully placed in the record and handed down, unless for the express purpose of aiding in the work of the coming time of restitution? Peter says: "And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." (Acts 3:20, 21.)

Do not the controversies of today over the rights of the people indicate that this work of restitution has already commenced? We believe this to be true; and as there was an overlap of the forty-ninth and fiftieth, or jubilee year, and the work of the jubilee year really began at the day of atonement in the forty-ninth year and was completed in the fiftieth, or jubilee year, and as there is an overlap of the Jewish age and the Gospel age, so there is a corresponding lap of the Gospel age and the Millennial age. We can readily understand that the Gospel age began at the birth of Jesus; but the Jewish age, or dispensation, did not end until about eighty years thereafter, in the utter destruction of the Jewish kingdom.

THIS was necessarily so, because of the prophecy, "The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." (Gen. 49:10.) Jesus must be born of the Jews; be reared under the law, duly qualified as a priest at the age of thirty years by the baptism of the Holy Ghost; must complete the atonement; establish his resurrection; institute the Gospel church, and the Gospel must first be preached unto the Jews and be rejected by them, when the apostles were to turn unto the Gentiles.

The overlap of the Gospel age and the Millennial age, is a period of about one hundred and twenty years, divided into three periods of about forty years each; to be exact, periods of forty years and 40-49ths of a year each, and the entire lap being 122 22-49th years. This conclusion is reached by dividing the Gospel age of 2000 years into seven periods, corresponding to the opening of the Book with seven seals, and John's message to the seven churches in Asia. And as during the seventh, and last period, seven angels sound, we also divide this period by seven, giving 40 40-49 years to each. And also as God gave to the Antediluvian world one hundred and twenty years warning of the flood, so we are today given a like warning of the impending judgments upon the world.

THIS lap of 122 years began in the year 1874, because the fifth angel begins to sound at that date, which date corresponds to the date of Christ's birth in the other lap, and which is indicated as the time of his second coming. As each angel sounds a little over forty years, the sixth angel will begin to sound in the year 1914; to be exact, 1914 18-49; corresponding to the period in the other lap when the apostles turned from the Jews unto the Gentiles, and ends the day of grace to the world, and marks the beginning of God's judgments upon the world of today. And as the judgments upon Judah were by the fire of a real war, so will the judgments upon the world of today come by the fire of a great international war during this second forty-year period by which all the evil kingdoms and institutions, and the present order of things, will be broken down and destroyed, as prefigured by the entire destruction of Daniel's great image, and as upon the ruins of Judaism the Lord Jesus set up the Gospel Kingdom composed of the good seed gathered out of the Jewish age; so will the Lord Jesus at his second coming at the end of this age, fully establish his Kingdom on the earth upon the ruins of the kingdoms of this world.

The third period will be the time of the reorganization of the kingdoms of this world into the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ. We believe that the Jewish and Gospel dispensation were preparatory to the Millennial age; that each have a part in the work of the formation of Christ's Kingdom upon earth; that each was for the purpose of developing or demonstrating certain principles or truths which are essential to the work of the Millennial age.

GOD is Love; therefore all his plans and purposes are founded in love, and when complete will fully demonstrate his infinite wisdom and love in the fulfilling of law; "not one jot or tittle of which shall pass until all be fulfilled." The kingdom of Israel was a kingdom of law, and was in the demonstration of justice and judgment to teach us God's idea of justice and its importance in his dealings with mankind. The Gospel Kingdom, for the demonstration of truth and grace. And all these principles will be applied in the administration of Christ's Kingdom on earth; and while each are equally essential, and not until justice is fully satisfied in the spirit of truth and grace, will peace prevail. So when Christ comes the second time to complete his redemptive work, he will first execute the law in the wise administration of justice and judgment upon the wicked world.

Here is where the governments of men have been at fault. Failing to rightly apprehend the meaning of love, they have largely ignored the two principal elements, justice and truth, and endeavoring to administer government upon misconceived ideas have brought about only disorder and confusion. The primary object of Christ's Kingdom on earth is to establish justice and judgment.

ONLY those who are so blind that they will not see, fail to note the great preparations for war now being made by the nations in general, and the strenuous efforts to secure a settlement of all difficulties by arbitrage marks the ominous foreboding of war and is in direct fulfillment of the prophecies on this line, which say, "they shall say, peace, peace, when there is no peace." (Jer. 8-11.) So as this hue and cry about peace, and the efforts to secure the settlement of international questions by arbitrage are in fulfillment of the prophecies of the Bible. This great restitution cannot be brought about by peaceful measures, for the reason that justice must first be satisfied. Have we not been made fully aware of how hard it is to execute the law against great transgressors? Not until God's Judgment upon the world begins will men see the error of their ways and be willing to do justice. So this work will go on until the day of grace ends, and judgment begins. Not until the judgment of God strike home to every heart at hearthstone, will the oppressors let the people go. Then will we all realize that justice must first be satisfied before peace will come, and then and not until then, will the nations of earth accept Christ as King over the earth, and the real work of restitution will be carried unto completion, and righteousness will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

"Yet God Also Is Wise"

And we may surely add, none that is consistent with the will of the All-wise God, who slowly but surely through all the vicissitudes of human history is working his purpose out. For certainly God accepts and makes his own the principles which he has given for the guidance and government of men. He also is wise. Therefore to put our whole trust in him, and then to fight manfully together with him is the surest, say more! the only way to victory and an enduring peace.

BUT after the war, what? This question brings us to the consideration of the matter from the second point of view.

We think and speak of the peace which shall come after the war as the result of victory, but every thinking man and woman today is realizing more and more that with the end of the war we shall be face to face with the most tremendous problems we have ever had to face as a people. No one believes, no right thinking man or woman ought to believe, that when the war is won we are just going to settle back into our old ways of living and working.

If when silence comes down on a decimated, an exhausted, a bankrupt world, the old ways are sought out again, and men go on as before, then the myriad lives and the weary rain of tears are indeed a vain oblation, and all will be to do over again.

Yes, this is undoubtedly true, but this also is true—God also is wise. He sets no lesson for our learning which is not necessary for us, and beyond all question if the lesson is not learned now we will have to be learned some time later on. One has strongly and truly written:

Unless out of it shall come an old heaven and a new earth, the lesson will have to be set again, as time after time it was set for imperial Rome, until a century of war and pestilence and famine broke down her insolent pride and made from the ruins of her vain glory a foundation for a new civilization in the strength of the Christianity she had died.

TO put the whole matter clearly and succinctly, let me state it in this wise: If from the first point of view our present task is to make the world safe for democracy, from the second point of view our task, harder even than the first, is going to be to make democracy safe for the world. But let me go on quickly to add that the two tasks are not separate and distinct, at least to the extent that we may safely postpone one until the accomplishment of the other. There can be no reconstruction in days to come which has not its roots laid deep in the days now passing.

Already thoughtful, earnest men are beginning to set their minds to the problems of the future, and are striving to see their way to some hopeful solution. Through the suggested League of Nations, some are beginning to think in terms of the whole world, where heretofore they have been content to think only in terms of single nations. Through the frank discussion of economic questions, others are beginning to break through and break down the old individualistic theories of human living with its selfish motto, "Every man for himself," in order that a truer and wider brotherhood of men may come.

So, too, I believe, we are already beginning to have a nobler conception of the value of human life, a truer conception of what really makes that life worth living; that we are beginning to see that justice is not a mere abstraction, but a vital principle which lies at the very foundation of life itself, guaranteeing to every man who shares the great gift of life the right and the opportunity to live his life up to the best of which he is capable; that it is not so much that a man has as what a man is that really counts, and that along with every possession, every privilege, every opportunity, there goes a corresponding responsibility which no man has the right to repudiate or lay aside.

All these things are now making for democracy, which shall be safe for the world—a democracy—let us be very clear about it—which is not a mere scheme or form of government, much less a mere party or organization for the promotion of partisan propaganda, but rather a force or spirit which grows out of the very nature of man, a spirit, mark you, which the Giver of Life himself has implanted in the nature of man. The making real of these ideals will certainly challenge our best thought, our clearest vision, our strongest strength, and our greatest patience; but let it not be forgotten "God also is wise." Since it is he that gives these ideals to men, he may not be left out of account in the endeavor to make them real.

Democracy is not and cannot be its own security. Its very existence depends upon the character and temper of the people who compose it. It is nothing but a single principle. Used aright it is a unitive force and a friend of liberty; but in the hands of an unenlightened and selfish people it is a menace of major proportions. Of all corrupt governments, there is none to equal a corrupt democracy.

This is most true, but there is still more to be said, and let us dare to say it bravely and boldly—a democracy without God is the most dangerous force imaginable, and for the simple reason that he and he alone can safeguard the right and hold in check the wrong in human life. No democracy can long endure which ignores the facts of human life, and God is such a fact, indeed the first and greatest of them all. As the Giver of all life, the Creator of all men, he has put them here in this world to live together, work together, and play together. They are all members of his one great family, and all are intended to work together with him in the carrying on and the carrying out of his great plan and purpose.

The Brotherhood of Man has only one possible and enduring basis, and that is the Fatherhood of God. Without God it cannot hope to endure. Without God it carries within itself at all times the seeds of its own destruction and extinction.

No better, truer or completer description of democracy, as I conceive it, was ever given to men than that spoken by the old prophet Micah in the long ago, in words whose truth grows and expands with the increasing experience of human life—"What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

WE are living at one of the most momentous periods of human history, a period in which the grandeur and at the same time the intensity of human life stands out as never before. The events through which we are living and those which lie ahead of us constitute a challenge to the best, the highest, the noblest in each one of us. That challenge is a call to each one of us to play the man, without shirking or quibbling, and certainly without trying to escape our individual responsibility, leaving our part to be done by another. No matter what our place or station may be, the call comes as with clarion tones to each one. Along the lines of human endeavor each one can do something by example at least, but more important still is that which each one of us can do to help bring God back into human life in ourselves, in our communities, in our nation and throughout the world.

To this end the first duty of each one of us is—to use the striking words of St. Paul—to be alive unto God!—which surely means to think of him and to act toward him as though we really believe that he is alive, thinking, planning, loving, working for the carrying out of his all-wise purposes; and then to think of ourselves as having this great gift of life from him, with the added gift through Jesus Christ of the power to have that life and have it more abundantly, and therefore bound by every right and reason to bring our wills into harmony with his will, and thus become workers together with him for the establishment of his Truth and the bringing in of his Kingdom.

Young People's Topics for November 24

Count Your Mercies

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U
Topic. 1 Chron. 29: 10-14. (Thanksgiving Meeting)

WE can well be thankful in this year of 1918 for the mercies which God has given us. When the first Thanksgiving was organized by the pioneers of liberty on the unconquered shores of New England, liberty was still undefined and democracy was only a matter of historical recollection among things that had failed. Kings everywhere denied the rights of men and their ability to rule themselves. Today, after 142 years of liberty, America is leading the world toward a new and wider realization of democracy and human freedom, and the king business is nearly played out. In the chess game of the centuries, the king is at last under check. As Americans we have many mercies. Two million of our boys are overseas in the great adventure of democracy's final victory, and some are sleeping in the sacred soil of France, yet these are only a small part of the great number of our sons and brothers "Over There," the most of whom will come back to us better and stronger than when they went away. We may thank God most heartily for the Y. M. C. A., the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, and every other agency which is helping to make the American Army the cleanest and finest the world has ever known. We should thank God, too, that we have been able not only to send our boys to rescue democracy and the world from the tyranny of imperial autocracy, but we should thank him that he has made it possible for us to feed the people of those other lands who are with us in the war and to feed them in spite of the U-boats and shortened crops. We should thank him for the spirit of self-denial and the successful employment of it which has made this feeding possible, and as for the sacrifices involved in self-denial we should thank him for those as well, for most of us have been benefited physically and many of us spiritually by our compliance with the recommendations of the Food Administration. We may be thankful, too, that though the object of the greatest net of intrigue and misrepresentation ever created, America has gone on with undimmed vision, unflinching purpose, and unwavering fidelity, until she has been able to win by force of sheer desert her position of world leadership. But even as we thank God for these his many mercies, we should pray that he will guide us that we may use and employ our great position in accordance with his purpose in the world. And while we are thanking him let us not forget the last verse of the reference, for who are we that we should offer things to God of whom has come everything that we have?

Call to Separation

Epworth League Topic. Ex. 32: 26, 30-34

THIS Sunday being so near Thanksgiving it may be felt wise to substitute a Thanksgiving topic, in which case the Christian Endeavor topic treated above may be acceptable.

The people of Israel had sinned the greatest sin of which they could be guilty. They had turned their backs on Jehovah and had made themselves gods of gold. But Moses called to him those who were willing to stand before the multitude as servants of Jehovah, and then he went into the mountain to pray for the people that peradventure their sins might be pardoned and their guilt blotted out. Today more than ever the call is ringing over hill and dale for those who are on the Lord's side to declare themselves. There is work ahead; the world is being remade; nations reconstructed; ideals of life and government reconstituted and international relations rebuilt upon a broader basis. There is no place in this scheme of things for the straggler or for the person who claims to believe but refuses to belong. The world is calling to every man and woman to come out from among them and to be separate in order that that personal development necessary to the high purpose of the future may be accomplished in the individual. Jesus said: "He that is not with me is against me; he that gathereth not scattereth abroad."

This will be even more true than formerly when the boys come home and we begin to rebuild our life upon the basis of their experiences and their and our broader faith. We may find, as did the Jews of old, that there are sins for which we must suffer, political sins, economic sins, sins of commission and omission, which will arise to plague us even as the sins of Israel, though for given, brought plagues upon them. A prominent Christian leader declared in New York on October 27 that only a complete revision of industrial life in the spirit of the Master could prevent a class struggle in America when peace has been wrought out of conflict. The peace of justice of which the world is talking must not forget justice to the man whose capital is in his skill and whose future is contained within his trade. With peace the church will face both problems and opportunity, problems of meeting new conditions, the opportunity of carrying her Gospel to a world thrown wide open by a newer appreciation of her spiritual message, and a keener hunger for the truth she bears. The Gospel cannot be carried except upon the feet of messengers; nor can messengers go except they be sent. There will be need for all who are upon the Lord's side to declare themselves, if problems are to be solved and world-wide opportunities to be met and mastered.

Fear of a Brahmanized India

IT is said by many who know the people of India that there is danger that home rule (desirable as this may be for most countries) might result in injury to the interests of the low-caste people who form the vast majority of the population. The propaganda is said to be carried on mainly by the Brahmins, who do not number more than three per cent. of the people, and it is claimed that if the demand for home rule were granted, it would result in an oligarchy of Brahmins, who have been the fiercest opponents of Christianity. A counter-movement has been set on foot in Southern India by non-Brahmins, who are loyal to the British government and appear to desire only the best interests of all classes of the Indian people.

The Lord's Day Alliance

THE thirtieth anniversary of the Lord's Day Alliance of the United States met in New York City November 10-12, when various phases of the subject of Sabbath observance were considered by an attractive list of speakers from the social, spiritual, scientific, moral, economic and civil standpoints. The church with their various agencies sent delegates. A special edition of the Leader, the official publication of the Alliance, was published, containing the addresses and discussions called out by them in reference to the issue of the Sabbath and its desecration.

How moisture affects ordinary brake lining

DO your brakes take hold too quickly after the car has been out all day in a driving rain? If they do it is because the dampness has worked in, causing the brake lining to swell. Brakes that are swollen from moisture are never dependable. Today after a rain-storm they "grab" and take hold too quickly. Tomorrow, after they have dried out, they act more slowly. Brakes that swell from moisture wear out quickly.

Why Thermoid resists moisture

Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining is Grapnalized—an exclusive process which resists moisture, oil and gasoline. In addition to being Grapnalized, Thermoid is Hydraulic Compressed. This makes it uniformly hard.

Over 40% more material and 60% more labor are used in the manufacture of Thermoid than in any woven brake lining.

Support the Brake Inspection Movement and have your brakes inspected today.

Every foot of Thermoid is backed by Our Guarantee: Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL.

THIS BIG FLAG SENT FREE IF YOU ASK AT ONCE!

Re-produced from actual photograph. Flag is 4x6 Feet. Double-Stitched Stripes. Brilliant Colors.

HERE is a wonderful opportunity to secure a big, strongly made American flag at way below the cost of manufacture. It will be sent free for the asking, and you can examine it in your own home if you act promptly.

Every good American should show his colors these days. Let "Old Glory" mark your home as one which stands by our President, our army and our navy. Celebrate our victories by displaying this fine symbol of our national unity. Show your flag on holidays, at home-coming celebrations, parades, reunions, and patriotic occasions. Displaying the American flag is the least that we, who must stay at home here, can do to endorse the men who are leading us to final triumph, and the principles we are fighting for. Let this big flag tell the world how you stand at this great moment of our country's history.

Don't Send a Penny— See the Flag First

TO make sure of your flag you must ask for it now. Our supply is limited, and when our present stock is gone it is certain we cannot obtain more at the old, low price at which we contracted for these.

Fill in the coupon printed below and mail it to us. The flag will be sent you at once, prepaid, for examination. If you decide to keep it send us only 50 cents within five days of receipt of the flag and one dollar a month for three months, making $3.50 in all.

Upon receipt of your first payment your subscription to the Christian Herald is entered at once for the period of one year, 52 issues, and you will start receiving it next week.

The regular subscription price of the Christian Herald is $2.00 a year ($2.50 after Jan. 1, 1919), so you will readily realize what a bargain this combination offer is. You not only get this big, 4x6 foot American flag with double-stitched stripes, but you are one of the great circle of fine men and women who are known the world over as the "Christian Herald Family."

Act Quickly!

THIS offer will be withdrawn as soon as our present supply of flags is gone. American flags of this kind have doubled in price and we will not be able to replenish our supply except at a big increase in cost to us. Our original order for thousands gave us the advantage of a big reduction in price and we are giving you the benefit of it.

Mail the Coupon Now

THERE is no risk in this for you at all. Simply fill out the blank spaces in the coupon and mail it to us now. The flag will be sent you immediately. Look it over at your leisure. You need not keep it if you are not convinced that you are getting wonderful value. Before five days have passed send us only 50 cents and your subscription to the Christian Herald will be entered immediately for one year. The flag becomes your property, and the other three payments of $1 each pay also for your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year. Delay means disappointment. Start the coupon to us today.

Christian Herald, 4899 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Send me, all charges prepaid, for examination, the large American flag advertised. If I keep it I will send 50 cents within five days, and $1.00 per month thereafter for three months, a total of $3.50, which will pay for the flag as well as one full year's subscription (52 issues) to the Christian Herald. If I do not keep the flag I will send it back within five days at your expense. I incur no other obligation in mailing this coupon.

Questions and Answers

M. J. B., Ladora, Iowa. From the first mention of the tree of life in Paradise, the eating of which would make immortal, the idea of a continued existence has had a place in Jewish theology. Many passages might be quoted to show this belief. See the Mosaic injunctions against necromancy, or the invocation of the dead, Deut. 18:9-12; 1 Sam. 28; Ps. 106:28, and other passages. Moses wrote that God "took" Enoch (Gen. 5:22, 24) because he had lived a pious life. David speaks of his child in another life when he says, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (see 11 Sam. 12:23). Job says (Job 19:26 and 27) that he "will see God for himself and not another" in the future life. Ecclesiastes, which doubtless echoed faithfully the theology of that day, shows very clearly the belief in a spiritual life (Eccles. 12:7); see also the allusions in the Psalms (the Jewish psalter) to expectations of reward and punishment after death (Ps. 17:15; 49:15; 73:24). These and other passages which might be quoted make it certain that the ancient Jews did believe in a future life; but it is equally certain that they had only dim and uncertain views on the subject, and that the full knowledge was not attained by any race or nation on earth until Christ himself came to bring "life and immortality to light."

A. G. C., St. Louis, Mo. 1. Concerning the possibilities of a return to Christ on the part of a backslider, we can only assert that what to man may seem impossible is possible with God, and that the divine grace is boundless. Peter backslid in a most grievous way, yet he was forgiven. By a miracle of divine grace, the backslider, although beyond human hope of recall, in God's abundant mercy may find refuge and forgiveness. 2. The trend of Bible teaching shows that man's opportunity for repentance comes now, and not hereafter. It is not so much a question of whether there is repentance after death as whether repentance then would avail. It is not for us to limit the mercy of God, but there is nothing in the Bible to encourage the hope of an opportunity of gaining salvation after death. Any person postponing repentance till then runs an appalling risk, against which he is emphatically warned. However, let us remember that God is love and mercy, and can save even at the last moment by ways and means of which we have no conception.

A. M. J., Carnegie, Pa. Consult the Quartermaster's Department at Washington, D. C., as to the sale of your trees for Government use.

Mrs. F. W. S., Goldsboro, N. C. 1. The phrase you inquire about, "Cleanliness is next to godliness," is found in John Wesley's Sermons XCII on Dress. The language of the aphorism, however, is taken from the Beitha, a translation of the Mishna by Rafael M. de Sola. Bacon in one of his essays says: "For cleanness of body was ever esteemed to proceed from a due reverence to God, to society and ourselves." 2. Peter, according to tradition, was crucified in Rome head downward; Paul was beheaded in Rome under Nero.

S. H. L., Fort Monroe, Va. 1. Matt. 27:5 is often contrasted with Acts 1:18. The passages are not necessarily contradictory. As one commentator remarks, the occurrence mentioned in Acts can only be regarded as meaning that the halter broke, with the result stated. 2. In Matt. 14:28-32, the incident regarding Peter is given, although it is not found in Mark 6:51, who relates only what Jesus did, probably considering Peter's act of secondary consequence. Each of the four Gospels is complementary of the others in variety of details. While all agree on the main facts concerning the events they relate, each tells the story in a different way and from his own personal viewpoint. They may be likened to a group of witnesses who, while corroborating each other in regard to the main question at issue, may differ in the details of the telling, some being impressed by things which may not have struck the others as sufficiently important to relate.

E. P. R., Gloversville, N. Y. The Bible (11 Tim. 3:16) contains the statement that the Scripture is given by inspiration—that the perception and the work of the writers were divinely influenced. The hearts of these men were filled by the Holy Spirit with a message which they were led to write for the world. These inspired writers were prophets, evangelists, and spiritual leaders, who lived close to God through prayer and meditation and were in constant communication with him.

and homely terms. "Mansions" convey the idea of wealth and splendor. At a rural home in a farming district, a few days ago, funeral services were held, and the kindly neighbors gathered in the neat little cottage. A daughter—a lovely girl of twenty—had died of an attack of influenza, after a very brief sickness. She was to have been married in a month. In such places, all the people know each other, and the minister has known most of them from babyhood up to manhood and womanfessed to God alone. If you still feel that you have not made sufficient reparation, then do so and clear your conscience. Ask in your prayers not only for forgiveness, but for strength, and to be kept from falling into the same sinful course, and your prayer will be granted. We are sending your letter to the Prayer League, which will plead in your behalf.

E. H. P., Montesano, Wash. The passage in 1 Cor. 7:14 means that a godly wife will use her influence and example to redeem a careless, irreligious husband, and vice versa. You will observe, however, that Paul in verse 12 distinctly says that, from that point presumably down to the end of the 14th verse, he is speaking not under inspiration but of his own authority, and he would seem (in verse 16) to rather doubt the wisdom of his own advice, and is disposed to let the course adopted in such cases be a matter of expediency and tolerance, suited to the circumstances.

G. A. C., Strasburg, Va. Many plans for the settlement of international disputes have been under discussion of late, and many more will doubtless be considered in the near future. The time for discussing the proposition for a world's congress, however, has not yet arrived.

A Reader, Covington, Ky. The loans to our Allies as stated by the Treasury Department War Loan Bureau up to September 4 amounted to $7,092,040,000, of which $3,725,000,000 were charged to Great Britain.

Rachel M. Gardner, a patriotic New Jersey girl, has asked the Food Administration to point out the value of acorns as a food. Here is her message:

"Friend Hoover: I have learned as a farmer girl the value of acorns as food for hogs. The hogs like them, the children will be delighted to gather them at no cost, and thousands of bushels of corn can be saved. Will you not set the ball a rolling?"

Wherever the suggestion can be carried out in a practical way, it has the Food Administration's approval, though unfortunately acorns and hogs are not usually found in large quantities in the same territory.

Several Readers. Onions are said by the London Chronicle to be an excellent aid in fighting the prevailing influenza epidemic. An onion cut in half and set in a room will attract to itself all manner of germs, leaving the air sweet and pure; it is, therefore, most valuable in cases of infection. Burn the onion afterward. No part of an onion should ever be used for domestic purposes after having been allowed to lie about over night. Eating raw onions is a personal protective in time of epidemic, and if taken with cucumbers, the breath is left innocent of any objectional odor.

THE Congregational churches of the United States intend to raise $16,000,000 in three hours on the afternoon of December 8. Of this amount $2,000,000 will go to regular missionary work, $2,000,000 to special missions, and $12,000,000 to the needs of local churches. This will be known as the Every Member Drive and is the outcome of a recent meeting of the Congregational Council, where the tasks that will confront the church after the war received special consideration. The Tercentenary Commission of the Churches asks that all the interests of the churches be brought together so that they may be adequately financed.

TWO trusted auxiliary agencies of the churches, the Young Men's and the Young Women's Christian Associations, received grateful appreciation of the service which they are rendering to American soldiers and sailors at home and over the sea in a resolution adopted at the meeting of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches held in Washington recently. The two associations have combined their efforts to secure during the week beginning November 11 the sum of $170,000,000 to cover their respective budgets as approved by the War Department. The Commission urged upon all the churches the most earnest support of the effort to provide funds for these associations and other agencies ministering to the welfare of the army and navy.

AFTER a life spent in philanthropy, Louis N. Stein, founder and one of the directors of the Infants' Summer Hospital at Charlotte, on the shore of Lake Ontario near Rochester, N. Y., died recently at his home near the institution to which he had devoted all the time he could spare from his extensive business interests. Besides the Summer Hospital, Mr. Stein was a contributor to many other philanthropies.

Wilson Peak on Mont Blanc, formerly called Piltschner Peak. Switzerland recognized President Wilson's world leadership by rechristening this pinnacle of Mont Blanc on August 15, 1918. The Mayor of Chemnitz hoisted the Stars and Stripes above the apex of the peak. A large company cheered as Old Glory swung out over the snow-banks and glaciers of the Alps

God chose them as channels of divine communication and interpreters of God's purposes.

Subscriber, Sugar Creek, Mo. Moses and Elijah were the two chief representatives of the Old Testament; they stood for the Law and the Prophets, and, both having been forerunners of the Messiah, were chosen as attendants at the scenes surrounding the Transfiguration. They formed the link between the new and the old dispensations, and were no doubt chosen for that purpose.

F. G. M., Corvallis, Ore. We heartily agree with all you say about the autocracy that has caused the present horrible war. But neither the Christian Herald nor any other publication is in a position to tell the President and Congress their business. They are doing wisely and very well, and all loyal Americans can trust them completely to do all that is needful.

C. A. B., Iowa, and F. M., Devil's Lake, Mich. The subject is controversial and discussion would be fruitless.

G. B., Jersey City. The passage in John 14:2, "In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you," is sometimes interpreted in even more familiar

G. P. K., Shinglehouse, Pa. We are willing to serve our readers to any extent possible, but your list of fourteen questions should be cut down to reasonable proportions. If every one who writes to the Mail-Bag were to send even half that number, we would be hopelessly swamped.

Inquirer, Paris, Mo. The things you mention are past and gone, and if you have confessed them to God in prayer and with sincere repentance, and have asked forgiveness for Jesus' sake, you should put the memory of them behind you. You say you have regretted them and made amends so far as possible. It is not necessary nor advisable to rake over the ashes of the past. There are things which should be confessed to the person injured, but there are others which need only be con-

Grow "Younger" As You Grow Older

Younger in Body, Younger in Spirit, Younger in Ambition, Younger in Every Characteristic that Gives Greater Earning and Living Power, Greater Thought Power, Greater Pleasure Obtaining Power and Greater Health Promoting Power

THE number of years a man has lived does not tell how old or young he is. A man is as old or as young as his energy, his vitality, his capacity for work and play, his resisting power against disease and fatigue. A man is only as old or as young as his memory power, will power, sustained-thought power, personality power, concentration power and brain power. He is only as old or as young as his digestive power, his heart power, his lung power, his kidney power, his liver power. Age is measured by the age of our cells, tissues and organs, and not by the calendar!

Cultivate the Cells

Everybody knows that the body and brain are made up of millions of tiny cells. We can be no younger than those cells are young. We can be no more efficient in any way than those cells are efficient. We can be no more energetic than the combined energy of those cells.

By conscious cultivation of these cells, it is as natural as the law of gravity that we become more efficient, more alive, more energetic, more ambitious, more enthusiastic, more youthful. By consciously developing the cells in our stomachs we must improve our digestion. By consciously developing the cells in the heart we must increase its strength in exact proportion. By consciously developing the brain cells the result can only be multiplied brain power—and so with every organ in the body.

What we are and what we are capable of accomplishing depends entirely and absolutely on the degree of development of our cells. They are the sole controlling factors in us. We are only as young and as great and as powerful as they are.

There Is No Fraud Like Self-Deception

You may think you are young, strong, brainy, energetic, happy, yet when compared with other men or women, you are old, weak, dull, listless and unhappy. You do not know what you are capable of accomplishing because you have not begun to develop the real vital powers within you. The truth is you are only a dwarf in health and mind when you can easily become a giant through conscious development of every cell, tissue and organ in your body and brain. By accelerating the development of the powers within you, you can actually become younger as you grow older—yes younger in every way that will contribute to your health, happiness and prosperity.

Conscious Evolution—the Secret

Swoboda proves that Conscious Evolution gives energy and vitality to spare, digestive power to spare, self-reliance to spare, and gives many other desirable characteristics to spare. He proves that Conscious Evolution makes people disease-proof, fatigue-proof. He maintains that to possess sufficient vitality and energy and to keep the body in normal health under the most favorable conditions is no more health prosperity than to have only enough money from day to day to meet current expenses. Great reserve health, great reserve energy is what we must acquire if we are to successfully nullify the ravages of time, and to easily overcome every adverse condition and thus enjoy the benefit of our resources, the benefit of our health power and the advantage of our energy.

Beware of Health Poverty

As Swoboda says "there are individuals who seek work only when their last cent is gone. Likewise, individuals live from minute to minute and from day to day, seeking health and energy only as they need them badly. Conscious Evolution is for them—for everyone. It is a simple, scientific and practical system by means of which every part of the brain and body is energized, strengthened, awakened, so that we become possessed of a super health and mentality—the Swoboda kind of health and mentality. Conscious Evolution makes for good fortune by developing the resources and the ability and power of personality.

Strange as it may seem, this revolutionary method of consciously awakening and developing weakened and lifeless cells requires no drugs, medicines, or apparatus of any kind. It does not require dieting, deep breathing, excessive exercising, cold baths, electricity or massage. It takes only a few minutes a day, yet so startling is the effect of Swoboda's system that you begin to feel younger, renewed, revitalized, re-energized after the very first day.

These Amazing Books Are For You

Swoboda has published for distribution two remarkable books which explain his system of Conscious Evolution and what it has already done. Write for these books—not because Conscious Evolution has meant so much to 200,000 other men and women, not because there is scarcely a prominent family in the country that hasn't at least one member a pupil of Swoboda, including Charles E. Hughes, Woodrow Wilson, Daniel Willard, Rockefeller, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, the Huntingtons, the Armours, the Cudahys, the Swifts—but write for these books because they mean so much to YOU in multiplied living power, earning power and resisting power. They are big books filled from cover to cover with the vital facts about yourself and how you can acquire the degree of perfection in body and mind that you so much desire. They explain the dangers of excessive deep breathing, excessive exercise, and excessive muscular development.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will show you how you can increase the pleasures of life to a maximum—how to intensify them and how to make your life more profitable, pleasurable and joyous.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" are the A, B, C of evolution and persistent youth. These books explain Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. They explain the Swoboda theory and the laws of mind and body. They startle, educate and enlighten. They explain as never before the reason for the evolution of the mind and body.

Regardless of how young you may feel, of how efficient you may think you are—regardless of how active, energetic and alert you may consider yourself—regardless of how happy, how contented you may pride yourself on being—regardless of how healthy, wealthy or successful you may be, you cannot afford, in justice to yourself, to miss the interesting and instructive secrets explained for the first time in these startling new books.

A mere reading of "Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will so fill you with enthusiasm and ambition, that you will not rest until you have yourself acquired the Swoboda kind of health and energy by cultivation and revitalizing intensively every cell, tissue and organ in your own system. Tear out the coupon on this page, write your name and address on it or write a letter or a postal card and mail it today. Even if you gain but one suggestion from them, you will have been repaid a thousand fold for having read them. I urge you by all means not to delay, not to say, "I'll do it later," but to send NOW, while the matter is on your mind. Remember, these books are absolutely free for you to keep—there is no charge or obligation now or later. Write NOW. Address

WHAT OTHERS HAVE TO SAY:

"Conscious Evolution has done all for me that you promised and I am simply radiating good health. I can hardly believe it myself, it has made such a great change in me. I am in better condition than I have been for twenty years and am chock full of energy and ambition. Tasks that were a burden to me in the past are now easy and a pleasure. I have no money to burn or throw to the birds, but if you were to offer me one thousand dollars in good hard cash and put me back where I was before beginning your system, I would say, 'Nothing doing.' I enjoy the work you have mapped out for me and am impatient to get at it."

"I SHALL BE SIXTY-SIX YEARS OLD NEXT AUGUST and if you were to see me right now you would say 'forty,' and, as a fact, I am better, stronger, and have more energy than the average man at forty. I have only you and your system to thank for these things, and I want to thank you from the very bottom of a grateful heart for what you have done for me. I am a man now in every sense of the word, whereas I was only a fraction of a man and rather a small fraction before profiting through Conscious Evolution."

"The strangest part of it all is that my hearing is greatly improved. The muscles of my shoulders, back and abdomen are immense, and I have forgotten that I have a liver, kidneys, heart, or any other organs, except my stomach which makes a loud call three times a day. I have lost all desire for stimulants."

"I AM SEVENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE, and in three weeks your system has apparently made a new man of me. I am so enthusiastic over Conscious Evolution that it is difficult for me to control myself, and not do more than you say. I want to thank you for the interest you are taking in my case. When I wrote you for your instructions I was in a very desperate condition. I have never been sorry for one minute that I have written you. On the contrary, I want to thank you for what you are doing for me. I am getting along fine; I am a wonder to myself. It does not seem possible that there could be such a change in any one in such a short time."

"When I tell some of my friends how quickly I was benefited by Conscious Evolution, they do not believe me. They think I exaggerate."

"One year ago I was an old man at forty; today I am a youth of forty-one."

"I must state that the principle of your system is the most scientific, and at the same time the simplest, I have ever heard. You do not misrepresent one single word in your advertising."

"Just think of it, five weeks ago I was ashamed of my physique, today I am almost proud of it, I am delighted with Conscious Evolution."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically, and mentally is increasing daily."

"I am very thankful that the Lord directed me to Conscious Evolution through the 'Christian Herald.'"

Nations Rejoice As War Ends

Revolutionary Upheaval Hastens Kaiser's Abdication and Unconditional Surrender of German Forces to Allies

ON NOVEMBER 11 at 11 A.M. Paris time, 6 A.M. Washington time, the world struggle, started by German ambition was ended by German surrender. The terms of the armistice accepted by Germany are printed on page 103 of this issue. "The war thus comes to an end," said President Wilson, addressing Congress on November 11. "It is the most wonderful victory of Liberty in the history of the world," said Premier Lloyd George to a rejoicing throng massed before his residence in London. "In the fifty-second month of war without precedent in history, the French army, with the aid of the Allies has achieved the defeat of the enemy," announced the French War Office, bul-litting the suspension of hostilities. November eleventh was the climax of a week, tense with excitement, electric with world changes, momentous in its developments. In that week the German army, until then, although driven back, still undefeated, began to sense the flavor of defeat in the loss of its covering positions on the Meuse, the loss of Sedan to the Americans, and in the breaking down of the last German line in France under the merciless pressure of French and British troops. In that eventful week the autocrat, more than any other held by the world to blame for the cataclysm now happily ended, fought against the rising tide of popular demand for his dethronement, and at last signed the paper which will not be scrapped, the formal abdication. In that week, Germany, in whose people militarism had been thought to have destroyed the capacity for revolt or independent thinking, turning the Socialists, swept clean the state of all vestments and trappings of royalty. Emperors, Kings, Princes, and Dukes and Dukes all went their way before the new spirit of free Germany. In that week, the German Navy ran up the red flag and the German army, once the world's model of implicit obedience, asked to respect its officers, tore the insignia from their uniforms, and declared their support of the German Republic.

WHILE the German plenipotentiaries were struggling over muddy and devastated roads on November 7 toward the meeting place assigned for them by Marshal Foch, the Paris manager and the president of the news-gathering organization known as the United Press, cabled to America that the armistice had been signed at 11 A.M. that morning and that hostilities would cease at 2 P.M. The news was sent broadcast over the land and in every quarter of America the delirium of popular joy was manifested in jubilant demonstrations; parades sprung spontaneously from the streets in cities like New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Chicago. Flags of the Allied nations burst to the breeze beside "Old Glory" on flag poles, residences and stores, and in the hands of marching men and women. Bands were improvised with tin horns, and buckets did for drums. In New York, somebody in a high building tore up a paper and sent the fragments on the wind. Other tenants of offices took up the idea and the air was filled with floating white bits, the symbols of peace and victory (and also a reminder of the "scrap of paper," as Germany styled its broken treaty with Belgium), while the streets soon looked as if the first snow had come and cars and traffic were halted by the slippery paper.

In the midst of the carnival, shortly after 2 P.M., came official news from the State Department that the report was untrue, that the envoys had not yet met and that no armistice was signed; but the crowds east aside the sober announcement and preferred to believe the message that sent joy surging through their hearts and the carnival went on past sunset and beyond midnight, with new merry-makers constantly taking the places of those who tired or became convinced that it was all premature. Premature it was, but only that, and it was good practice.

The actual movements of events, officially reported were as follows:

At 12:30 A.M. on November 7, the German wireless transmitted to Marshal Foch a message advising him that a delegation consisting of Matthias Erzberger, General H. K. A. von Winterfeld, Count Alfred von Oberndorff, General von Grunel and Naval Captain von Salow was on its way, and requesting that they be informed by wireless of the place where they could meet Marshal Foch.

Marshal Foch replied at 1:25 A.M., November 7 as follows:

"If the German plenipotentiaries desire to meet Marshal Foch and ask him for an armistice, they will present themselves to the French outposts by the Chimay-Fourmies-La Capelle-Guise road."

At 1 P.M. the German wireless acknowledged the receipt of Foch's directions, and reported that the delegation would reach the French line at 3 P.M., preceded by a road-repairing company.

At 6 P.M. the wireless reported delay, saying that the German delegation would not be able to cross the outpost line until between 8 and 10 o'clock.

Firing ceased on both sides on the section of the front near La Capelle at 3 P.M. on November 7 and the French awaited the arrival of the German delegates. With Marshal Foch, representing England was First Lord of the Admiralty Rosslyn Wemyss and Vice-Admiral Sims, U. S. N., representing the United States. The representatives of the other Allies had not been named in the dispatches as this was written.

The German delegates reached the French outposts at 9:15 P.M. November 7 and were conducted blindfolded in autos with the curtains drawn to the French village of Rethondes, which they reached about 2 A.M. of the 8th. Early in the morning they started on a four-hour trip to the meeting place fixed by Marshal Foch, Senlis, arriving there some time between 10 and 11 A.M. on November 8. They immediately made a formal demand for an armistice. The text of the conditions of the Allies for an armistice was read to them by Marshal Foch, who spoke with emphasis and clearness evidently bringing home to the German delegates the full measure of their defeat. They asked for a cessation of fighting which was refused, and at 11 A.M. on November 8 they were formally advised that they would be given 72 hours in which to accept the terms of the armistice. The delegation had apparently not sufficient authority to act, and a German courier, Capt. Helldorff, was started back through the lines between 6 and 8 o'clock at night on the 8th. The German delegation also used the French wireless to acquaint German headquarters with the facts and to request the sending promptly of another courier bearing instructions. The 72 hours were timed to expire at 11 A.M. on Monday November 11, Paris time, which is about 6 A.M. Washington time.

The courier on reaching the lines found the road under bombardment and was delayed thereby in reaching Spa. The French wireless took up the situation with the German wireless and it was arranged that a French air pilot should carry the courier to Spa. Later firing was stopped and the courier went his way on horseback, reaching Spa at 10 A.M., November 10th. There was a rumor in Washington on Sunday afternoon that Germany had asked for an extension of time, but later dispatches brought the assurance that the armistice had been signed by the German representatives at 5 A.M., November 11, Paris time, midnight in Washington, and that the war would end on November 11 at 6 o'clock A.M. Washington time and 11 o'clock Paris time.

THE State Department gave out the authoritative news of the actual signing of the armistice at 2.50 A.M., November 11. As fast as the news spread up and down the land bells began to ring and whistles to blow. The inhabitants thus rudely awakened, knowing from Thursday's experience what it must mean, reached for their noise-producing implements and a wave of triumphant sound spread north, south and west, so that the sunrise was a signal for the beginning of celebrations, which building on the experience gained on Thursday went on to new maximums of noise and hearty exultation. This time it really was peace. The war was over. The boy "Over There" was safe. Some day he would be home again, and joy was unrestrained. In some of the towns and villages church services of thanksgiving and rejoicing were hurriedly arranged for early morning with ministers leading their people in prayer and praise. From the churches the audiences streamed into processions which carried "Old Glory" and the flags of the Allies up and down the streets, past homes from which the national colors were flying in the breeze.

In Boston the chimes once rung by Paul Revere in the Old North Church on Salem Street, whose night-burn lantern threw forth the first light of American Liberty, rang out again in patriotic airs.

In New York City the news of peace swept up the island of Manhattan. A bulletin posted on the Times building, at Broadway and 7th Avenue, halted the crowd of night workers and merry-makers which immediately began a celebration. Before the celebration had gained momentum a tall, fresh-cheeked English girl climbed to the platform of Liberty Hall, at the meeting point of Broadway and 7th Avenue, and raised her hand. As the crowd became hushed she began in a clear voice to sing the doxology. Hats came off and heads bowed as the song of praise to the Almighty filled the square. Then she sang the Marseillaise, The Star Spangled Banner, and the English National anthem. The Salvation Army on the first information of peace rounded up some 400 of its workers in New York City and held a thanksgiving service on the steps of the Public Library as the dawn began to cover the city with the light of the day of peace.

The Governor of Massachusetts was reported, on November 11, to have declared the 12th a legal holiday throughout the state as "Victory Day," but in every state of the union the people made the 11th a holiday without waiting for the dictum of law, heeding only the joy in their own hearts at the ending of the world's greatest war and the beginning of what appears to be the world's greatest peace.

Throughout the world the surrender of Germany was celebrated in unfeigned joy, and even the German people, although fearful of the consequences of defeat, were themselves rejoiced at peace. Cheering crowds in the capitals of every nation in the war on the Allied side marched and sang in honor and acclaim of victory, Paris and London being especially marked by unrestrained celebrations of the fête day of peace.

PITIFUL as well as tragic were the circumstances surrounding the abdication of the Kaiser. Long before it actually happened, the jaded and anxious monarch had been repeatedly urged to take the one step which would leave the representatives of the German people free to act for the best interests of the nation, but he persistently rejected all such proposals.

Up to the very last he continued to stave off abdication. He went to the German Great Headquarters, it is said, with the deliberate intention of bringing the army around to his side. The effort was a miserable failure. He found that he had only behind him, standing by the ill-fated Hohenzollern régime, a group of Prussian officers who formed themselves into a sort of voluntary bodyguard. The really important army leaders had come over to the side of Hindenburg, who now urged abdication.

During that Friday night, November 8, there was a momentous two hours' conference at which the Kaiser, the Crown Prince, Hindenburg and General Gröner were present. Both officers told the Kaiser the time had come for him to accept the inevitable. Hindenburg, it is said, urged that further delay in abdication would bring about serious demoralization in the army and result in frightful consequences, for which he declined to be responsible. The Crown Prince, who had listened gloomily to the discussion, was impressed by Hindenburg's statements, and was the first to agree that abdication was imperative. Gröner, too, urged it strongly. Their talk, however, seemed to make no impression upon the Kaiser. He sat stubbornly quiet and refused to be convinced.

An hour or more afterward, the Kaiser, who had meanwhile received some communications from Berlin bringing bad news, sent for Hindenburg again. According to the reports, a short but stormy talk followed. What actually passed has not been revealed, but it is known that the Kaiser still persisted in his refusal.

Next morning, after a sleepless night, another conclave was held at Grand Headquarters, at which the Crown Prince, Hindenburg and the officers of the General Staff were present. During those anxious night hours, the Kaiser had come to his senses. A written renunciation of the throne was placed before him. Before he could grasp the pen, a servant entered with a message from Philipp Scheidemann, Socialist member of the Imperial cabinet. It was handed to the Kaiser, who read it with a visible shudder. What it contained seems to have affected him instantly, for he sat down and reached for the declaration of abdication. As he put his pen to the paper, he looked up for a moment, and said:

"It may be for the good of Germany. Let us not lose our faith in the future."

Then he signed. The act was completed in silence, which left Germany without a royal ruler. The Crown Prince signed next, weeping as he put his name to the document. All this happened on Saturday morning.

Then came the preparations for flight. According to the Associated Press dispatch, the ex-Emperor and the Crown Prince crossed the Dutch frontier on Sunday morning. At 7:30 A.M., they arrived in Eysden, midway between Liège and Maastricht. With them were many Prussian officers, practically the whole German General Staff. At Eysden depot, the ex-Kaiser alighted and walked up and down the platform. Although their identity must have been known, the journey was remarkably quiet. At one point, some Belgians, rightly interpreting the movement, cried out:

"En voyage a Paris?" (Are you on your way to Paris?)

At 10:40 the train which was to convey them across the frontier was still at Eysden, with the entire party on board and all the blinds drawn. The fact that any one bearing arms crossing into Holland would be interned did not seem to disturb them in the least, if indeed they were aware of it. At all events, the ex-Emperor did not show signs of distress. The special train which had been prepared for them included restaurant and sleeping cars, and it is said that the ex-Empress was among the party when they arrived at Maastricht. On reaching Maastricht, it was understood that the party would be taken to Middachten Castle, in the township of Desteg, near Utrecht, in Holland. Desteg is on the Guelders Yssel, an arm of the Rhine, about 40 miles east of Utrecht, and only twelve miles from the German border. The Château Middachten, whither the ex-Kaiser went, is the property of Count von Bentinck at one time attaché of the German Embassy in London and an officer in the Prussian Guard.

Friedrich Ebert, Socialist head of new German State

It was unofficially stated that the refugees did not obtain authorization from Holland to enter the country and their presence was said to be a great embarrassment to the Dutch Government which took steps to intern them.

GERMANY, brought to her knees by surrender and revolution, is, on November 12, in the stern grip of Social Democracy. In Prussia, socialist government in an undetermined form is power. In Bavaria and Wurtemberg republics have been proclaimed. The royal family of Oldenburg has fled and a revolution is reported. A republic has been formed in Schleswig-Holstein. Frankfurt, Hamburg, Cologne, Essen, Muelheim, Aix-la-Chapelle, Königsberg, Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Strasbourg and Emeric, as well as many other cities, are in the hands of the revolutionaries. Kiel, Wilhelmshaven, and other ports are in the power of revolutionist naval units. Kaiser William of Germany is fugitive in Holland. King Charles of Austria, who he may still be in his country, has seen his sovereign shattered and is reported to have abdicated. King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, another of the rulers in the Teutonic combination, has fled from his country and his son, who succeeded him, has been forced to yield his power to a Socialist Republic. Sultan Mohammed V. of Turkey, the fourth autocrat of the quadruple alliance, is dead, slain, it is said, by the hand of an assassin.

From all parts of the German Empire news is being received regarding revolutions by Workmen's and Soldiers' Councils, which almost everywhere remain within the bounds of economic order. The German People's Government has been instituted in the greater part of Berlin. The garrison went over to the new Government. The Workmen's and Soldiers' Council on Nov. 9 declared a general strike. Trams and machine guns were placed at the disposal of the Council. Friedrich Ebert, Vice-President of the Socialist Democratic party, is carrying on the Chancellorship

FIRST there was revolt in the German navy. Trouble which had been smoldering at the German naval base of Kiel came to a head on November 7. The crew of the battleship "Kaiser" revolted, killed their commander and some other officers and ran up the red flag. The crews of other ships likewise and the whole squadron at Kiel was so under control of the rebellious crews. A Soldiers' and Sailors' Council was formed which took over the government of the city and assumed control of the food supplies, one of the sources of the trouble. Four companies of infantry sent to Kiel to put down the sailors' revolt, three joined the mutineers and the fourth was disarmed. Cavalry sent against the crew was met by machine guns and turned back. The evening the revolt had spread across Schleswig and the whole of this former Danish province with a major portion of the German fleet was in the control of the Reds. The disaffection was reported also to spreading along the German Baltic coast, the whole coast with its ports being more or less under the spirit of revolt. The greater part of the German battle fleet left the harbor of Kiel on November 8, with red flags hoisted. Some of the ships arrived at Copenhagen being navigated by officers elected by the sailors. Prince Henry of Prussia, the only brother of Emperor William, Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy, was reported to have fled from Kiel on the 6th, under fire from the marines.

Like sparks flung from a mighty anvil under the heavy blow of the hammer, the revolution spread a kindled in a hundred cities. Essen, where the great Krupp steel works are situated, fell quickly into the hands of the revolutionaries. Leipzig, the largest city in Saxony; Stuttgart, the capital of Wurtemberg and Cologne and Frankfurt promptly joined the revolution, and the Soldiers' Councils at Stuttgart, Cologne and Frankfurt proclaimed a republic. Among the latest towns to come under the control of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Councils are Aix-la-Chapelle, Cassel, Nuremberg, Mannheim, Gladbach and Muenster. A general strike has been proclaimed in Nuremberg and Mannheim.

A message from Cracow announces the formation of a Polish Republic under the Presidency of Dept. Daszynski. Poland has assumed sovereignty over Galicia (Austrian Poland).

The Bavarian Diet on Nov. 8 passed a decree deposing the Wittelsbach dynasty on the throne of Bavaria and preparing for a Bavarian Republic. The Wittelsbach family has held the throne of Bavaria since 1080, when the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa established Count Wittelsbach on the throne.

IN BERLIN about noon on Nov. 9 there was a sudden outbreak of trouble in the streets and so the bridges were occupied by strong detachments of troops of various arms, with machine guns. In the center of the city everything still remained quiet.

At 9 o'clock the workmen of the greatest industrial undertakings had commenced a general strike. Processions hastened from all the suburbs to the center of the city, red flags carried at the head. Arm soldiers and all classes marched together.

It was at noon that Socialists Ebert and Scheidemann went in a military automobile accompanied by troops to the Chancellor and declared that they were decided to take the Government in their hands.

President Announces End of War

PRESIDENT WILSON appeared before the Congress at 1 P.M. on November 11 and announced the terms of the armistice, as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Congress: In these times of rapid and stupendous change it will in some degree lighten my sense of responsibility to perform in person the duty of communicating to you some of the larger circumstances of the situation with which it is necessary to deal.

"The German authorities . . . have accepted and signed the terms of armistice . . . These terms, in substance, are as follows:

THE ARMISTICE

I.—Military Clauses on Western Front

One—Cessation of operations . . . six hours after the signature of the armistice.

Two—Immediate evacuation of invaded countries: Belgium, France, Alsace-Lorraine, Luxemburg, to be completed within fourteen days from the signature of the armistice. . . . Occupation by the Allied and United States forces jointly will keep pace with evacuation. . . .

Three—Repatriation, beginning at once and to be completed within fourteen days, of all inhabitants of the countries above mentioned. . . .

Four—Surrender in good condition by the German armies of five thousand guns (500 heavy, 2,500 field), 1,000 machine guns, three thousand minenwerfers. Two thousand airplanes. . . .

Five—Evacuation by the German armies within a further period of sixteen days of the countries on the left bank of the Rhine. These countries on the left bank of the Rhine shall be administered by the local troops of occupation. The occupation of these territories will be carried out by Allied and United States garrisons holding the principal crossings of the Rhine—Mayence, Coblenz, Cologne—together with bridgeheads at these points . . . and by garrisons similarly holding strategic points of the regions. A neutral zone shall be reserved on the right of the Rhine, between the stream and a line drawn parallel to the bridgeheads and the stream and at a distance of ten kilometers, from the frontier of Holland to the Swiss frontier. . . .

Six—(Provides that in the evacuation, no damage is to be done to the inhabitants, their property, military supplies, food, cattle, material, industrial establishments, roads, railways or equipment.)

Seven—All civil and military personnel at present employed on the railways shall remain. Five thousand locomotives, 10,000 wagons, and 5,000 motor lorries in good working order with all necessary spare parts and fittings shall be delivered to the Associated Powers within the period fixed for the evacuation of Belgium and Luxemburg. The railways of France-Lorraine and on the left bank of the Rhine shall be handed over within the same period, together with all pre-war personnel and material. . . .

Eight—(Provides for information regarding mines and pollution of water supplies.)

Nine—(Provides for requisitions by allied armies and requires Germany to pay cost of occupation.)

Ten—An immediate repatriation without reciprocity . . . of all Allied and United States prisoners of war. . . .

Eleven—(Provides for care of German sick and wounded who cannot be moved.)

—Disposition Relative to the Eastern Frontiers of Germany

Twelve and Thirteen—All German troops at present in any territory which before the war belonged to Austria-Hungary, Rumania or Turkey, shall withdraw within the frontiers of Germany as they existed on Aug. 1, 1914. . . . All German troops at present in the territories which before the war belonged to Russia shall withdraw within the frontiers of Germany as soon as the Allies taking into account the internal situation of these territories shall decide that the time for this has come. . . . and all German instructors, prisoners, and military agents as well as military agents now in the territory of Russia to be recalled.

Fourteen—German troops to cease at once all requisitions and seizures in Rumania and Russia.

Fifteen—Abandonment of the treaties of Bucharest and Cest-Litovsk. . . .

Sixteen—The Allies shall have free access to the territories occupied by the Germans on their eastern frontier. . . .

Seventeen—Unconditional capitulation of all German forces operating in East Africa. . . .

IV.—General Clauses

Eighteen—Repatriation, without reciprocity, within a maximum period of one month, in accordance with detailed conditions hereafter to be fixed, of all civilians interned or deported, who may be citizens of other Allied or associated states. . . .

Nineteen—The following financial conditions are required: Reparation for damage done. While such armistice lasts no public securities shall be removed by the enemy which can serve as a pledge to the Allies for the recovery or reparation for war losses. Immediate restitution of the cash deposit in the national bank of Belgium, and in general immediate return of all documents, specie, stocks, shares, paper money . . . touching public or private interests in the invaded countries. Restitution of the Russian and Rumanian gold yielded to Germany or taken by that power. This gold to be delivered in trust to the Allies until the signature of peace.

V.—Naval Conditions

Twenty—Immediate cessation of all hostilities at sea and definite information to be given as to the location and movements of all German ships. . . .

Twenty-one—All naval and mercantile marine prisoners of the Allied and associated powers to be returned without reciprocity. . . .

Twenty-two—Surrender to the Allies and the United States of America of all submarines now existing . . . to be completely disarmed and placed under the supervision of the Allied powers and the United States of America.

Twenty-three—The following German surface warships, which shall be designated by the Allies and the United States of America, shall forthwith be disarmed and thereafter interned

"The war thus comes to an end," continued the President, "for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it.

"It is not now possible to assess the consequences of this great consummation. We know only that this tragical war, whose consuming flames swept from one nation to another until all the world was on fire, is at an end and that it was the privilege of our own people to enter it at its most critical juncture in such fashion and in such force as to contribute, in a way of which we are all deeply proud, to the great result. We know, too, that the object of the war is attained; the object upon which all free men had set their hearts; and attained with a sweeping completeness which even now we do not realize. Armed imperialism such as the men conceived who were but yesterday the masters of Germany is at an end, its illicit ambitions engulfed in black disaster. Who will now seek to revive it? The arbitrary power of the military caste of Germany which once could secretly and of its own single choice disturb the peace of the world is discredited and destroyed. And more than that—much more than that—has been accomplished. The great nations which associated themselves to destroy it have now definitely united in the common purpose to set up such a peace as will satisfy the longing of the whole world for disinterested justice, embodied in settlements which are based upon something much better and more lasting than the selfish competitive interests of powerful States. There is no longer conjecture as to the objects the victors have in mind. . . . Their avowed and concerted purpose is to satisfy and protect the weak as well as to accord their just rights to the strong.

"The humane temper and intention of the victorious Governments have already been manifested in a very practical way. . . . Hunger does not breed reform; it breeds madness and all the ugly distempers that make an ordered life impossible. (See paragraph 26)

"For with the fall of the ancient governments, which rested like an incubus on the peoples of the Central Empires, has come political change not merely, but revolution; and revolution which seems as yet to assume no final and ordered form, but to run from one fluid change to another. . . . With what authority will they meet us, and with what assurance that their authority will abide and sustain securely the international arrangements into which we are about to enter? When peace is made, upon whose promises and engagements besides our own is it to rest?

"Let us be perfectly frank with ourselves and admit that these questions cannot be satisfactorily answered now or at once. But the moral is not that there is little hope of an early answer that will suffice. It is only that we must be patient and helpful and mindful above all of the great hope and confidence that lie at the heart of what is taking place. Excesses accomplish nothing. . . . Disorder immediately defeats itself. If excesses should occur, if disorder should for a time raise its head, a sober second thought will follow and a day of constructive action, if we help. . . .

"The present and all that it holds belongs to the nations and the peoples who preserve their self-control and the orderly processes of their Governments; the future to those who prove themselves the true friends of mankind. To conquer with arms is to make only a temporary conquest; to conquer the world by earning its esteem is to make permanent conquest. . . .

"The peoples who have but just come out from under the yoke of arbitrary government and who are now coming at last into their freedom will never find the treasures of liberty they are in search of if they look for them by the light of the torch. . . . They are now face to face with their initial test. In the meantime, if it be possible, we must establish a peace that will justly define their place among the nations, remove all fear of their neighbors and of their former masters, and enable them to live in security and contentment when they have set their own affairs in order. . . . There are some happy signs that they know and will choose the way of self-control and peaceful accommodation. If they do, we shall put our aid at their disposal in every way that we can. If they do not, we must await with patience and sympathy the awakening and recovery that will assuredly come at last."

in neutral ports, or for the want of them, in Allied ports. . . . and placed under the surveillance of the Allies and the United States of America, namely: Six battle cruisers, ten battleships, eight light cruisers, including two mine layers, fifty destroyers of the most modern type. All other surface warships . . . are to be concentrated in German naval bases . . . and are to be paid off and completely disarmed. . . . All vessels of the auxiliary fleet are to be disarmed. . . .

Twenty-four—(Provides for the clearing of mine fields outside German waters.)

Twenty-five—Freedom of access to and from the Baltic to be given to the naval and mercantile marines of the Allied and associated powers. . . . (This includes occupation of German defense works and clearing of mine fields.)

Twenty-six—The existing blockade conditions set up by the Allied and associated powers are to remain unchanged . . . but consideration is to be given to the provisioning of Germany. . . .

Twenty-seven—All naval aircraft are to be concentrated and immobilized in German bases. . . .

Twenty-eight—In evacuating the Belgian coasts and ports, Germany shall abandon all merchant ships, tugs, lighters, cranes and all other harbor materials, all materials for inland navigation, all aircraft and all materials and stores, all arms and armaments, and all stores and apparatus of all kinds. . . .

Twenty-nine—All Black Sea ports are to be evacuated by Germany; all Russian war vessels of all descriptions seized by Germany . . . are to be handed over to the Allies and the United States of America; all neutral merchant vessels seized are to be released; all warlike and other materials of all kinds seized in those ports are to be returned and German materials . . . are to be abandoned.

Thirty and Thirty-one—All merchant vessels in German hands belonging to the Allied and associated powers are to be restored . . . without reciprocity. No destruction of ships or of materials to be permitted.

Thirty-two and Thirty-three—The German Government will notify the neutral governments of the world, and particularly the governments of Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Holland, that all restrictions placed on the trading of their vessels with the Allied and associated countries . . . are immediately canceled. No transfers of German merchant shipping . . . to any neutral flag are to take place after signature of the armistice.

Thirty-four—The duration of the armistice is to be thirty days, with option to extend. During this period, on failure of execution of any of the above clauses, the armistice may be denounced by one of the contracting parties on forty-eight hours' previous notice.

Thirty-five—This armistice to be accepted or refused by Germany within seventy-two hours of notification.

London, Nov. 11—(Associated Press)—A supplementary declaration to the armistice terms was signed to the effect that in the event of the six German battle cruisers, ten battleships, eight light cruisers and fifty destroyers not being handed over owing to a mutinous state, the Allies reserve the right to occupy Heligoland as an advance base to enable them to enforce the terms.

The Last Week of the War

MARSHAL FOCH'S victorious legions, during the whole time in which the armistice was under consideration at Senlis, continued to drive the Germans back. General Pershing's men took Sedan at 4 P.M. on November 6, sweeping over defenses which the Germans were feverishly preparing, and preventing the completion of dams in the Meuse which would have flooded the river lowlands above and below the city. On November 7 the doughboys, men of the Rainbow and the First Regular Divisions, were in complete control of Sedan, west of the Meuse. In its sweep forward to Sedan, the American First Army completely routed the German Third and Fifth Armies, breaking their communications, taking all their horses so that what guns they were able to get back were hauled by cows taken from the French inhabitants or by the men themselves, and capturing all their supplies, food, lumber, clothing, coal, ammunition, rifles, cannon, everything that is used to make war. In the seven days from November 1 the American troops liberated over 7,000 French civilians, 5,000 of them in Sedan, and cleared of the enemy more than 700 square kilometers of French soil, taking 6,000 prisoners and guns and material as yet uncounted.

November 6 will stand in French history beside September 1, 1870, when the Emperor Napoleon III and his army were crushed by the Prussians. There will be a new Sedan day and it will not stand for German prowess, nor give the Teuton mind a starting-point for dreams of conquest.

The American troops fighting eastward from the Meuse on November 8 drove the Germans from their last positions on the heights east of the river, forcing them into the low ground in the Woivre Forest. The Americans' gain for the day being about six kilometers along a front of fourteen kilometers. The French on the American left drove forward more than twenty kilometers, clearing the west bank of the Meuse to the outskirts of Mezieres and approaching the great railway center of Hirson. The British and French crossed the Belgian border northeast of Valenciennes and were nearing Maubeuge. The Germans were falling back rapidly.

The armies of the Allies in line with General Foch's refusal of a suspension of hostilities continued on November 10 to drive the rapidly retreating Germans into a more unseemly flight. The British on the 9th took Maubeuge, their troops continuing to advance until they reached Mons, the town where the "contemptible little army" first threw itself into the path of the Teuton storm. The French on the 10th took Hirson and crossed into Belgium, northwest of the town. They also had Mezieres practically surrounded (the Germans in one last outburst of frightfulness were filling this city of 20,000 people with poison gas), and had crossed the Meuse south of Mezieres. On the 10th the American Second Army, holding the line, crossing the former St. Mihiel salient, made an attack planned to develop the German strength along this sector where they had recently lost the support of several Austrian divisions. The war closed with the American First and Second Armies engaged in a victorious offensive along a seventy-one mile front, reaching from Sedan, through Stenay, which the Americans took on the 10th, to the German border below Metz, with French and British following up the rapidly retreating Boche, with very little French soil still sullied by the presence of German troops, and with more than one-third of Belgium redeemed. The Americans continued their advance until the hour of peace, and at eleven o'clock on November 11, CONGRESS CERTAINLY REPUBLICAN. Turns from all parts of the country received after we went to press last week indicated that the Democratic party had lost control of both Houses of Congress. On November 8 Republican majority in the House was 239 representatives, Democrats 194, while one Independent and one Socialist had seats. The Senate on November 11 appeared likely to stand 49 Republicans to 47 Democrats, a majority of 2.

NO MORE TURKISH RULE. Washington dispatches of November 7 carried an announcement by the British Embassy declaring aims of France and Great Britain in the Near East to include the complete and final liberation of the peoples so long oppressed by Turks, and the establishment of governments and administrations deriving their authority from the initiative and the free choice of native populations.

FEEDING OUR ENEMIES. In true scriptural fashion returning good for evil the Allies planning to relieve the famine conditions the nations whose armies have recently surrendered. The Food Administration announced, on November 5, that in addition to the 17,500,000 tons of food stuffs which America intended sending to the Allies during the coming year 5,000,000 tons would need be shipped abroad to supply the hungry Austria-Hungary and the Balkans. It indicated that Germany having surrendered this amount would have to be increased. For restrictions will continue even though peace is signed, until another crop has been grown. President Wilson has directed Herbert Hoover to go to Europe as soon as possible to take charge of the measures for the food relief of the liberated peoples. Herr Ebert head of new German Government, appealed to Secretary Lansing, on Nov. 12, to hurry peace. Germany faced famine.

By 4.30, tremendous excitement prevailed in the streets, a large number of motor cars carrying sailors, workmen and soldiers, armed with rifles, and large companies on foot were stopping all men wearing military uniforms and removing shoulder straps, cockades and iron crosses. The red flag was everywhere.

At 5 P. M. the telegraph office was occupied by revolutionaries, and from the balcony window of the imperial palace, whence in August, 1914, the Kaiser addressed a huge crowd of his loyal Berliners, now hung the red flag.

Severe fighting took place in the heart of Berlin between 6 and 8 o'clock that night and there was a violent cannonade. When revolutionary soldiers attempted to enter a building in which they supposed a number of officers were concealed, shots were fired from the windows. Two persons were killed and one wounded before the officers surrendered. The Red forces are in control and have restored order. The Crown Prince's palace has been seized by the revolutionists, the people shouting "Long live the Republic!" and singing the "Marseillaise." There was a general fraternization of soldiers and workmen.

The taking possession of a majority of the public buildings and establishments was completed without difficulty, once it was clear that the military had gone over to the people. Field Marshal von Hindenburg called for delegates from the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council and placed himself and the army under the command of the new People's Government, "in order to avoid chaos."

ON the morning of Saturday, Nov. 9, the Socialist Party declared that it had left the Cabinet. Since then the Socialists and the Independent Socialist Committee have been holding a permanent joint sitting in the Reichstag, where appeared delegations of various regiments garrisoned in Berlin and neighboring towns to express their allegiance to the new popular Government.

Deputy Scheidemann, leader of the majority Socialists in the Reichstag, in a speech said:

"The Kaiser and the Crown Prince have abdicated. The dynasty has been overthrown. It is a splendid victory for the German people. Herr Ebert has been charged with the formation of a new Government in which all shades of the Social Democratic Party are to participate. Only decrees from the Government bearing the signature of Herr Ebert have validity."

Upon assuming office, Nov. 9, Chancellor Ebert issued a proclamation announcing that the new Government at Berlin had taken charge of business "to prevent civil war and famine," and a manifesto to the citizens of Germany that he was going to form a people's government to bring about peace "as quickly as possible," and to confirm the new liberty.

At the same time the Soldiers' Council issued a proclamation announcing that it had taken over the military administration and that its orders must be obeyed.

The groups forming the majority of the German Reichstag, says a Berlin message have agreed to present at the approach session of that body a plan for elections to Reichstag and to the lower houses of the Confederated German States by equal, direct secret ballot, following the principles of proportionate representation and all without distinction of sex. The voting age is to be at 24 years.

Reports coming through Switzerland from the Italian Army indicated that complete chaos prevailed in Austria before and after the signing of the armistice which put Austria out of the war. Vienna was in open rebellion demanding peace. With the armistice signed the Austrian Army was left to get home best they could. Troops were demoralized without food and were plundering reckless artillerists and cavalrymen were selling their horses for a trifle. The Italian armies were attempting to advance in the territory to be occupied by the pending the final settlement, the column of Italian troops being hopelessly tangled along muddy and frozen roads with equally long columns of Austrian prisoners marching to the rear. The roads were littered with carcasses of horses, cannon, shells, tools, rifles, broken-down auto trucks and machine guns. Many Austrians were reported to be dying from sheer fatigue, while Italians were doing all they could to bring food supplies, the refugees eating the flesh of dead horses which they cooked.

A Real Thanksgiving

NEXT week we will all celebrate Thanksgiving day with full hearts and minds at rest. Next week's Christian Herald will be the Thanksgiving number. Annie Hamilton Donnell will tell of Timothy who fought mud over there and whose blue star almost turned to gold. Margaret Sangster, too, brings a message of cheer. Thanksgiving for peace—answered prayer.

Dr. A. E. Keigwin, whose messages find an ever expectant audience, calls to us next week:

"Show Your Colors," and next week, too, Marion Harland, forehanded as are all good housekeepers, begins a discussion of the Christmas fare.

Many minds in agreement means action. The timely symposium of expression from spiritual leaders on the Church after the war, has shown the real unity in our diversity and the unreality of our apparent differences. Next week further letters on this vital and immediately important subject.

At the Sign of the Apothecate

by W. Livingston Larned

WHEN you were quite small, do you remember the awe with which you entered an apothecary shop?

We put this question in this way, quite informally, because we have a son to teach and a moral to point out. And it's very pleasant, now and again, to look back to youth. Sometimes it makes us weigh our modern civilization with the greater understanding and tolerance of the past.

When you were young, there were always big glass balls in drug stores, and they were filled with colored water. At night, with the lights glimmering and shimmering behind them, they were most beautiful to behold. You could hold Mother's hand and watch them, fascinated. And once Uncle Henry slyly intimated that this was red and green and purple medicine, for bad children who needed large doses. When you took it, people knew, for it shone through.

But you were most impressed by the bottles. Oh, those endless shelves of corpulent bottles, with their gold-bordered labels and their enigmatic names! You could read LICORICE and a few others, but most of them were Greek in more senses than one.

Opposite the drug bottles there were shelves filled with other bottles in packages of many colors and hues. That's where they kept a patent pain-killers and cure-alls your generation.

"How is So-and-for-rheumatism?" Mother was apt to inquire, pointing to one slender package, garbed in green and covered all over with tiny type.

"They do say it's making some marvellous cures," the druggist would reply, taking it down and dusting it on his shiny black sleeve and reading the label, just as though he had not read it hundreds upon hundreds of times before.

PERHAPS once a month you came here with Mother, and she solemnly read from a list that had been transcribed with thoughtful care. She would check off each item as the clerk read it on the counter. A sponge, a rubbing-brush, some soap, a fuzzy-towel or wash rag that hurt your eyes terribly, tooth-brushes, a porous plaster to keep in stock, some witch-hazel and arnica and black pills and ointment and syrup of squills and catnip. This was always a serious task and performed with due solemnity. (It required a full fifteen minutes to decide on the sponge. You remember.)

But if there were dark sides to the picture, there were also several high spots. Abutting the case containing the surgical instruments, there was another case. At one end they kept hool tablets, dominoes, pens, pencils and—candy!

It was quite villainous candy, we venture to say, although you did not suspect it then. If Mother happened to be in a spendthrift mood and gave you several pennies, or if you had earned some by moral suasion and wood-chopping, you raised yourself on your very tiptoes and peered into the case. Do you recall the suspense of those moments of indecision? Was it to be a stick of licorice, or some vanilla beans, or gum drops, or blackjack chewing-gum?

You were attracted to the white-and-pink candy mice of your day, with their string tails. This was when they formed roses made of sugar, and when lemon sticks were fat and substantial and very difficult to handle without spoiling your clothes. Mother was inclined to favor "slippery-ellum" lozenges or horehound drops, relieved occasionally by hunks of barbaric rock candy.

ON warm summer days, while the mare pawed at the dirt road out front, you crawled up on a mussy chair at the "sody fount" for a glass of strawberry soda. You wonder now how you ever managed to drink it. The coloring was vivid and the flavor suspicious. It was never very cold. The soapy lather on top pushed up into your nose and made you sneeze. You consumed every drop through a sense of duty. It had been paid for, and you wished to hurt no one's feelings. Mr. Brittleby was compelled to come the long way from the prescription department to mix that drink. It always put him in a pet. People were forever interrupting him when he was busiest. And he was putting up a particularly important prescription for Dr. Hamilton Mundy, of Bell Creek Road. With a sort of savage satisfaction, at reaching the end, Mr. Brittleby would jangle the spoon into the glass. The marble-topped counter was wet and sticky, and flies were investigating the various flavors on its piebald surface. In a broken vase at the end of the counter were three tissue-paper carnations, speckled, dotted, bedraggled.

But your memory holds, first and foremost, a vivid impression of the serious aspect of that drug shop. Years have not dimmed the vision of the flock of pompous bottles, nor dulled the choking gust of drug-scents that were neither pleasant nor reassuring. It was a drug shop, that, in every sense of the word. Drugs, drugs, drugs! Oh, the sardonic, bitter urge of them, as they permeated your clothes and left you wondering if sickness infested the universe of man.

FROM the dregs of your youth does this picture come back, and yet, have you, like many of us, complained of the modern apothecary? Have you laughed in the presence of a friend and remarked, "They call it a drug store, but it's more like a department store. I suppose they do keep drugs about the place somewhere!"

Superficial criticism might justify some of these remarks. You, when you swift, sure stride of events. Comparisons are often good for us. Have you ever gone back, after a lapse of years, to a place or a person once precious in memory? And have you suffered almost appalling disappointment? What was quaint becomes curiously inadequate. The picturesque is mere slovenliness in disguise.

For one thing, your modern druggist is a business man. He must be, to live and to "get on." There is far less of the ancient chemist over a stone crock, and far more of the thoroughly modern salesman catering to this generation. His shop is clean—very clean. It is characteristic of the up-to-date drug store to be immaculate, light, bright, airy, prepossessing. It is rather a pleasure than otherwise to enter and do business with your twentieth-century apothecate.

Gone is the dull and depressing atmosphere of drugs. They are there—ah, yes, just as many and more. Better drugs prepared under far better conditions and kept in a far better way. But they are purposely held in the background. Drugs are not pleasant things to contemplate. They suggest illness. That is their mission and their character. But why should a community be asked to scan these stodgy rows of bottles?

WE are no longer frightened when we enter an apothecary's store. Even much of the odor is gone. All the dread appurtenances of death and disaster are relegated to secret archives, far from the hurried throng. It's better so.

Trade conditions have had much to do with bringing this about, of course.

There is less money in drugs than in the olden days. As a matter of fact, people need less and take less drugs. Doctors do not ask people to take as much. The gathering and marketing of drugs, wholesale, have been scientifically systematized. Prices are set more or less arbitrarily. A druggist can take it or leave it, as he sees fit.

The chain-store idea has brought your small druggist up with a sharp rein. He has no vast financial system to back him and to rehabilitate his environment. He may not change his shop's dress every little while. He must depend on two definite things—friendship, than which there is no more potent business power, and matching fire with fire, fighting modernism with modernism.

At the former, if he is born to his trade, he is an adept. You and I have sentiment when it comes to a druggist. A druggist may make friends who are friends always, all their lives.

EVEN when a druggist has a complete line of drugs and allied products, he has much room left in his store. What shall he do with this extra space?

spend that reminiscent moment or two, are apt to read progress in the

It has come about, therefore, that drug stores have widened their scope. They stock up on many lines not at all akin to drugs. Yet, when we reason it out rationally, is there any real reason why this store shall be prohibited from selling whatever it can sell, in its particular locality? The more profit, the better shop. When an establishment is making money it can afford to do things; to improve; to brighten and make more attractive its shell. Small profits mean handicaps. One great outstanding reason why your modern drug store is such a beautiful store, is its increased patronage. It has more to do with. The chain drug stores have not been abashed at revolutionizing the methods. They have special "penny sales" and display magic stocks of teas, coffees, olive oil, and even groceries. What of it? If these articles can make a drug store more profitable, let them try it on the trade. Please note one significant thing—the modern drug store is a delight to the eye and to the senses. There is nothing at all to indicate that the drugs you buy there are less potent than they were in the day of our grandfathers. Because a man sells manufactured ivory toilet articles or cooking devices, done in dainty aluminum, it does not signify that the prescription filled somewhere in that store will not measure up to full efficiency.

THERE are bright lights and mirrors and flowers and pretty things to look at. The dirty, slovenly soda fount of the old régime has been superseded.

Windows facing the street provide a panoramic vista of all that is voguish and new and clever. People never avoid drug stores any more. They are invariably the most popular place in town—particularly the smaller towns. And as drug stores are open late at night, they provide a last-minute emergency depot, when other shops are locked.

The national advertiser is working in full accord with the druggist. Thousands of articles sold over his counters are put to the world on a basis of very skillful campaigns, appearing in all important magazines and papers.

Advertising has enabled the druggist to broaden his field and widen his stock. The demand is created in advance. The manufacturer, in turn, finds it possible to make containers more attractive. Individual articles look in key with their surroundings. They are an ornament to the shop.

It required a full fifteen minutes to decide on the sponge

Youth—the youth of Now—has been built into the very fiber of the modern drug store. As the twilight fades and the village street becomes a purple thread, your boy and my girl, as we were wont to do, but in an entirely different spirit, go laughing into "Brown's drug store on Main Street." They are laughing and happy, and they sit at the little round tables and drink soda or nibble ices, and seem to know that this bright place is an oasis.

And you—you are reminded of how you used to peep in shyly at the door many years ago, and sniff and dread entering. It's all so different—so much better!

Glorious Peace

THE terms of armistice offered to Germany represent a complete victory for democracy over autocracy.

The greatest war in all the history of the world is coming to an end in the most decisive peace ever made.

The sudden lifting of the tremendous burden of the war, together with the opening of a glorious vision of a world of peace and justice, is flooding with gladness the hearts of the entire civilized world.

Even the peoples of the surrendered nations are said to be joyous; and well they may be, for it is a surrender to liberty, righteousness and progress, in which these peoples with all the others will directly benefit.

In the downfall of autocracy the crash of empires is illustrated on a scale that can justly be termed colossal. To a dramatic mind, the leading events of the war might readily take the shape of a vast drama, surpassing in interest any the world has ever seen. Its stage, two hemispheres; its players, kings, emperors, mighty warriors and uncounted hosts; its carnage so dreadful and overwhelming as to recall the words: "And the winepress was trodden . . . and blood came out of the winepress, even unto the horses' bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs."

In its closing stages the great drama has presented scenes such as historians have never dreamed of. The campaign in which the enemy spent her last effort will pass into history as the most gigantic defeat in history. The battle lines have been the longest ever known. The millions thrown into the struggle have made all previous wars seem puerile. Now that it is all ended the races of men have had their fill of war and, let us hope, will banish it forever!

The peace will bring to an end a tyrannous rule over many millions representing nationalities who for centuries have been under its control. How these liberated peoples will adjust themselves to the new conditions is a problem that will require time for a satisfactory solution. But the influence of the new spirit which has arisen in Europe, the spirit of freedom and independence, will doubtless continue to increase long after the war, while the proposed League of Nations which President Wilson has outlined, and to which practically all the Allies have given their approval, will aid in the establishment of a "partnership of peoples and not a mere partnership of governments."

Thus while peace marks the end of the war, that end will itself mark the beginning of the new era—the changed order of things throughout the civilized world.

All the strength, the influence and the wisdom of the best of the free and progressive nations will be needed in dealing with the new situation.

To recreate a world, to restore a broken-down civilization to livable conditions, to rehabilitate the ruin of the best efforts of the centuries, to revitalize industry, re-establish law and order, will become the duty of all the peoples, both combatants and neutrals alike.

In this great reconstructive work America must be a leading factor. As we trained for war with zeal and thoroughness, so we must train for securing the victories of peace with just consideration.

In this great work which lies before us in the near future, may we have the Divine wisdom constantly as our guide, otherwise our glorious victory will be in vain.

League of Nations to Enforce Peace

IT was a mighty advance in law and order when the court took the place of the corner brawl in settling disputes, and the policeman took the place of the armed citizen.

It was a great step forward in civilization when public opinion began to say that men should use their reason instead of their revolvers in maintaining their rights. Today, except in unusual instances, civilized individuals do not use their own force, but delegate the force to the police and the court.

The best thinking of the world as well as all the lessons of history indicate that the only method by which the danger of war can be reduced to the minimum is by substituting law for war among nations, just as law has been substituted for war among individuals within the nations.

This great world-war has taught us that the most urgent, the most necessary, the most fundamentally religious duty now before us, is the devising and adopting of some method other than war for settling the disputes that are bound to arise between nations. Unless this can be done we can never be sure that at any moment the results of generations of preaching and teaching may not be consumed in the fires of war.

The idea of a league of nations is no longer the mere vision of seers, the dream of prophets and the intellectual plaything of theorists. It is today one of the most concrete and unavoidable issues in the field of practical statesmanship.

One by one, since the present war began, the leading statesmen of practically all of the countries have come to the support of the league-of-nations proposal. President Wilson has made it the cardinal feature of America's new foreign policy. He has said that it must be incorporated in the peace treaty.

It is not at all unlikely that a league of nations, once under way, could provide, for the first time in history, a joint instrument through which the nations could really approach the problem of the co-operative control of armaments.

It is not at all unlikely that a league of nations could afford the machinery and the base of co-operation that would help toward the guaranteeing of justice and equity for all nations in the matters of access to the seas, access to raw materials, access to markets and equality of economic opportunity in general.

It has the virtue of being not an artificially conceived scheme which philosophers and statesmen are trying to shove down over the growing life of the world. It is, on the other hand, the ripest expression of that growing life, and is simply the next step forward toward which all the evolution of history and government has been tending.

Under New Management

WITH the present issue, the Christian Herald appears under new management. Mr. Graham Patterson, of Chicago, who for the last seven years has been in charge of the general western business of this paper, has purchased the controlling interest, and has been chosen President of the Christian Herald Corporation.

Mr. Patterson is well known in the field of religious journalism, and as President and Publisher he brings to his new position qualities that will result in making the publication more attractive, as well as more directly serviceable to its wide circle of readers. His long experience in church, Sunday school and settlement work, which still goes on, will bring him into close, sympathetic relations with all that this journal has always stood for.

The present editorial staff will continue under the new management. Its members welcome Mr. Patterson as a strong and desirable accession—one whose familiarity with the religious aims and purposes of the Christian Herald and whose warm sympathy with its benevolent and missionary work in many fields make the choice an ideal one.

Dr. Gray's New Series

DR. JAMES M. GRAY'S New Series on Prophecy, shortly to begin in the Christian Herald, will open with two instructive articles showing how the average Bible reader may study prophecy for himself. Their titles will be "How to Interpret Prophecy" and "Two Great Laws of Prophetic Interpretation." These will be followed by articles on current events in the light of the Prophetic Word, including:

"Russia, and the World Problem of the Jew,"
"How the Jewish Nation Will Bless the World,"
"How the War is Fulfilling Prophecy," and
"How Germany's Defeat Will Transform Europe."

We would advise all of our readers—and as many of their friends as they can induce to subscribe—to give these articles the attention they merit. They are especially timely as interpretations of Scripture in view of the great changes, territorial and national, that are being brought about by the world war. They are in the highest sense scholarly and conservative. Dr. Gray writes with the advantage of familiarity with the work of the ablest expositors of prophecy, and is himself recognized as a leading authority on the subject.

Ideal Christmas Giving

DID you read last week our announcement of the "Christmas Chest"—a fund to provide Christmas cheer for the war sufferers across the seas? It has struck a sweet responsive chord in many a heart in tune with the season's spirit.

It is true that much, perhaps most, giving of Christmas gifts is far from in keeping with the real spirit of the sacred day or in accord with reason. But true giving has its source in the best part of our nature. It is the sweetest expression of our best feeling. It is no more restrained than can the waters of a spring and human life would be as desolate without the one as the earth without the other. Christmas itself is but an observance of the greatest and divinest gift ever made to the world.

There can be no holier sentiment attached to a gift on Christmas day than charity, for charity combines all that is good and tender in human ideal, impulse and emotion. There is a double joy in charity, for it blesses two. It not only gives happiness in the gift itself but it quickens and develops, for all after life, pure, precious qualities of mind and heart that are well-spring of peace. Charity comes nearer to spanning the immeasurable space between the sin of the world and the holiness of heaven than any other blessing that mankind knows.

An ideal Christmas which would really mean genuine good will among men is one in which no one should be cold, hungry, shelterless or friendless—in which they who have would think first of the who have not.

All the wisdom, thrift and generosity of mankind has not been able to dissipate the cloud of poverty. Seldom if ever in world history have so many people faced dire distress as they do today. Yet it would not be impossible—not so very difficult even—for the Christian Herald Family alone to wipe hunger for one day out of every home and refugee camp in at least the land of Him who said "Inasmuch as ye have done unto these my brethren, even these least, ye did unto me." There is loving kindness enough, if only coined into dimes and dollars, to do it many times over. Alas, enough will be wasted in frivolous giving, this opulent land to supply a meed of surcease to every aching heart in the world!

All that is called for is the right spirit in every man and woman. No organization is required. Each must act for himself. The Christian Herald will serve as a vehicle for transmitting the money to be wisely dispensed by agencies already in operation.

Child Labor Day

CHILD Labor Day will be observed throughout the country on Saturday, January 25, in synagogues, on Sunday, January 26, in the churches and in the schools on the following Monday, the days having been designated by the National Child Labor Committee. It will be an occasion for review of the work and achievement of Children's Year.

The Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor is arranging to have reports from its field workers available for the programs of churches, schools, clubs and other organizations.

The Children's Year work includes, besides the baby-saving campaign, a crusade against wartime child labor and a nation-wide back-to-school drive in both of which the National Child Labor Committee is participating.

The coming Child Labor Day, says an official statement by the Committee, will be a time for asking in respect to the protection and education of the children, how the country has been preparing in wartime for the period of reconstruction.

Getting Back to Schedule

THIS issue of the Christian Herald will reach readers a few days late, but we expect to have the next number delivered on time. In last week's issue we explained the reason for the non-receipt of the Christian Herald on publication day—due to a strike of the press feeders which completely shut down printing plants in New York City. Not a week turned in any of the hundreds of publishing establishments from October 19th to October 29th.

The printing of the large edition of the Christian Herald requires the continuous running of the press night and day in order that it may be mailed to reach each subscriber on the date of issue. The refusal of the press feeders to work made it impossible to print the Christian Herald on time. Other magazines were similarly affected. The strike was especially disastrous to the weeklies, forcing such publications as the Literary Digest, Outlook, Independent and others which also have a nation-wide circulation, to suspend publication of the issue due during the last week of October, so that readers of these publications entirely missed one issue.

Through the efforts of the War Labor Board, strikers returned to work on October 29th. The Christian Herald by extra effort arranged to get out every issue—this one a few days late, and as stated before, we hope to have next week's issue out on time.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Conducted By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

St. Bartholomew's Dedicated

THE new St. Bartholomew's Episcopal Church at Park Avenue and East Fifty-first Street, New York, which with building and lands cost $2,000,000, was formally opened on October 20. Rev. Lighton Parks, rector of the church, offered prayer for the soldiers and sailors, read the honor roll of the church, and made introductory remarks. Bishop David H. Greer then preached the dedicatory sermon, saying, among other things:

and so you have built your sanctuary of God with strength and beauty, not for a selfish end or for parish glory or pride, but for a nobler and more unselfish purpose, a purpose more devout, that by means of it—the sanctuary of God—with strength and beauty but, as from time to time, enter through its doors, you may be made to feel a lively sense of God, and of the presence of God, which no other kind of house made with hands can give. The Bishop said that at a time like the present it would be neither expedient nor right to carry the new church to completion. He recalled that the fund for the construction of the building had been collected before, and not after, this country entered the war.

Our energy and substance, the Bishop continued, must now be expended on a more immediate work, the work of defending and tending to maintain inviolate and safe that great and growing temple of our modern civilization which in all the ages past, through sacrifice and toil, has been slowly rising, and is not finished yet; yes, to defend it, to try to keep it inviolate and safe, lest by a wanton and a lawless force it should be destroyed, trampled down, broken down, and become a den of robbers.

The new structure, which stands on the site formerly occupied by the F. and M. Schaefer Brewery, is of Romanesque architecture, and is one of the largest and most stately ecclesiastical edifices in the United States. Its institutional work, of the sanest and safest type, includes its St. Bartholomew House, East Fifty-second Street, and parts of the building are not completed. The human goal was made to be a temple of God. The church is built to help make it so, by giving strength to character and beauty to an unselfish life. This thought is expressed in the text Bishop Greer took for his sermon: "Strength and beauty are in His sanctuary." (Ps. 9:6.)

Scar Made Red Cross

WITH a cross on his back, Private Jean Fournan of New York City will hereafter carry a souvenir of the world war. He is known at American Military Hospital No. 1 in Paris, where he is convalescing, as the "Red Cross man." One morning, a short time ago, a shrapnel shell struck him. He had a momentary stinging sensation, and then awoke to find himself on an American sanitary train, from which he was taken by ambulance to the hospital. When he was carried to the operating room the surgeon looked him over and then called the other doctors to come and look. The boy had been hit by a piece of shrapnel, one of which had gone down his back so close to his spine that only a remarkable chance saved him from paralysis. The other had crossed at right angles, leaving the mark of a perfect cross on his back. How suggestive this cross, the symbol of sacrifice for others, on the back of the dear boy who had offered his life on the altar of his country! Fournan has those pieces of shrapnel in his Red greatest glory. Paul bore the scar of a red cross on his back. They whipped him so hard for being a follower of Christ that the gashes ran with blood, and when they were healed they left scars. And when the officers took him from the prison to the place of execution where he was to die for the Christ who had died for him, they no doubt found able to supply the demand. He went down to Muscatine and got money enough to start a little factory, which turned out buttons in great quantities. The city went wild over the success. For miles above and below the city the Mississippi was thick with the boats of the mussel shell fishermen, who made good wages and occasionally found a real pearl in the shell worth from three to four thousand dollars. The enterprise grew to huge proportions. It was twenty-eight years ago when the young farm-hand picked up the lucky shell. Recently it was discovered that these mussel beds could not grow their crops fast enough to supply the factories, and the doom of that local industry seemed to be threatened. The Federal Government came to the rescue, and limited the amount of dredging in certain streams. The shortage still continued, and the expert biologists found that the scarcity of fish in the streams partly accounts for the decrease in the mussel supply. Accordingly a government mussel farm has been instituted. The mussel is a parasite, which fastens itself to the fins or gills of a fish. The experimental farm near Muscatine has tanks into which are placed the kinds of fish for which the mollusks have an affinity. Then a quantity of undeveloped infant mussels are released in these tanks, and in a short time they attach themselves to the fishes, which are put into the Mississippi River. The mussel develops its organism and then dislodges itself and sinks to the bottom, where it secures itself. In this way the government hopes to keep up the button supply of the Mississippi River. The ingenuity of man in taking the dead shell to fasten the garments of the living and in fastening the spawn of the mollusk to the fish to raise the shell of pearl illustrates his mastery over creation as thus ordered: "And have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." (Gen. 1:28.)

Fatal Automobile Accidents

THE automobile is a blessing and has come to stay and hence the necessity of wisdom and caution in the use of a machine in itself so dangerous. While large numbers of drivers manifest this wisdom and caution, too many are reckless and criminal in the victims they mangle and kill. In New York City alone the careless handling of automobiles caused the death of fifty-six persons during October, nearly two a day. Whatever be the cause the municipal, state and federal authorities should stop these murderers in their mad rush for wealth or pleasure and compel a due regard for the rights and lives of their fellows on the road. No voice is louder for a reform in this matter than the people who own automobiles themselves. The Mosaic law was very strict with those who killed their neighbors even through accident. There is this reference to a reckless driver in olden times: "And the driving is like the driving of Jehu, the son of Nimshi; for he driveth furiously." (11 Kings 9:20.)

New Declaration of Independence

THE Congress of Representatives of the Subject Races of Germany and Austria has just closed its session in Independence Hall in Philadelphia. These men came from eighteen nationalities and represented over 60,000,000 people, including Finns, Lithuanians, Jugo-Slavs, Czechoslovaks, Rumanians, Ukrainians, Italian Irredentists, etc. They came to memorialize the United States and the Allies regarding the claims for freedom of each nation. Dr. Masaryk, prime minister of the Czechoslovak nation, a man of great ability and high character, presided over the convention. A few months ago the prospects for the liberty these people sought seemed far from hopeful. To Moscow across Poland, to Constanza across Rumania, to Salonica across Serbia, to Constantinople across Bulgaria, it was Berlin's plan to drive its power, and a shadow of terror and gloom settled down over these subject races. But the tide of battle turned and gave them hope. That Congress was one of the significant events of modern history. Its staging was spectacular. It met in the very room where the American Constitution was drawn up; around the same table on which the original Declaration of Independence in 1776 was signed. Professor Masaryk, the president of the Congress, sat in the same chair Washington occupied when the Republic was born, and the delegates signed the new Declaration of Independence on the historic table sanctified and dedicated forever to the cause of freedom by the laying on of hands of the Revolutionary Fathers. After the signature of the paper, declaring the subject races of Middle Europe free forever, the New Liberty Bell was rung, and a new era of liberty, love and happiness to millions of suffering creatures was ushered in. The new bell will be carried by the delegates to several cities, and then will be placed permanently in the Peace Palace in Brussels. The first Declaration made 3,000,000 free; the new one set twenty times that number at liberty. The first one had to be followed by a long Revolutionary War, the second comes at the close of the World War. It took the nations engaged in this war a good while to find what it was for, but God knew all the time. It was to make the world right and to make it free. The Congress at Philadelphia was one of the first fruits of this universal liberty and righteousness. It was to bring truth, justice, love, sacrifice for others, and a peace that shall never be broken to the end of time. It was to lift the world up to the ideals and person of the Christ and put it under his authority as the only real Ruler, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." (Rev. 11:15) on his back the scars thus referred to: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." (Gal. 6:17.)

Mussel Shells and Buttons

A YOUNG farm-hand employed near Muscatine, Iowa, walking along the bank of the Mississippi River, picked up a mussel shell and in it he thought he saw a button, millions of buttons. He had learned in the old country to make buttons out of horn. So he set up a little hand lathe in his employer's barn and made a few samples of these buttons, which he gave to his lady friends, and the call for them became so clamorous that he was un-

The Rebirth of a World

A SERMON BY REV. JAMES T. NICHOLS*

TEXT—Rev. 21:5. "Behold, I make all things new."

AT the creation we are told that the "morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy." For thousands of years these heavenly messengers were silent; but when Jesus was born in Bethlehem, this mighty chorus was heard again, singing "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." Surely the heavenly chorus will soon sing again, for the warless age of which the prophets spoke is near at hand. The nations of the earth are getting ready to "beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruninghooks." Above the lurid horizon of war, peace is shining.

This may be the darkest hour of all history. More people may be homeless, hopeless and miserable at this hour than ever before at any one time since the curtains of history were opened at the dawn of creation; but the darkest hour is just before the daybreak. The world is just entering the dawn of the brightest day in all the history of mankind. This war was to end war, to crush forever the spirit of militarism. The happiest day imaginable will be when the spirit of Christ so permeates society that "Nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of Jehovah hath spoken it."

Civilization has passed through some great crises. Out of the darkest age came the greatest renaissance. When it seemed that all was lost, science, art and learning were reborn. Invention and discovery became the order of the day. Shortly after the "morning star of the Reformation" appeared in England, came the greatest century of progress the world has ever known. Columbus discovered the New World, and a new passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope was found. Gunpowder changed the system of war. The compass changed the system of navigation. The printing press changed the system of education. The Reformation revolutionized the Church, and forces that had been hidden for ages were set free.

While these mighty strides ushered in an age of light, and civilization went forward by leaps and bounds, the curse of war was not removed. As the years went by, all the science and inventions of the ages were centered upon implements of destruction. It seemed impossible to have universal peace until there had been a universal war. No single nation or even a combination of nations could be formed that had power to abolish war. The militaristic spirit was firmly established in the heart of a nation with a so-called divinely appointed leader, and it seemed that his dream of world dominion was about to be realized.

LIKE a thunderclap out of a clear sky came the outbreak of this world war. For more than four years the life-and-death struggle has gone on, but the end is in sight. Civilization has been in a great melting-pot and the fires of war are burning the dross away. Nations that have made no contribution to the onward progress of true civilization are being consumed. Nations with ideals of truth and right are coming from the fire shining as pure gold.

One of the brightest of these is Belgium, which is one of the smallest of all in extent; but the strength of a nation is not measured by the boundary line of its territory. King Albert, with his little handful, changed the destiny not only of a continent but of the whole world. He is the Leonidas of the twentieth century. His little country has not only made a great contribution to civilization, but is really the savior of democracy for at least a thousand years.

One of the nations doomed is Turkey. The death rattle is already in her throat; the day of her funeral is at hand. What has she contributed to science, art, finance, agriculture, law, or anything else, for that matter? Did she not find a country in Europe, five hundred years ago, that had produced great men and encouraged science and art, and did she not introduce polygamy and slavery to that country? Did she not take the homes of the seven churches in Asia and blight them as rust destroys a field of grain? Did she not take the oldest city in the world, noted for its silk-looms and steel-works, and turn its factories into dog-kennels and its homes into hovels? Did she not take the very land made sacred by the feet of Him who wore the crown of thorns and turn its vineyards and productive valleys into the most desolate land on earth? The English have done more for Palestine during a few months' occupation in time of war than Turkey did for it in all the hundreds of years in which she controlled it. It is worth a war to get rid of a nation that has cursed every land it has touched for a thousand years!

Now, for four and one-half years, all the science and inventions of modern times have been used to destroy the world. The brains of nations have been battling with each other in an effort to devise implements of destruction more terrible than have ever been used before. This destruction, too, is all but complete. The ocean has become a great graveyard. Even the land itself, at least a great part of it, has been ruined. The most sacred buildings ever erected by the hands of man are now piles of ruins. The most precious paintings ever put on canvas, the most valuable books and documents ever printed, have been ruthlessly destroyed. The most sacred treaties ever made have been treated as scraps of paper; honor, justice, respect for women, purity and innocence of childhood have been trampled under foot. The very foundations of civilization seemed to be giving away; for a while the whole world reeled and staggered like a drunken man, and the clock of doom seemed ready to strike.

BUT now a new day is dawning! A new world is being born! It will be better for us to be living during the next ten years than in any decade of all history. Never before could the words of my text be spoken with such meaning as at this moment. Out of this war we can see already some of the greatest blessings that ever enriched mankind. Already we may see the beginning of the new era in transportation which the war is ushering in; the gigantic business enterprises, the like of which the world never dreamed; scientific discoveries in minerals, metals, gases, and the like, which would have taken generations to work out; control of forces on land, sea, and sky, that makes the brain stagger to contemplate. Dismissing all these and a hundred other marvels, let us look at some things near our homes and hearts that are making this a new world.

First of all, think of the thousands of homes that must be restored. More than seventy million acres of densely populated Allied territory have been held by the Huns. Not only have thousands of homes been destroyed, but much of the very soil ruined.

Hardly had an acre of these devastated lands been rescued from the invader before the English Quakers came to the aid of the civil population. They get what is left of a family together in the village or community; prepare a shack in which the family can live; furnish garden seeds and help them get started again. Mrs. Ward says of these Friends, who sing while they work: "They are building wooden houses, roofing them with tile. Around them are poor people, whose features are stiff and gray like those of the dead. These are women, old men and children, the weaklings of our sweet France, who have lived for months in damp caves and dens till they look like Lazarus rising from the tomb. But life is beginning to come back to their eyes and lips. The hands they stretch out to you tremble with joy. Tonight they will sleep in a house—their house. And inside there will be beds and tables and chairs, and things to cook with. As they go in and look, they embrace each other, sobbing."

This has been to them a sad, sad world, but, behold, all things are being made new!

Then the rebuilding of men's bodies is truly wonderful. Going through one of the great base hospitals in France, I saw how shattered bones are sawed out, new bones fitted in and grown fast together. Men have been brought in with noses shot away, jaw-bones shattered, and the very sight of their faces horrible to behold. But new noses have been grown, artificial jaw or chin bones been made of steel, and the entire faces of men made over. Were it not for the fact that photographs were made when they were brought in, it would be impossible to believe the facts in hundreds of cases.

Better still, pain has been all but eliminated. New discoveries in medical science have made it possible to stop the pain of a burn, for instance, in ten minutes. Wounds heal in less than half the time they formerly required before these new remedies were used. I have seen smiles on the faces of many patients who declared that they were as comfortable as they could be. Bodies of wounded men are swung in a sort of harness, and bed-sores are unknown; men whose bodies were almost shot to pieces are in a short time on the way to recovery and actually looking forward to going again to the front. This one remedy to eliminate pain will itself be almost worth a war, when its application becomes universal. The sufferings of this war are becoming the means to banish pain, and the words, "Behold, I make all things new," have a new meaning.

AGAIN, there were scores and hundreds of men who were making no contribution to civilization, and never would have made any, had they not been entirely disabled for military duty, who are now a real blessing to humanity. Palaces have been turned into workshops and machinery put to work, and hundreds of these disabled men put to work as soon as their wounds were healed. Some have already become inventors and discoverers. All these years they have had talents and ability which they themselves knew nothing about, and perhaps never would have had a chance to develop, had they not been wounded and disabled for military duty. One rarely sees more grateful and contented men than those in the "Lighthouse" in Paris, who are learning to become independent, although they will never see the sunlight or the beautiful flowers again. Although sightless, they see the meaning of the text, "Behold, I make all things new."

A new brotherhood, the like of which the world never knew, is being born. Deeds of heroism almost approaching the divine are performed every day. This is seen everywhere among the Allied armies. Unselfish heroism everywhere! This is common to all—the millionaire's son as well as the man from the slums. Wounded men plead that their comrades be operated on and looked after before themselves. This brotherly spirit is so outstanding among our own soldiers that in the villages everywhere the children follow them, climb upon their laps, and hug them as though they were their own parents.

Unselfish devotion is everywhere among the stricken peoples. In one case the Germans entered a town, and an officer was shot. The populace was summoned and the heartless commander stated that if the one who shot the Hun did not consent in ten minutes, all the men would be killed. The people were dumbfounded and eight or nine minutes passed in silence, when a woman—a mother—stepped forward and said she did it. She was shot to death before the eyes of the people. They doubt supposed this woman was responsible for the deed until, a day or two later, a French soldier came from his hiding-place and said it was he who shot the German officer. This heroic woman died voluntarily given her life to save the men in the village. Yes, all things are being made new.

THE Church, too, is being reborn. Formalism and selfishness had in many cases driven the Master from the very buildings dedicated to his name. Traditions had taken the place of the Word of God. Made-in-Germany rationalism had often supplanted the doctrine of the divinity of Christ. Even ministers were belittling the miraculous. Jesus was no longer the Son of the Living God, but a teacher of morals and ethics. Behold! the Christ of the Bible is being restored, and becoming a living reality in the hearts of men. The spirit of love and self-sacrifice is coming to its own. Protestants, Catholics and Jews are not shaking each other's hands, but comforting each other's hearts. For the first time in history Christianity is having an opportunity to be tested, besides other religions and philosophies, and is making good across the sea. The Church will never be the same again, for all things are being made new.

During all the years, the Church in America has been creeping along like a little child; but at the war it will stand upon its feet and walk like a man. A new era of liberality and unselfish devotion is being ushered in, and the Church is already in the throes of a new birth. When the multitudes who have been up against life and death come home, they will help make the Church what it ought to be. No shams or littleness will go with these men. They went across the sea as boys; they will come home as full-grown men. They will help make all things new.

Some one has said that every time history is moved forward by leaps and bounds, it has been when great national streams converge. No nation or people can reach the highest standard alone. Each has its contribution to make, and when the nations suffer and sacrifice together, they are welded together by hands that cannot be parted asunder. Such sacrifice, in the hands of God, is making a new world. The ideals of the Christ are becoming the ideals of humanity, and the voice of inspiration is saying, "Behold, I make all things new."

The Revelation in the After Days

SUNDAY, November 24. John 13:7. "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." There are numberless things to which at present we have no clue. Many of the Master's words have no immediate significance for us. Any of the things which he does to us hide their secrets. But the veil is only for a while. In after days the dark word will unfold a wealth of strength and grace, and the confusing experience, which perplexed like a fog, will find a minister of interpretation in the later experience and it will become transparent. No revelation waits upon life. We cannot force secrets by the strenuous grappling work of the intellect. We do not reach the most precious light God by the venturesome journeys of the reason, but by the faithful commonplace pilgrimage of daily life. That is to say, later events hold the keys to present mysteries. When the latter event arrives, it opens a lock of some perplexity, as though the puzzling thing had been touched by a magician's wand. It is a bit of good struggling for a premature unfolding of the divine mystery. The revelation awaits our arrival at a certain place on the road, and when time brings us to that place, and we enter into the experiences, we shall find to our delightful surprise that the old, darksome thing has become luminous. And so the only thing we need to be concerned about is to be on the King's highroad, stepping out in accordance with his most holy will. "Light is sown for the righteous." At the right moment the shining harvest will appear. J. H. J.

His Benefits

MONDAY, November 25. Ps. 103:2. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits." It is not strange that we are often blind to the fact that God's goodness is exercised toward us quite as certainly in the preservation of unbroken health as it could possibly be in recovery from illness. We demand miracles, yet are blind to the daily miracle of strength sustained. A man was relating the story of his wonderful escape from shipwreck at sea. A friend of his said, "I have a still more wonderful story to relate," and proceeded to the narrative of a voyage which was unbroken by accident of any kind. Someone said, "I see nothing wonderful in your experience; you had a normal voyage. Why could you compare your story with that of one who is in danger and was so marvelously delivered?" The man answered, "I was in danger every minute of the voyage. So is every man who goes to sea. It is every man who stays on land. God's providence keeps us in safety. Is not God as good to me—is not as good to all of us who never have had hairbreadth escapes—as he is to those who look death in the face and who come back in safety?" One who has been sick unto death and who is restored is very grateful, or at least he should feel so. How much more grateful should we be who are preserved in health! It is foolish, indeed it is wicked, to see God's providence only in the emergencies of our lives. Consider the case of Hezekiah, who came back from the gates of death and was grateful and content. As a matter of fact, his life was no more a gift of God to him after his recovery than it was before, but he had been made to see the gracious benefits of God. It is a good thing for us to have our eyes opened to God's goodness by one means or another. Surely we should be open-eyed to the commonplace benefits of life—bodily strength, sane minds, well-disposed wills, clean ancestry, comfortable homes, precious friends, and above all, the inestimable blessings of the Gospel of the Son of God. "Forget not his benefits." "New every morning is the love or waking and uprising prove." C. C. A.

The Master of the Harvest

TUESDAY, November 26. Jer. 5:24. "Neither say they in their heart, Let us now fear the Lord our God, that giveth rain, both the former and the latter in his season: he reserveth unto us the appointed weeks of the harvest." When Peter had made his miraculous draught of fishes, he fell down before Jesus, saying: "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, Lord." He perceived at once that his great success was not due to his skill and labor. He knew that he had not achieved it. But he could not claim it either as a reward of merit: he felt himself utterly unworthy of such a splendid bounty. His wealth humbled him. The great God of heaven had condescended to honor a worthless creature with a bounty such as he bestows only upon a very dear friend.

We have brought into our barns and cellars the harvest of this year. God has again blessed the labor of our hands. Shall we now say, It is owing to our ingenuity, our improved methods of agriculture, our incessant toil that we have obtained such an abundance of good things? Only the shallowest conceit can ascribe to human cunning what is due to divine generosity. The rain that moistened the furrows on thousands of acres has descended on the land of many an unjust husbandman, and the sun in which the grain ripened shone on the fields of many an evil man. Surely, these cannot claim any personal merit in their harvests. But even the just and good husbandmen will not claim such merit; yea, these will be most outspoken in disclaiming any merit. They will give all glory to the true Master of the harvest, who put the germinating power into plants and provided the moisture and tempered the atmosphere in which they grew to maturity. Now that the Creator has again thrown his generous bounty into our lap, let us reverently bow before the Giver of these gifts, and, with Peter, profess ourselves unworthy of so much love and kindness.

Nations Turning to God

WEDNESDAY, November 27. Isa. 55:5. "Nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee because of the Lord thy God, and for the Holy One of Israel; for he hath glorified thee." Songs of redemption are more melodious than anthems of creation, therefore the music of this Thanksgiving time should reach the loftiest concert pitch. The night of war is passing, the day of liberty is dawning. The crucifixion of suffering will be followed by the resurrection victory. O morning land of triumph! Flowers of peace and righteousness blossoming out of the blackness of death! The red blood of heroes making rich the harvest of fruitage for all future time!

Redemption from rum, emancipation of the soul from its awful slavery, is a plant that has been growing through the millenniums and is now bursting into bloom. Benevolence, the white blossom of beauty, is everywhere seen on battlefields and among suffering peoples. Woman, long in the bondage of bigotry, prejudice and tyranny, is today standing alongside her brothers as their equal in rights, in mind, skill and strength, to do and to dare in the battle of life. The cause of world-wide missionary evangelism has awakened out of sleep, marshaling her forces for the redemption of the race.

Educational institutions are feeling the thrill of this onward movement. What are these wounds in the hands of Christian men? Those which will be for the redemption of liberty and the spread of Christ's kingdom. When the terrible devastation of war is past, "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree, for ye shall be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands for joy." Thus the Almighty will make the wrath of man to praise him, and the immortal spirits of those whose cold faces and precious bodies are in the furrows of the trenches in nameless graves will cry out for the joy of this victory: "We endured the cross and despised the shame, that the glory of eternal triumph might be ours and the world's." E. W. C.

God's World

THURSDAY, November 28. Ps. 24:1. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein." This is God's world. His title to it, his proprietorship, is based upon his creation of it. Moreover, that title holds good forever by virtue of his presence in the world to preserve and uphold it. Upon God's ownership of us he bases all his claims upon us for service and surrender. Did I give my money to the Red Cross, the Y.M.C.A., the hospital, the church, last Sunday? No; it was God's money I gave. So the most liberal giver is simply God's almoner. And the least liberal giver is simply guilty of "conversion." This legal term "conversion" has an evil meaning. It is the use for one's self of funds belonging to another. If my banker uses my money to speculate with; if he uses his depositors' money to buy houses and lands and motor cars and yachts for himself, he is guilty of "conversion." And we are chargeable with a like offense if we treat as ours what is God's, if we withhold from him the practical acknowledgment of his right and title to us and ours.

In the light of this truth, who then is rich? Surely not those whose rule it is to get and keep. No matter how much we get, our only true wealth is in giving. The earth is rich when it is fruitful. The sun is rich in that it always gives to the world. God is the great Giver of every good and perfect gift. God himself were infinitely poor if he were not forever imparting gifts to men. "Kings," said a dying monarch, "are chiefly fortunate in this, that they have the power to confer gifts." C. C. A.

Reading of the Bible

FRIDAY, November 29. John 5:39. "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." Here is a command of our Lord, with his reason for the same attached to it. For any one to heed the command but disregard the reason for the command is certainly an unwise action. Bible-reading performed as a work of merit for which a reward is expected becomes unprofitable. The Bible is a book with a purpose such as no other book can serve. It is God's great and final witness for Jesus Christ, the sinner's guide to heaven. Detach this book from its purpose and you virtually change the character of the book, and your Bible-reading is no longer an act of obedience to God but a self-willed act. In that case Bible-reading may still prove an interesting and, in a measure, even a useful occupation. The facts of history recounted in the Bible, the panorama of nations and countries rising to great power and falling into decay, the references to curious customs prevailing in ancient times, to the myriad creatures in the great universe, the celestial bodies, the flowers in the field, the beasts in the forest—all these things are interesting, even fascinating. Still more valuable are the moral lessons conveyed by the Bible, both by precept and example. Man's proper conduct in good and evil times, his relations to his fellow men in home, church and state, are copiously set forth in this book, and tend toward increasing human happiness in this world. But the knowledge which the Bible-reader obtains regarding these matters is a mere by-product of his study of this book. Only when he has from this book learned to know who Jesus is, why he came from heaven and became man, why he lived a holy life and died an innocent death, why he taught men to heed his teaching and abide in his word—in a word, only when the Bible-reader accepts Jesus as the way to the Father, the truth and the life, he has read his Bible aright, and obtains the divinely intended profit of his Bible study. Being in Christ

SATURDAY, November 30. II Cor. 12:2. "I knew a man in Christ." Do you know yourself to be in Christ? What a blessed union and fellowship is yours! Have you ever had a special visit with your Lord when his loving Spirit swept through your being with inexpressible delight? Then you have had blessed assurance that "Jesus is mine"; perfect peace and heavenly communion. Like the great apostle, you could hardly tell whether you were in the body or out of the body, but you did know that you were dwelling in a paradise richer than Eden.

After such a consciousness, one is not troubled with doubts and fears about his divinity, ability or willingness to do all he has promised for his believing children. All uncertainties, like fogs, are swept away by the brightness of his shining. One seems to dwell in an atmosphere of eternity. In him we live and move and have our spiritual being, with fresh views every evening and new every morning. To live in Christ, to die is gain.

The brother of the sisters at Bethany was caught up for four days into Paradise, like Paul, but the word of Jesus called him back to the embrace of friends and loved ones. His mouth was sealed, like the apostle's. He had heard words impossible to put into human speech. He knew the heavenly secret of life after death, of ineffable fellowships with Christ and the redeemed. We must be in the Spirit if, like John on Patmos, we are to enjoy such a vision of our Lord, and ever afterward walk as seeing him who is invisible while treading the soil of time. Would you like to have a look through one of the windows of eternity? You may have it by faith in him. The eye of the soul is surer than physical sight; the certitude of seeing by faith is richer and sweeter and more abiding than any of the feelings of sense. It is living the forever life here; it is seeing beckoning hands and listening to calling voices; it is having your affections set on things above, where Christ is and the holy of the ages dwell. E. SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

THE town of Bradford was decked with flags and bunting in honor of the homecoming of Ambulance Company 241, in which Richard Ward had served at the steering-wheel of the ambulance, losing his right hand at Château-Thierry. After the celebration Richard and his father, Rev. Dr. Ward, sat in the latter's study and talked about Dick's future, a problem which was complicated by the loss of his hand and his engagement to Requa Randall, to whom he also looked for advice in this matter. Dr. Ward's sermon on the first Sunday after the return of the soldiers decided Dick to become a foreign missionary. Chaplain Hunter, who had been submerged in the Mediterranean, unexpectedly turned up.

CHAPTER FOUR

WHILE Dick sat in his room debating the chances of his choice coming in conflict with his love of the dearest girl in the world, Dr. Ward was having another experience at the close of this notable day.

His daughter Esther had come in with her mother. Mrs. Ward and her daughter had been in the library during the conference in the study. And Esther had lingered on the porch with Bert Chandler after the rest of the young men had gone.

Dr. Ward saw at once that there was something of great moment between mother and daughter. But the war had filled all of life so full of the exciting and the unexpected that any event had to be very extraordinary to arouse a thrill in either heart or head.

"It's the last thing in the world I ever expected," the mother was saying as she came into the room.

"I never dreamed of it," the girl was answering. The color on her cheeks was vivid and her eyes glowed with great animation.

"Esther tells me Bert is determined to go," Mrs. Ward said as she looked from daughter to husband.

"So far it seems to me he has been rather determined to stay," the doctor whimsically remarked as he looked at the clock.

"Father!" Esther exclaimed as she laughed at his banter. "You must know what mother means."

"Yes. It's what you have been going over here tonight," Mrs. Ward spoke before the doctor could reply to Esther. "After all we had planned, don't you see, we are going to lose both of our children? And we had so made up our minds that after all this dreadful separation and uncertainty and loss"—Mrs. Ward's look rested on Albert's picture on his father's desk—"it did seem as if we might have been allowed to have to comfort us those who were spared to us. But I will not complain, John, only my spirit is like the mother's in Padriac Pearse's lament. You remember, John, the mother who lost her two sons at the Battle of the Marne, the second battle:

"I do not grudge them; Lord, I do not grudge My two strong sons that I have seen go out To break their strength and die, they and a few,

In bloody protest for a glorious thing. They shall be spoken of among their people, The generations shall remember them, And call them blessed;

But I will speak their names to my own heart In the long nights; The little names that were familiar once Round my dead hearth.

Lord, thou art hard on mothers: We suffer in their coming and their going; And though I grudge them not, I weary, weary

Of the long sorrow—and yet I have my joy: My sons were faithful, and they fought."

"But he, the good God, spared one of ours," said John Ward, gently, after a moment of silence.

"Only to take the other away!" Mrs.

Ward burst out, suddenly breaking down, to the doctor's real consternation. For she had not done that, even at the news of Albert's death. "And Esther, too, if she goes with Bert! 'Lord, thou art hard on mothers!'"

ESTHER tried to comfort her, while Dr. Ward sat dumb. "It will take Bert two or three years to get ready to go anywhere. You will have us all that time, anyway."

"I had forgotten that!" Mrs. Ward suddenly sat up and smiled. "Of course it will. I kept thinking you were going right off."

"By the new plan outlined by the seminaries young men like Bert can get ready to go out in one year," said the doctor. "We have all that to go over in making our plans. But there is going to be a lot of adventure about the whole thing. Do you know, Dick is wondering what Requa's father will say." Both Mrs. Ward and Esther exclaimed, and Esther said decidedly,

"Requa will never go against her father's wishes. I know her too well."

"Dick is afraid of Randall! Think of that, Sarah! A boy who wears the Croix de Guerre! Afraid of his future wife's father!"

"That girl," said Esther with determination, "has been one of the last to find out and feel the influence of the war on the women of the world. I love Requa, and she is a splendid girl, and she loves Dick and worships him, but she is afraid of her father, and you know, daddy, why?"

Esther did not finish her sentence, and Dr. Ward did not, either, but all three seemed aware of a chill in the room, which was dispelled when Dr. Ward said, "Do you know what time it is, folks?"

"One o'clock!" Mrs. Ward said, as she rose.

"But yesterday was a great day. What it will mean to those young men no one can ever tell."

"Or to the young women, either, father."

"How! What's that?" Dr. Ward turned to his daughter, the surprises of the day not yet over.

"You know the girls in my class. They were greatly stirred by your sermon, daddy. They want to do something. And there's Alberta. Since Albert's going out she must do something to fill life's eup for her. There are at least six of my girls, I believe, who want to get into some kind of service for all the world. Small things do not interest them any more. Only the biggest can appeal to them now."

"Do you mean to say that six of those high school girls in your class will actually consider the commission to go into all the world to make disciples?"

"Father," Esther said, coming up to him and putting her hand on his head, "it is too late to tell all about it tonight. The girls would have been in to see you about it if the boys hadn't come. It's a great story they will have to tell you if they talk to you as they have to me. I don't believe even you really understand what the war has done for girls and women."

"I don't, except when I look at you. You're not the same girl you were when the war broke out."

"I hope not, daddy! But you're tired after such a day. We'll go over it all in the morning."

NEXT morning at the breakfast table the Ward family did what they always did, following the habit the children had known for years, in fact, ever since they were born.

They discussed at the table the things they had been talking over when they parted at night. And there were few secrets in the Ward family. What concerned one of them concerned all. Even Esther's and Dick's love chapter in life was freely read by them to the father and mother, and on this occasion it played so vital a part in the future plans of all of them that it could not possibly be avoided even if any one had wished.

"Bert is the last fellow in the world I should have thought of as a missionary," said Dick, following some remark his sister had made about his own choice. "He isn't any more cut out for it than I am, but he told me yesterday he believed he had never felt more certain about anything since he volunteered in 241."

"Bert has plenty of qualifications for missionary service," said Esther with her usual determined air. "He likes people of all sorts, he is not afraid of any kind of circumstance, he learns languages easily, he can adapt himself to any sort of climate, he has perfect health, he is very persuasive—"

"Ha! ha! Exactly what Requa said of my qualifications as a foreign missionary. When we come to make our applications for missionary service all Bert and I will have to do will be to refer the secretaries or the board to our respective brides, who know all about us."

"And you would not be far out of the way, sir. I don't believe you realize, Dick, while you've been gone, how fast and far women have gone in learning to make quick judgment and to measure up to large opportunities. That's one reason you boys will have to do some pretty good thinking and hard work if you keep up with us, or fill the places you left when you went away."

DICK answered soberly, admiring his sister's determination and her general air of wideawakeness.

"Bert and I haven't begun to catch on yet to the new things into which we have come back, if that is good American language. Why, I didn't even know that the saloons were gone from Bradford until I went down on the street Saturday on the way to Requa's. It doesn't seem possible, dad. How you used to pray for that day! But I never believed it would ever happen."

"We haven't a saloon or a brewery in the whole state," said Dick's father calmly.

"What?"

"Not a saloon in the whole state," Dr. Ward repeated. "While you have been fighting 'over there,' we have been fighting 'over here.'"

Dick had risen in his excitement. As he sat down he said, "I don't see what there is left for you to preach about, dad, if the saloons are gone."

"There are a number of things left."

"And we have woman's suffrage since you went away, Dick," his mother added.

Dick began to look bewildered, and Esther chimed in: "There's hardly a man left in the flour mill or the furniture shops, and I suppose you noticed Alberta is in McAlpin's old place at the ticket office down at the depot."

Dick looked from Esther to his mother and then to his father, and after a moment of astonished silence he broke into a laugh, but it was a laugh which had questions in it.

"We got very little news on the fighting line. We were making European history, and didn't have time to note what was going on at home. On the way home what do you folks think was the main topic of our talk and interest?"

Father and mother and sister looked their keen interest and Dick provokingly said, "Some time I'll tell you, but it wasn't prohibition or woman suffrage, or government ownership of railroads, telegraph and telephone service. I expect to be surprised every day at something new in America, but somehow it doesn't excite me much until I find out about Requa—and her father."

"But you and Bert will never understand the greater part of the new or of things in America, Dick, if you don't know and understand something of part that the women of America played during the war. I suppose you heard of the Red Cross over there?"

DICK rose from his place at the table and gravely saluted. "That's the Red Cross! If there was one thing we did know, it was that. Yes, the Y. M. C. A. Some day I'll begin to tell you folks what it all means to me."

"But," Esther persisted, "don't you know what the women of America did in the Red Cross? We're not jealous of the Y. M. C. A., but I don't believe even the people here at home begin to know what the Red Cross owes to the women of America. Daddy, you know I was appointed statistical secretary for our division to get the exact figures for the second year of the war. And here is what I found out. In one year of the war the women of America planted 800,000 war gardens, out of which were raised $350,000,000 worth of crops; 460,000,000 quarts of food were preserved from these gardens in eight months, and 1,000,000 loaves of bread saved each day. In addition to that, 8,000,000 women worked in 50,000 Red Cross workrooms. In six weeks they delivered 3,681,895 surgical dressings, 1,517,076 pieces of hospital linen, 424,550 hospital garments, 240,400 knitted articles, and 301,563 miscellaneous supplies. During the entire year 13,000,000 articles were sent abroad, 3,000,000 surgical dressings went every month to France, and $36,000,000 worth of garments for our own boys.

"Wait! I never knew you had such a memory!" cried Dick in genuine astonishment.

"She never used to have any, Dick," Dr. Ward exclaimed. "She has no memory where there wasn't any."

DICK looked with undisguised admiration at his sister.

"If the war has done as much for all the women as it has done for you, sir, it surely is a new world we have come back into. But I don't believe they're all like you. You don't mean to say, do you, that those figures represent official and United States facts?"

The breakfast was getting cold. The Ward family had paused in the act of eating to digest Esther's figures. He had pushed back her chair from the table and was sitting there with a look of meditation. If any one except her brother had asked such a question he would have been indignant. But he smiled as she said:

"Your ignorance of the world you have come back into is excusable. You and Bert and all the boys are going to be astonished a good many times. It's a new America and a new world. And I do feel for the first time that I've some real place in it. Just think, I'm one of 766,202 professional women in this country! Yes, daddy, I'm going to practice on you folks, now I have got to going, with my report as secretary. In the fine arts there are 20,393 women listed in the Woman's Who's Who; 55 clergy, 490,250 teachers, 1,787 lawyers, 7,502 authors and editors; 144,451 practicing medicine, 84,478 are teaching music, and 3,250 are in scientific pursuits as architects, chemists, and civil and electrical engineers.

"Did you know that one little French woman was at the head of the hospital at Verdun for seven months? You must have heard of it. For six weeks she worked there without taking her clothes off. And now she's médecin-en-chef of the Hospital Militaire in Paris. Ten hospitals in Europe are staffed entirely by women. Seven great London hospitals have women resident physicians in charge. Endel Street Hospital, the greatest London women's hospital, was staffed entirely by women. And did you know our Red Cross has been asked by France and Serbia for hospitals staffed by women? Didn't the boys find out that the place was when they were wounded was the Women's Hospital in Paris?"

Dick did not answer as Esther paused in her tumultuous statistics. The mere figures seemed to be of little interest to him by the side of one sentence.

"Who was that doctor at Verdun? What did you say was her name?"

"Why, it was Dr. Nicole Gerard Magin. When she sent in her application for an appointment as acting surgeon she left off her first name and the War Office supposed it was a man. When she appeared with her surgeon's coat the Vosges front with a government commission the médecin-en-chef at that point threw up his hands in disgust at sight of this little woman. And there were 1,000 wounded soldiers at that point and only five doctors. They had to let her get to work. And she assisted in four days at 600 operations and never lost a case! Surely you must have heard of her!"

"I heard of her? Of Dr. Nicole Gerard Magin! Why, she is the doctor that amputated my arm and saved my holder!"

His excitement Dick had risen so much that he knocked a cup and a saucer off the table.

"One paid any attention to it. Dick was waving his left arm enthusiastically. The nurse was staring hard, while her eyes teared.

"How splendid! But you never tell us about it! How should I like to see her perform an operation like that?"

"Do you mean on me?" Dick asked, as he sat down.

"But how is it you did not write us about it?" Mrs. Ward asked.

Dick looked ashamed. "You know, mother, what a careless correspondent I am, and I kept saying I would tell you when I came home. And there was Requa to write to, and as soon as I was able to leave Paris and join the company, the thing was all over and I was on board. But Dr. Nicole! You must tell me anything about her! Why, the boys saw her oftener than I saw Pershing or Foch. And I have carried her skill with me as long as I live."

It was all so wonderful that a silence followed, broken finally by Dick, who, stooped over to pick up the broken cup and saucer, said,

"I might as well get right over and see Mr. Randall this morning."

Mrs. Ward looked at Mrs. Ward as if expecting an answer to some question they had been debating before the breakfast table. He seemed to read his answer in her returning look, and with a good deal of reluctance he said, as Dick put the pieces of broken crockery on the table:

"Dick, we feel, your mother and I, think you ought to know a somewhat disagreeable fact before you go to see Mr. Randall. You haven't been home long enough to learn about things, and they help you in your interview with him to know the facts from us rather than have them come to you by way of the boys who are—less friendly."

Dick sat down again, looking intently at father and mother and, as if, all of whom returned his look with equal gravity.

"The plain fact is," Dr. Ward continued with characteristic family bluntness, "that Mr. Randall is a profiteer, and has made a large part of his recent fortune by evading the government regulations. He has not yet done anything illegal to the extent of putting himself in the reach of the law, but a few weeks ago he was under suspicion of such shrewd practice in the manipulation of warehouse securities that he fell under government indictment and arrest. Have you heard anything about us?"

"No!" Dick's one word was like a hand grenade. His face was white and he clutched the tablecloth with a grip that made his mother, sitting opposite, apprehensive that he might drag all the dishes off the board.

"Why, he is a traitor!" Dick exploded.

Dr. Ward said gently, "Bradford will give him the benefit of every doubt. Randall has lived here all his life. He has built up the shops and always been fair in his dealings with the men and generous in public ways with his money. He built the new hospital here the first year of the war. The people will be slow to accuse him, and yet I am obliged to believe he has been caught up in the great temptation which has caught so many of our business men in the unprecedented opportunities which war conditions have afforded to pile up enormous gains in a short time."

BUT Dick did not appear to listen. His face was white and stern.

"I wish I didn't have to know this. It doesn't seem possible that Requa's father is a traitor! Yes, he is, dad, a traitor."

Dick spoke hotly, answering a silent protest he saw in his father's gesture.

"Why, in England they would shoot men for things like that! Even if he is not legally and technically guilty of profiteering, if he has taken advantage of the war to make a fortune or take advantage of the public, he is a traitor. He is not a true American."

Dr. Ward had never seen Dick angry before. He was not simply angry in any superficial or temporary feeling, but thoroughly stirred by his father's statement about Randall. It seemed to him like a monstrous thing that while the young men were risking their lives and all they held dear in the name of a real patriotism, the older men, safe at home, should see in the awful tragedy of the world only a good chance to make big money. It did not make any difference if a great number of men, some of them high in the business world, did the same; they were all guilty of treason and deserved the punishment of traitors.

"I thought you ought to know the worst from us before you went to see him about Requa," his father was saying gently. "It may be he can justify some of his business moves. I am not judging him. But he is, as I have told you, under government suspicion right now. It will not make it any easier for you to see him."

Dick had already started to go out.

"Dad, I'm not afraid of him any more. I can't be afraid of any man for whom I have no respect."

"But he is Requa's father, Dick. You cannot forget that," his mother said anxiously.

"I shall not forget that, either, mother," said Dick softly, but his face was still pale and his look stern.

"Be careful, son," Dr. Ward spoke calmly. "Remember what you are going to see him about. You are not his judge and executioner. The state will take care of that. Whatever rights you have are vested in Requa, who has pledged you faithfully to be your wife and share in your future. You are both old enough to make your own choices. But Randall is not all bad. He might—"

Dick cast one look around at the three still seated at the table and went slowly out. They heard him go upstairs to his room, and after a few minutes he came down, seemed to hesitate in the hall, but finally opened the door and went out. Esther went to the window to wave a hand at him, as she used to do before Dick went away. She was greatly disturbed because he did not turn to wave his hand at her in reply. He went up the street without turning his head and crossed over to go up to Requa's.

Esther was crying as she came back to the table.

"I never saw Dick so upset. Do you think, father, it was wise to tell him about Mr. Randall?"

"Yes. He would have to know it soon, anyway, and perhaps from some of Randall's political enemies. But it is hard for Dick to face all this right now."

Why Teeth Lose Their Glitter

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You Leave the Film

Why do well-brushed teeth discolor and decay? Why does tartar form? Why does pyorrhea start? Millions of people are asking those questions, and the answer is this:

A slimy film constantly forms on your teeth. It clings to the teeth. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays, and your brushing doesn't remove it. And most tooth troubles are due to that film.

That film is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food which ferments, and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea, and many internal troubles are due to them.

These facts have been known for years. But dental science found no way to effectively combat the film. A vigorous dental cleaning from time to time was needed to remove it.

Now a way has been found to combat it. That way is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. You can prove it, as thousands have, by a simple test. This is to urge that you do it.

See the Difference

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object is to dissolve the film, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

Ordinary pepsin will not serve. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid, harmful to the teeth.

But science has now found a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method, employed in Pepsodent, makes teeth-cleaning vastly more effective.

Able authorities have made clinical tests of Pepsodent. In thousands of cases they have watched its efficiency. Now we are urging all people to prove it in their homes. It means results you do not get without it, and they are all-important.

Send the coupon with 10 cents for a special tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean your teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

That film is your teeth's chief enemy. This test will show you that you can combat it. Then you will always clean your teeth, we think, in this scientific way. Cut out the coupon now.

Return your empty tooth paste tubes to the nearest Red Cross Station.

Thank God for Belgium!

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

FOR over four years," said the Rev. Pierre Blommaert, "they have fought like frogs—my countrymen. They've done battle with water and mud to their very socks. They have suffered unspeakably. But for four years they have—how you say it? 'held on!'" Then he smiled.

We were sitting on one of the sunny terraces of the Federation of the Churches of Christ, the Rev. Pierre Blommaert, D. D. He is the Protestant Chaplain-in-chief of the Belgian army, and he is in New York on a special mission of friendship from his country to ours. It is a far cry from Belgium to New York, but as I looked at the chaplain in his solemn, immaculate uniform with its ostentatious silver crosses—as I looked at the scholarly face of him with its seriously intent eyes, the spirit of Belgium, that spirit which has come a world-girdle, seemed very near indeed.

A few minutes before, all over the world, the ringing of bells and the harsh hiss of whistles proclaimed the surrender of Austria—the beginning of the end of a world war. The date was November 4, 1918. And it seemed dramatically right that they should have sounded while I was writing the story of the brave little nation that had helped so much to make that end possible—the nation that had been the first to resist when Germany tore into shreds a certain scrap of paper and crossed a certain frontier. . . .

"And you," I questioned rather shyly, "you have been with them from the first?"

Rev. Pierre Blommaert answered me. "Belgium," he said, "was mobilized August, 1914. I went to the front, then, with the army. I went as a Red Cross man. It was not until February, 1915, that I became a chaplain. Yes, I was with them—from the first!"

From the first—the first terrible days that are history now! I looked half reverently into the face of the man who had come with his friendly message to our land. And as I looked I smiled.

It was as if sunlight flickered for a moment across a stern granite wall. The Rev. Pierre Blommaert smiled, answering smile that began in his eyes and crept across the care-worn lines of his face, and softened the sternness of his mouth.

"Yes," he repeated, "I began as a Red Cross man. It was not until months had gone by that I could convince our government that we had need of Protestant chaplains. Belgium, you know, is a nearly Catholic country. And yet there were a great many Protestant soldiers who were being killed and who were receiving Catholic burial. It was of them that I thought. And so I was made the first Protestant chaplain in February, 1915. There are

Rev. Pierre Blommaert

THAT August seemed so very far away. Across the crimson of the blood-stained years. So shrouded in a veil of bitter tears, That we can scarcely touch the hands, today Of that brave group of soldiers who, because They dared to battle bravely for the right, Have held aloft the torch of freedom's light. And kept inviolate the very laws That hold the world together. Oh, they seem Almost unreal, a wonder-story told Beside a friendly fire that flickers gold— They seem the fabric of a hero's dream!

A little band of soldiers, starved and chilled, And beaten by a force we cannot guess, Heart-broken in a trackless wilderness They held the line—a line that nothing killed! That August . . . Ah, it seems so far away! But then it was that Belgium proved her worth. The line she held has bound the bleeding earth. Thank God for Belgium this Thanksgiving Day!

you should ask a Belgian soldier about it! All of Belgium was in that battle. They held the line, fighting like demons, and were slaughtered. And then, when the Germans kept advancing in increasing numbers and they knew that to hold against such odds would be impossible, they broke the dikes that have always guarded their land. And as the water came pouring in they fought on. Many of the Germans were drowned, but the Belgians, with their trenches submerged, were doing battle as—yes, I have said it before—as frogs! It was a great victory," his voice rang, "for the world!"

WE were silent for a moment and then the Rev. Pierre Blommaert spoke again. "I suppose that your Christian Herald will want to know," he questioned, "whether the soldiers of our army are religious; how they go into the battle? And I would have you tell your paper that our soldiers are religious, in the very highest sense. For they are fighting, and have been fighting, since 1914, for an ideal! They have gone, half-clothed, into trenches filled with water for an ideal; and they have stayed in those trenches for that same ideal. They have grumbled, perhaps; but they have been cold—they have had no guns, no ammunition, very often no food! Who, in a like case, wouldn't grumble? They have resented their lot, perhaps, and they have said so—but nobody has ever seen them flinch! They don't go into the fight, maybe, with a prayer, but they'll stay in that fight—and hell itself couldn't stop them! They are a brave people—and, if bravery is religion, a religious people!"

"They've never," I questioned, "been discouraged—the Belgian soldiers? Or afraid? Or doubtful of the outcome of the war? They've never—" more of us now—a number with me in my Paris office, seven at the front with the army, and five in the rear with the hospitals. We feel that we,"—he smiled again—"have made progress."

"Somehow," I said almost irrelevantly, "although we have heard a great deal about the suffering and the privations of the Belgian women and children, we have heard little of the Belgian soldiers. I wonder—"

"It is," interrupted the Rev. Pierre Blommaert, "because the Belgian army has been at a standstill that you have heard nothing about them. During the four years of the war they have held a line—and they have done nothing else. If they had advanced you would have known it; if they had retreated you would have heard news of them. But because they held fast, only,"—he laughed rather mirthlessly—"you have not heard!"

"The battle of the Yser—it has been called a French victory, has it not? But

SAFEGE

1. Take a look at this cross section of the GENCO Safege Blade. Note the broad back, the concave grind, and the bevel above the edge. Any expert on cutting-steel will tell you this is the proper shape for the ideal shaving edge.
2. You can renew this razor's edge by stropping it on the palm of your hand.

3. See that guard? This razor has a standard blade such as barbers use but that guard protects your face while shaving. It also shields that keen, enduring cutting-edge so that nothing can reach and turn it. You can drop this razor and not nick its blade.
4. Simply by flipping back that guard, you can cleanse this razor without running water.

This Razor Saves Razor-quality Steel and Money

The GENCO Safege has one blade for a lifetime. It has the concave grind and bevelled edge that all professionals use. It is equipped with a simple, removable guard. The result is a professional razor you can use anywhere with absolute safety.

The GENCO Safege has the advantage of both types of razors and the faults of neither. No complements of new blades are required. Saves steel for the government and money for you. The edge is the famous GENCO professional razor edge, which is firm and sure and endures.

This is the razor that you can shave with, wipe the lather from, and afterward cleanse thoroughly without running water. This is the razor that you can use with the completest safety anywhere—on a rocking train, aboard a lurching ship, in trench or dug-out under fire, anywhere.

Its first-cost is low. It has no upkeep costs. And it's an instrument enabling you to shave yourself with the speed and smoothness of a barber.

Whatever your shaving preferences—standard blade or safety—there is a GENCO type of razor with the famous GENCO edge that you can shave with for a lifetime. We guarantee that edge. "GENCO Razors must make good or we will."

For the second time the Rev. Pierre Blommaert interrupted me.

"Discouraged?" he echoed. "Afraid? Doubtful? Why?"—his strong hand pounded on the table—"the Belgian soldier does not understand discouragement, or fear, or doubt! If he loses an inch of ground he will go to his death in the regaining of it; and if he hears cannon in the distance it is never, to him, the bombardment of defeat. It is always the guns of the victory! Fear! . . .

"You have heard, perhaps, of our newspaper, The Free Belgium? That newspaper, I think, illustrates the attitude of my nation. In the heart of a German-built government it has flourished, laughing at the Prussian officers, ridiculing the martial rule, poking fun at the governor himself. How they have tried, those German officials, to stamp out that little newspaper! Many editors have been killed because of it, but never has its publisher been located. It is a fine paper—" And the Rev. Pierre Blommaert smiled reminiscently.

It was growing late, but I had one more question to ask. "Your king," I questioned, "King Albert?"

Have you any message from him—the people of America?"

The Rev. Pierre Blommaert seemed to grow suddenly more erect, more soldierly. It was as if, deep in his soul, he was coming to salute.

"I saw King Albert just a short time ago," he told me. "It was on the battle-field. He is a great king, king—and everybody loves him! I saw him on the battle-field and he asked to convey his thanks to America for all that they have given to us. It is not only food that he meant, but clothing. No, it was not only that. He asked me to thank America for those greater gifts: the gifts of courage and inspiration, and morale!"

"America and Belgium have always been the best of friends. They have always loved one another. They have been like a young couple that is—do you say it?—betrothed. But her trouble Belgium has reached a hand that America has clasped, and now Belgium and America are clasped together. It is as if the young couple who were betrothed had been married and had met together the sorrows of trials that make two hearts as one.

"Our king would have me express that thought to your countrymen!"

Making Better Citizens for Tomorrow

FROM the windows of his place of business several years ago a man out in Denver watched the small boys who passed. He wondered about their home influences, and what were their personal ambitions and aims in life. Because this man, Mr. George W. Olinger, one of Denver's most successful men, was actively connected with Sunday school work in that city his opportunities for studying the boy and his problems were greatly increased. One day a small group of nine- and ten-year-old youngsters was gotten together. Mr. Olinger's own youth had been lacking in many things necessary to the moral and spiritual support of a growing boy. Out of this memory was born what is now doubtless the most valuable local organization for young boys in America.

From the little group of a dozen youngsters who formed the beginning of Denver's important boy organization, known as Olinger's Highlanders, the group has been duplicated many, many times over, from every race, from every creed, and from every station and section of the city. They were known in the beginning as the Highlanders because the first group was drawn from North Denver, the section known as the Highlands. The name has stuck.

THE Olinger Highlanders is an organization especially for boys between the ages of nine and twelve, and aims to solve the problems of boy life, with a purpose of fitting them to meet the future demands, moral, spiritual, and physical. One of the first requirements is that the boy must be a member of some Sunday school. The organization does not concern itself as to a boy's denomination, or the religious beliefs of his parents, but it is deeply interested in knowing that he takes his place in the ranks of Christian service and establishes a Christian character upon which to build his future life. The present membership in the Highlanders represents practically every Sunday school in Denver.

When a boy is taken into the organization he is asked to sign this pledge:

I will be a better boy.
I will be truthful.
I will obey my parents.
I will be a gentleman.
I will be courteous to all.
I will learn how to earn.
I will study how to save.
I will be in church or Sunday school every Sunday.
I will be unselfish and share with others.
I will do all things that I am asked to do promptly and in a cheerful manner.
I will try to start something and finish something every day.
All of these things will make me a better son and eventually a better citizen and business man.

THE organization has divided the city into fifteen sections with several leaders for each. Every ten boys form a club of their own with their own leaders, but there is one general headquarters to which the boys are required to report at regular times. This headquarters is also the armory. The military feature is in the eyes of the boys one of the main attractions, but in reality this is merely a bait to catch the boy.

Besides the military leaders the organization has a social secretary and a Christian service secretary, both of whom give all their time to the welfare of the boys. In card indexes are charted the home environments of every boy, and he is helped to overcome any existing weakness due to home influences. The organization insists on the cooperation of the parents, because the only way to teach our boys to travel the right road is to follow that road themselves. Each month five mothers are appointed to visit all boys who are reported ill. Each month an advisory board composed of twelve fathers meets to straighten out tangled affairs of silly boys. The boys are made responsible for their fathers, and the boy who insists on having family prayers and a blessing said over his food is making a better man of his father. And a better father means a better son.

WHILE the developing of the Christian side of the boy's nature occupied a very vital interest in the scheme of the organization, they are also developing the business instinct. Several hundred small peanut and popcorn merchants sell their wares out of school hours around Denver. All of these were financed in the beginning, and directed by the leaders of the Highlanders. The organization has opened bank accounts for a number of the boys, accounts that are monthly growing. By having the boys visit large industrial plants and hear lectures from successful business men, they are learning the fundamentals that make for success.

But the Highlanders are also taught the meaning of service. Through their own efforts they raised the money to send a fully equipped ambulance to France. The boys saved the Red Cross many hundreds of dollars a year by personally delivering packages and letters instead of mailing them. The Highlanders stand ready to offer their services to their city or their country at any hour.

Ask the parents of any Highlander if they have not a better boy in their homes. Ask the teacher of any school if the Highlanders are not their best pupils. They are tiny seeds that are being sown now, but the harvest will be widespread.

Uncle Sam Wants 3,000,000 Little School Gardeners

THE United States School Garden Army was organized in March of 1918. President Wilson set aside $50,000 from his National Security and Defense Appropriation to promote the work for the first six months. He has since appropriated $200,000 more to carry the work through another six months.

Two main purposes prompted the planning of the United States School Garden Army: (a) Increased food production and (b) training of school children in thrift, industry, service, patriotism, and responsibility. The necessity for man power was being felt. This was especially true in agricultural pursuits. Not alone were the drafted young men going from the farm, but great numbers of farm employees were being attracted to the cities by higher wages offered in other industries. If the millions of city boys and girls could be induced to give their leisure time in cultivating the thousands of acres of untilled land in front and back yards and vacant lots of our cities, towns and villages, it would result in a substantial increase in food production and an improvement in the quality of our coming citizenship. The Bureau of Education undertook to accomplish this through the organization of the United States School Garden Army. It is an educational problem and can be solved with economy and efficiency only by the schools.

The plan of organization involves: (a) A general director who is responsible for organization, propaganda, and administration; (b) regional directors who are charged with the responsibility of writing instructions upon gardening that will enable supervisors and teachers to take a garden company successfully through a season, even though not expert gardeners. These instructions have been put out in leaflet form and sent from the central offices to all who applied for them. (c) Assistant regional directors who work under the regional director and whose duties are similar to those of the regional director excepting that of writing garden leaflets. (d) Cooperation with State Council of Defense through a state representative appointed by them. (e) The army plan of organizing school boys and girls into companies of 150 or less under the direction of a garden teacher, a captain, first lieutenant and second lieutenant. (f) An insignia for each enlisted soldier. A double bronze bar for the captain, single bronze bar with two stars in the border for the first lieutenant, one star for the second lieutenant, and a combination bronze and black enameled bar for privates.

What has been accomplished:

1. One million five hundred thousand boys and girls have responded to the call of the President and enlisted in the United States School Garden Army.
2. Twenty thousand acres of unproductive home and vacant lots have been converted into productive land. This will release an equal acreage now used in truck gardening for the production of other foodstuffs more important for war purposes. It will also relieve transportation congestion through home consumption of home-produced foodstuffs.
3. Fifty thousand teachers have received valuable instruction in gardening through the garden leaflets written by experts in this office and distributed from here.
4. Boards of Education and other civic organizations have been influenced to give financial and moral support to the school and home garden movement and to pay extra salaries for supervision and teaching.
5. Hundreds of thousands of parents have become interested in the garden movement and are working with their children in home gardens. In Salt Lake City alone 5200 mothers, representing sixty-two parental associations, are actively supporting food production in the schools.
6. Thousands of civic, commercial and patriotic organizations have become interested in the movement and are giving it hearty support.
7. One and one-half million children have been given something to do this summer; something that will help carry the burden of their country in this struggle for freedom; something that will help them to build character, and something that will appeal to and develop their patriotism.
8. Home and vacant lot gardening in cities, towns and villages has been dignified and made popular to a degree that practically insures it a prominent place in the school system of our country. It would be difficult to estimate the educational and material value of such results.

Among the Workers

THE Christian Herald Family includes many upon whom the years have fallen like a benediction, and whose last days are their happiest. Among this goodly company are two old friends, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Branch of Brooklyn, N. Y. They have been friends of only in a business way as subscribers of the Christian Herald, but also in a personal way as friends of Dr. Talmage when he was pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, and of Dr. Klopsch when he was owner of the Christian Herald.

Last year a party of friends gathered at their residence in Brooklyn, on the 29th of October and celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of their marriage.

Mr. Branch was born in Vermont, but has lived in Brooklyn more than forty-six years, or more than twenty-five years he was a member of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, and for a long time was a member of its board of trustees and an elder in the church. Mrs. Branch has been widely known as a mother in Israel, and a considerable part of her life has been spent in church and charitable work.

A PIECE of iron rail which does duty as a church bell, struck at 7.30 A.M. on a Lord's day, calls the Christian converts of a village in Madras to worship in the mud church. At 8 the church is full and the service commences with several hymns. A native elder leads in prayer, asking that the Holy Spirit may be with them. A native teacher reads the Scripture portion, another hymn is sung, and the missionary announces the text, "Behold, now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation," which the congregation repeats over and over until, like the ancient Vedas, it is thoroughly memorized. At the close of the sermon, the simple villagers gather round the Lord's table to partake of the sacred emblems, which are holy realities to the people of the mystic East. It is a day of peculiar importance, as 14 precious souls, who have been carefully instructed, are to be baptized in the lake near by after public profession of faith. Then follows a season of prayer, for these fourteen converts, like the seventy apostles, or like the yellow-robed missionaries of early Buddhism, are to go into the highways and byways of India and "preach the Gospel to every creature."

THE Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, of which Rev. Parley E. Zartmann is secretary, with headquarters at Winona Lake, Ind., has thirty-one of its members in the religious work of the Red Triangle; four with the colors; one, Rev. John M. Dean, is a regimental chaplain.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. Here's What I'm Drinking

HAVE you noticed how many middle aged and elderly people drink Postum instead of coffee?

However much one may like this or that beverage it is an unmistakable fact that coffee does prove harmful. Its unfortunate influence upon the nerves, as shown by wakefulness, headaches, and so on, makes it undesirable for many.

meets such situations exactly, for it provides an invigorating table drink much like superior coffees in flavor, but as it is made from cereals and a small portion of wholesome molasses, it never produces the ill effects that often result from regular coffee drinking.

Joseph Sold by His Brothers

International Sunday School Lesson for December 1

Gen. 37: 1-36

Seeds and Fruits of Family Discord

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

AS we chose an Old Testament proverb for our key text last week on the difficulties of reconciliation, so today we may choose a New Testament proverb, full of warning: "For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work" (James 3:16). The sin of Joseph's brothers grew out of jealousy and folly within the circle of a blessed and consecrated family. To us it is remarkable that Jacob should repeat again the unwise favoritism of his own father and mother, after all the trouble it had brought upon him and them. So many of the troubles of the patriarchs were due to defective family life and to polygamy that we can be thankful for the service of Christianity in establishing forever the Christian ideal of the home in law and custom. Yet the peace and love of family groups are always being threatened by one form and another of selfishness and sin.

The Problem of the Spoiled Child

Every one of us who has had experience in working with boys and girls has faced the problem of the "spoiled" child. Sometimes it is an only son whose every whim has been law to his unwise parents and who is totally unfitted for social life with its necessity of subordination and sacrifice at every turn. Sometimes it is the youngest of a large group, who have petted and favored the "baby." Again it is the daughter of wealth, who has been loaded with luxury and attention until she is unable to realize the burden of the world's work in which all should share. Rarely we find favoritism, like that of Jacob toward Joseph, in singling one child out for distinctions that are not shared with the rest. When one boy is invariably scolded and another always praised, foundations are being laid for abiding ill-will between brothers, who should be the closest of friends.

The fine character developed by Joseph in the years of his hardships is all the more notable when one sees the tendencies which the spoiling process was bringing out in his boyhood. We see all the self-importance of the spoiled darling in his dreams of the sun, moon and stars bowing down before him. He could not spend a day in the harvest fields without imagining his brothers' sheaves, like courtiers, bowing down before his sheaf. Self was the center of his thought, and his father was to blame. Besides, his attitude toward his brethren was overbearing and censorious. He was a tale-bearer, bringing an "evil report of them unto their father."

Joseph seems to have realized in his maturity that the hand of God was in his misfortunes, delivering him from moral weakness and failure. The best cure for the spoiled child is in hardship. Insufferable boys have been cured by hikes and camps with young companions under wise leadership. Snobbish and selfish girls have been redeemed by wholesome group activities, especially where the class or club has had useful work to do. The public school saves thousands of spoiled children by bringing them into democratic contact with their fellows.

Envy is a prolific root of discord. Yet Joseph's brethren were goaded into such an unfortunate state of mind that the most terrible results were certain. Probably the famous "coat of many colors," which should be called "a long garment with sleeves," was a constant source of irritation. It was the dress of the man of distinction, perhaps of the man of leisure, and must have contrasted sharply with the rough working clothes of these shepherds. It could scarcely be possible for a Christian parent to stir up envy between his children by such discrimination of dress today. Yet we are not yet Christlike enough to remember that we are all of one family in God, and that it is stirring up strife to send a luxuriously clad child into the midst of fellow members of church and school who have sadly worn and patched garments. Strangely true to modern life is the indictment made by St. James in those earliest days of the Church, when jewelry and fine robes so soon brought the danger of class distinctions.

If the fortunate are thoughtless and inconsiderate, the poor are foolish and jealous in this matter. Envy can always be explained, but among Christians can it be excused? One of the basic Ten Commandments is directed against coveting anything that is thy neighbor's. The spirit of Christ teaches us to set our hearts on the things which are true riches equally to be shared by all. The poor man who is envious is an equal sinner against brotherhood with the rich man who is haughty. Jesus cared for men as brothers irrespective of their wealth or poverty, and so should we.

Contention Within the Home

What a picture of an unhappy household is drawn so tersely in Gen. 37: 4: "They could not speak peaceably unto him." The Hebrew idiom practically means "they could not say 'good-morning' to him!" The ordinary courtesies of common life abrogated within the family circle, because of dissension! It is a sorrow to the Saviour to look down upon such blundering folly that drives farther and farther apart those whom God has joined together. In our more refined and civilized life there is seldom any such dreadful happening as the suggestion of killing or selling of Joseph by his brethren. But there is often a steady deterioration of character in all the parties to a domestic misunderstanding. The standards of life outside in church and business and society will insidiously become less Christian. On the other hand, as McNaughton's beautiful hymn has it, "There is beauty all around when there's love at home."

The Day of Tragedy

Sooner or later, jealousy or contention reach their climax in the day of tragedy, when the irreparable blow is struck in anger, or the unforgivable word is spoken in haste. So it was with Joseph and his brethren. He had been sent to bring them a greeting from home, probably delicacies for their lonely camp as well. While he approached in all innocence, their hatred welled up and overflowed the bonds of restraint. "Let us kill him," says one of the rude sons of the handmaidens; "we can say that an evil beast devoured him." Reuben, the eldest, felt a sense of responsibility, and persuaded them to cast him into an empty well, rather than to shed his blood. He intended to save the lad after he had been thoroughly frightened and humiliated, and some of the conceit taken out of him. But as the angry brothers sat eating the very bread that the spoiled boy had brought, a caravan drew nigh and at Judah's suggestion he was sold as a slave.

What a sad, miserable group we see at our chapter's end—sons and daughters trying in vain to console the stricken father! Jacob had only the blood-drenched coat which had caused so much contention, as a memento of his favorite child. Reuben shared with the father the sorrow of believing that Joseph was dead, with the added sting of believing his brothers to be virtually murderers. The nine guilty ones dared not confess the truth, though it might have been possible to find and restore their victim. Years afterward their consciences still troubled them, while Joseph, frightened and bound, was sold into slavery in Egypt.

Misunderstanding, discord at home, bring at the last bitter regret. "Love suffereth long and is kind; love envieth not; vaunteth not itself, . . . beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

"Follow after love."

The CALORIC

Saves 35% to 50% Fuel

"We enjoy comfort in every room"

- about a Skeptic and a Caloric Conversion

MR. N. S. YODER, Pinto, Allegany County, Maryland, has one of the finest farms in the western part of that state. He has 400 acres in bottom land alone, and is known all over the surrounding territory as one of the most successful farmers and stock raisers. Mr. Yoder was one of the first in Western Maryland to install a Caloric heating system. He then had no cellar, but dug a pit under the house for the furnace. Listen to this interesting story as told by Mr. Yoder himself:

"We have had the Caloric two winters. Like most people, we were skeptical and could not see how such a large and complicated house as ours could be heated with the single register of your patented Caloric Pipeless Furnace. But when your local agents gave us their personal guarantee, we consented to have the Caloric installed.

"Our children have enjoyed better health"

"When we got the fire started we began to see what we had thought impossible. We never appreciated what a good warm house meant until then. Now we enjoy comfort in every room and do not bother how cold it gets.

"Shortly after the Caloric was installed one of our farm hands had a severe case of pneumonia, and it was necessary to be up with him during the night. The floors were warm, and it was entirely comfortable to walk through the house without shoes.

"All the Comforts of the City Home"

"We have all the comforts of the city home—in fact, much more than many of them, at least in the way of heat. For one thing, there is less work to keep the house clean. We do not have to carry coal and ashes around, and the furnace needs no more attention than one heating stove.

"The Caloric has established a remarkable record for economy. Our house is a large frame one with nine rooms, exposed on all sides to the full sweep of the wind, right alongside the Knobby Mountains, and when you consider that we went through last winter on nine tons of soft coal, it is little short of marvelous.

"The heat is balmy and delightful, making an atmosphere in which our flowers and house plants thrive wonderfully all winter long. Our children have enjoyed better health since we installed the Caloric.

"It gives me pleasure to tell you this, for Caloric comfort is too great an advantage to be kept quiet, and we will be glad to answer any questions about it."

Mr. Yoder's experience is not unusual. More than 50,000 Caloric furnaces in cities, towns and country are giving universal satisfaction—heating homes, churches, halls, business buildings, etc., comfortably and saving fuel for their owners. Write to us and we will send you our free catalog that explains why the Caloric is so superior. Get this book today. It will point the way to a more comfortable, healthful home next winter, and will show you how to save many dollars on your fuel bill. Send us your name and address and we will immediately send the book post paid. A postcard or the coupon will do.

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

IF I could have a "Christmas wish" this year, Neighbors; if I (like the eager little folks) were to write Santa a letter, telling him what I wanted, do you know what I would wish for? Why, simply this: that every town in the United States should hold, this Christmas, some kind of Community Celebration.

I would not care what sort of Yuletide festival this was. It might be a tree in one town; an evening of carol singing in another; a play or pageant in a third. The possibilities are endless. And no one is better than another. For, after all, in commemorating the birthday of our Master, it is not the size of the tree that matters, but the size and spirit of the crowd around it.

Is the whole village there? Is every one joining in with a will? Are the faces upturned to that simply decorated tree radiant with good-will and Christmas cheer? Then, Christmas has indeed come to your town!

If you doubt this; if your village has never known the joy of gathering in the town hall for a Christmas pageant, or standing out in the starlight around a glowing tree and singing the old carols our Christian traditions have made holy, then let me beg of you, arrange for it this year.

Keep the whole plan simple, allowing every one a share in the giving and a share in the labor. If your town is a prosperous one, and more is donated to the village Christmas fund than is needed for a simple celebration, turn the rest of the money over to alleviating suffering at home or over seas. Avoid display and ostentation; for these have no place in the commemoration of Christmas.

Many of you live in towns where such a celebration is the yearly custom. Those who do are fortunate. For to you Christmas has come to mean something far finer than can be put into words. And to your children, too, it has taken on a different meaning. Ask any child who has ever helped trim a community Christmas tree, hanging on it some little gift of his own earning or making, if he would not rather remain at home next Christmas, and be surprised by a tree all his own, and you will probably have him burst into tears.

Such is the heart of a child. And really we are all children. We would all rather give than receive. And we'd rather give love than costly presents. So, remembering this about ourselves, Neighbors, let us give lavishly of that love this year. Let us hang it on the village tree in the form of little gifts for wistful children. Let us put it into our carols and our smiles. Let us freight our Christmas letters with it, especially those that go abroad. Let us live it at home.

THESE are only a few of the ways in which we can express the real Christmas spirit. There are other ways, many of them, as the following inspiring accounts prove:

Christmas in Our Town

Our busy midwest town can scarcely be called even a small city; but it has for many years had a very good way of Christmas neighboring. About a month before Christmas, the heading, "Christmas Fund for Happy Kiddies" (or a title equally interesting) appears in the local daily paper, followed by the amount given by the management of the paper—always a liberal sum—and also the names of a few business men and the amounts they gave.

This is the beginning, and it is surprising how the list grows from day to day. Some give their names; many initials only. And the sums range from ten cents to ten dollars. Committees are formed with members from each church, school and club. These work together and represent every section of the town. To them is turned over all money collected and also the numerous donations of warm clothing, vegetables, and canned fruit that come in. Nothing is refused, so long as it is good. Nothing half-worn-out or broken will be received.

The merchants give liberally from their shelves. A lodge donates the use of its room for the goods and workers. In the meantime a little notice appears in the paper asking every one to send in names of families or individuals needing help of any sort, and also strangers needing cheer. There is one committee which looks especially after the strangers and the aged.

The different committees consult together frequently, and the result is that during last few days before Christmas these "Santa" and their helpers fill many large market baskets to overflowing with just the things to meet each person's need. First come the "makings" of a good dinner and supplied according to the number in family. And goodies are not forgotten. Besides there is always a warm coat or dress, cap mittens, often orders for coal or groceries, many times a whole outfit for school child baby. It has often been said, and truly, so far as the committees knew, there had never been a hungry or cold Christmas for any in the town of A—.

Then, too, the Christmas committees have reached many a family that was needy too proud to accept help in a market basket. To these a bill has gone with some article of comfort and a word of cheer from an unknown friend: all sent in such a spirit that the recipients were made to feel that some one "care" family time. Sometimes it is a broken family who gives this hospitality: a saddened family missing the absent ones with all their hearts but bravely reaching out to someone equally lonely. Friendships formed in this way have many times gone on for years.

Of course mistakes have been made, they have been very few and far between; the good accomplished has been tremendous. There is no publicity connected with giving. Early on Christmas Eve automobile owners give their cars and their time to play Santa, and they are taken to the homes of an expression of real interest and good-will on the part of their friends.

One noticeable thing about this custom, is the wish to help on the part of those who only Christmas cheer comes to them in this way. To the Newspaper Fund come sums handed in by a little newsboy or poor clad schoolgirl; and into the mite-box at corner drug-store goes many a bit of money dropped by a foreign-looking man or woman. Christmas in A— means work, and a lot of it, for a good many people; but every one of them would tell you that it pays.—MRS. IOWA.

I should say it does pay! Many times over! I would like, Neighbors, to visit that town of A—. Wouldn't you? It certainly understands the real meaning of Christmas, and lives up to it.

But I cannot help feeling just a little sorry that (with all its great-heartedness) it should have omitted a community tree or other Christmas festival for the whole town. Perhaps it has a tree; and the account simply did not find its way into this letter. I am wondering. I believe I will write to this Iowa neighbor, find out, and let you know.

For this Christmas page is not going to be our last this year. Indeed, I am going to have another before Christmas Day, fellow Adventurers, and so I do hope you will hasten to send me all the accounts of past Christmas, and the helpful suggestions for the coming Christmas, you have in mind.

MEANTIME, friends, here is another delightful instance of community co-operation at Christmas time:

Community Christmas Trees on Prairies

In 1909 my daughter and I left our home in Iowa to join my husband in Colorado, where we had decided to venture, taking government land. Everything was new and strange to the manner of building those first huts, making fires where there was no wood, and so on. It was almost like camp life, and a very interesting experience.

The community had a store and post office and some good farms round about. But there was no social life. We decided to do what we could to change this; so as the holidays came near we began to plan for a Christmas entertainment. How to obtain an evergreen on those treeless prairies was the great problem. At last, however, the tumbleweed suggested a way to us. A number of these colored green by repeated dippings in a tub of dye until the proper color was produced. Alum was added to give the desired lustre. After being dried, these were nested together, the largest on the bottom and so on up to the height of a good-sized tree, and the result

Laid Eggs Every Day

A. P. Woodard, of St. Cloud, Florida, writes: "We get from 40 to 50 eggs per day. Before using 'More Eggs' we were getting only 8 and 9 eggs a day."

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. "More Eggs" is a scientific tonic that revitalizes the flock and makes the hens work all the time. "More Eggs" will double the production of eggs. Poultry raisers everywhere are making big profits by giving their hens "More Eggs." The results of a few cents' worth will amaze you.

Send $1.00 to E. J. Reefer, the poultry expert, 8498 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Missouri, and he will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs." A million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request. Send a dollar today or write to Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book that tells the experiences of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.—Adv.

The wise man thinks of the ocean of knowledge before him, the fool of the few drops that have already filtered into his brain.

a perfectly-shaped evergreen. Stars of different sizes were cut out and covered with tinsel. One very large one was fastened from the ceiling directly over the tree. All the other ornaments which help to make a tree resplendent were arranged, until those who saw the finished product said: "Where did you get your tree?"

Next thing needed was the candy. But this was supplied by one of our workers, who brought a pail of sweets. So we arranged candy and popcorn in the usual way.

Invitations were sent to every family within a radius of five miles, with the result that we had a full house. And what a jolly Christmas party that was! And what expressions of surprise and delight there were over that tree!

To say that the evergreen hopes and desires of that time have been fully met in that little Colorado community is only telling in part what has been accomplished. Today it has fine churches, stores, and good schools, climbing farm homes and splendid workers in church and club life. But all this had its beginnings, we think, in that little Christmas celebration, years ago, when the community came together for the first time around a Christmas tree made of tumbleweeds. For from this friendly gathering there sprang up a new spirit of co-operation and good will.—B. MILHOLLAND.

OUR next letter describes a charming bit of Christmas neighborliness; and it also brings to my mind the little ten-cent Christmas trees on sale at any five-cent store.

Of course, a tiny evergreen brought from the woods would be even nicer, as the following letter proves. But not all of us are living where evergreens are available. For those of us who are not, I commend the little paper trees:

Miniature Christmas Tree for Shut-Ins

A widowed lady, crippled and suffering from rheumatism, lived near my home. She was peculiarly needy, but most of her own and dear ones had passed beyond the grave; so she lived a lonely life, having to be lifted from bed to wheel chair by an attendant. She was cheerful with all this, and patient. We knew how wearisome her hours must be, she had always lived an active and helpful life when in good health.

One Christmas time it occurred to us, her neighbors, to take a little Christmas tree to her since she could not come to any of our Christmas good times. Every one was enthusiastic over the idea, and a young man brought a little tree to a nearby home, fitting a branch to the tree so that it would stand firmly upon a table. We others brought decorations, fruits, candies, nuts and various goodies; and decorated the tree with them. Then we brought our gifts. These were put in net bags, showing their contents, and were mixed with "comfort powders"—the powders being slips of paper on which were written various comforting texts and messages. About the middle of the forenoon a lady quietly carried the loaded tree to the room of our friend. The pleasure it gave was beyond anything we had expected.—H. A. H., Maine.

AND this brings us, fellow Adventurers, to our last letter for today: rather loving and practical Christmas suggestion:

Christmas Goody for Lonely Neighbors

Last year, when making my plum pudding for Christmas, instead of steaming it in one loaf I took seven square cocoa cans (all of them would fit in my steamer) and divided the pudding into these cans. They came out beautifully, each small loaf enough for three slices.

One of these loaves together with a glass of grape jelly, each wrapped in a gay poinsettia paper napkin, made a neat little gift for a dear old lady living near by. Another loaf, with a little jar of pudding sauce, was sent to a lonely old bachelor, living a few miles distant. A short time afterward the bachelor called to thank me and said: "It seemed awfully good to have somebody think of me." After all, it is the "thinking" of them that is appreciated oftentimes more than the gift.—Mrs. O. M. O., Manitoba, Canada.

I published that last adventure because of the message in it for those of us who are housewives and who (used to our own bread and cake and other homemade goodies) never dream what a bit of home cooking tastes like to those who never have it. No Christmas present bought in a store could mean half so much.

AND now, Christian Herald comrades, with the promise that we shall have another Christmas number in a few weeks, filled with this year's Christmas plans and experiments in your various towns and villages, I must leave you for a fortnight.

The Neighbors' Forum

To any one who will send me a stamped, self-addressed envelope I will send the booklet, "America's Letter from Home," to be enclosed when next you write to your soldier boy Over There.—LEILA M. CONWAY.

I have just read in the Adventures of the experience of the Mexico Neighbor with the Ninety-first Psalm. It reminded me that I had thought of asking to have other Psalms printed in the Christian Herald in the same way. I cut out that one and sent it to my soldier boy in France. He wrote: "Thank you, mama, for the chapter you sent. I wish you would send some more." He took his Bible to the training-camp, but had to send it home when he went overseas, so has only the Testament. I do not know where I can get the Psalms in as compact form as you printed that.—Mrs. C. P. S., Washington.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: I am pleased to see your appreciative and helpful and at the same time practical attitude toward the school as a force for progressive ideals in the community. In these peculiarly trying times, I believe the school problem is more than usually difficult. To meet this situation, some of us here have worked out a method which seems to cultivate an ideal school spirit. If any other teacher would like to try it, I would be glad to explain it.—A NEW ENGLAND TEACHER.

I want to thank the ladies who so generously responded to my appeal for church music. I am afraid I didn't make myself quite clear regarding the kind of music I want. I would like something suitable for offertories, choruses, quartets, duets, etc. My name is Moose, not Moore. Again thanking you all, I am cordially yours, Mrs. J. D. Moose, Glasgow, Virginia.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: A Mr. Thomas Cuming, Box 432, North Battleford, Saskatchewan, Canada, has had three strokes of paralysis and is speechless and incurable in a hospital. He asks for correspondents. His note reached me well credited. Will some of the neighbors write to him?—DEACONESS MAY SHEPPARDSON.

I do thank all the Neighbors for the dear letters sent to me. God bless you all!—MAGGIE ZIMMERMAN, Ohio.

Nation Wide Song for Victory

SEVEN million American women are pushing a "Liberty Sing" movement urging the people of every city and hamlet and the men in trench, camp, transport and battleship to "Sing for Victory" on Thanksgiving Day at 4 p. m. Eastern time. These women want to inspire every citizen of the United States to join in singing "The Star Spangled Banner" and other patriotic songs at the same hour, creating a wave of victory song that will reach from ocean to ocean. The plan for a great day of national song was inaugurated last year when the National Community Song Day was observed throughout the country on Sunday, December 9.

It is proposed to use the following songs for part of every program, so that each community may unite with the rest of the country in a comradeship of melody:

National Anthem—"The Star Spangled Banner."

Songs of Thanksgiving—"Come Thou Almighty King," "The Holy City," "God of All Nations," "Song of Liberty."

Songs of Home—"Keep the Home Fires Burning," "The Long, Long Trail," "Women of the Homeland," "The Old Folks at Home."

Songs of Victory—"To Victory," "When the Boys Come Home," "When Pershing's Men Go Marching Into Picardy," "Three Stars."

AFTER JANUARY 1, 1919 CHRISTIAN HERALD WILL BE $2.50

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been forced to increase its subscription price. Every single item that goes into the making of the Christian Herald—paper, postage, printing, engraving, wages, etc.—has increased enormously in cost. And the costs keep right on increasing.

One of two things was necessary—either to lower the standard of the Christian Herald or to increase the subscription price. You would not want the standard lowered, and we will not lower it. In fact, the Christian Herald must keep right on getting better—and bigger—and finer. The Christian Herald has an important mission to perform, and will need the hearty co-operation of every reader to do it successfully.

An opportunity will be given to all our readers to renew at the present price of $2.00 a year as the increased price of $2.50 a year will not go into effect until January 1, 1919. No matter when your subscription expires—even if you have recently renewed and your subscription does not expire for many months—you can have your subscription extended at the present rate. This enables you to still have the Christian Herald at $2.00 a year, in spite of the ever increasing cost of manufacture.

Subscriptions are for one year. Renewal subscriptions are extended for one year from the date of expiration. New subscriptions begin with the current issue. Magazines can go to different names and addresses except in a few cases noted otherwise. Canadian postage on other magazines is usually 50 cents additional; foreign postage $1.00 additional.

All of These Clubs Will Positively Advance 50 Cents or More After January 1, 1919
